"He replied: 'I'm going to coort.'

"'H'm!' said the wife, and Pat stalked out. Next morning Pat came down stairs all shaven and shorn, with the same suit of clothes on.

"'And where are ye going today?' said the wife.

"'Sure, I'm going to coort.'

"'Ye are, are ye?'

"Pat went out and slammed the door. The third morning Pat came in and sat down to the breakfast table with the same suit of clothes on, and greeted his wife, who said:

"'And where are ye going this morning, Pat?'

"'I'm going to coort.'

"The wife laid her hands upon a rolling pin, stood before the door and said:

"'Ye're going to coort, are ye?'

"'Yis,' said Pat.

"'No, ye're not. If there's any coorting to be done it will be done right here. Go up stairs and take off thim clothes.'"—Newark Star.

"I'm going over to comfort Mrs. Brown," said Mrs. Jackson to her daughter Mary. "Mr. Brown hanged himself in their attic last night."

"Oh, mother, don't go! you know you always say the wrong thing."

"Yes, I'm going, Mary. I'll just talk about the weather. That's a safe enough subject."

Mrs. Jackson went over on her visit of condolence. "We have had rainy weather lately, haven't we, Mrs. Brown?" she said.

"Yes," replied the widow; "I haven't been able to get the week's wash dried."

"Oh," said Mrs. Jackson, "I shouldn't think you would have any trouble. You have such a nice attic to hang things in."—Home Herald.

When Patty Saved the Tableaux

By Emma C. Dowd.

There were to be tableaux in the parish house parlors, next door to the church, and little Patty Graham was to be in a good many of them. The young people had been practicing for weeks, and everybody who had been allowed to see the tableaux said that they were "beautiful," and that Patty Graham was "just as sweet as she could be." The reason that Patty was in so many of these living pictures was because, whenever a girl of about her size was needed, the folks would say, "Oh, let's have Patty! She fits in everywhere, and does just as you tell her to do, and she's such a darling!" And not one of the other little girls thought of being jealous of her, because she was so modest and dear and lovely.

"Don't you dare to catch cold, Patty Graham!" one of the young ladies laughingly said to her, patting her pink cheeks. "And don't you come down with mumps or measles! If you should, the tableaux would be lost,—hopelessly lost!"

Patty laughed, and shook her yellow curls, and said she wouldn't and danced away on her tip-toes.

The evening came, and Patty was brimful of happiness. She was to be in the first tableau, with Robert, her big brother, and Mabel, her middle sister, and a half-dozen besides.

All was ready for the curtain to go up, Patty was in her place, still as a mouse, when, without a twinge of warning—her ear began to ache! If you have ever had the earache, you know what a dreadful pain it can be. Patty had had it, and she knew. It began so sharply that she almost screwed up her little face—not quite, for wasn't she in a tableau!

The curtain went up, and the people looked at Patty, as a little Scotch lassie, and said, "How sweet she is!" for the dear child set her teeth hard, and never flinched.

As soon as the tableau was over, Patty longed to run away to her mother; but one of the young ladies came to make her into a little Dutch maid, and it was the one who had said the tableaux would be lost if Patty couldn't be in them. So she smiled as brightly as was possible, and nobody noticed that she was strangely still.

It was a dreadful evening for poor little Patty. A great many times she thought she must put her head in somebody's lap, and cry; but then they might send her home, and the beautiful tableaux would be lost! No, she must wait until all had been given, for she was to be an angel in the very last picture. So she never put her hand to her ear when anybody was looking, and did exactly as she was bidden, and even tried to smile.

When her pretty wings were being fastened on, two great tears did roll down her cheeks; and the girl who was dressing her said: "Why, deary! Are you too tired? Are you ill?"

"Oh, no!" she answered cheerfully. "My ear aches; that's all."

"All!" echoed the girl, pityingly. "You poor darling!" But just then the tableaux was called.

When the curtain dropped for the third time on "The Guardian Angel," the rector took Petty in his arms. "You are a dear little angel!" he whispered, and then the "little angel" put her head right down on the fatherly shoulder, and cried!

Then how they all petted and cuddled her —and everybody said that Patty Graham was the bravest little girl they ever saw.— St. Nicholas.

Ten Days

Christine Lennox had been ill a fortnight.

"I can't see that there's much the matter," she told the doctor. "I believe you are keeping me abed just to make me rest," and she laughed up at him.

The physician was the cheeriest of men, but now he had no smile of response. He had been the girl's friend since her babyhood, and he looked at her tenderly.

"Christine," he said, "I have never lied to you, and I am going to tell you the truth. You are not as well as you think."

Her startled eyes searched his own.

"Do you mean"—she began.

"I mean, my dear child, that all I can do is to make you comfortable for a little while." His eyes were wet.

"How long?" she asked softly.

"Probably about ten days."

She drew a quick breath. "Do the rest know?"

The physician nodded.

"Poor mother!" she murmured. Then she looked up with a smile. "I thank you for telling me."

Her father sat with her at the noon hour. Her slender fingers nestled in his big, warm hand.

"Will you ask Uncle Norman to come up to see me?" she asked. This evening will be a good time."

The man's face darkened. He and his brother had not spoken for five years.

"You better send a note."

"I'd rather you'd take the message—please."

"All right. I'll tell him." And the girl felt a tear fall on her cheek as he stooped to kiss her.

"I only wish I could see them friends before I go," she whispered to herself.

Her longing was granted. At her bedside the barrier of years was broken down, and the two were brothers again.

Christine's favorite cousin was at college. He was not making the best of himself, and friends were anxious. A note from her brought him for a parting visit.

"Theodore, do you know the meaning of your name?" she asked.

"No. Something I'm not, I presume."

"Something you can be," the gentle voice replied. "It is 'powerful among the people,' and I think it is beautiful. Only one can not be that you know, unless one is master of himself, and is true to the best, to the highest. I wish you'd think it when I'm away."

The boy did think, and he became a power for good among his fellows.

So full were those ten days! Through the influence of the dying girl two estranged lovers were united, a home was provided for a destitute cripple, a church contention was resolved into harmony, and a despairing woman found peace and joy. Besides this, there were uncounted deeds of love that lived in many hearts after the doer of them had passed from sight.

Ten days! They are waiting just ahead. One by one they will come into the grasp of all of us. Shall they be filled with frivolities or blessed by deeds of love and Christian service? Shall those days which are to be dedicated to God be only the last ten days of life, or shall they be the next ten days and every ten that follows them?—Baptist Standard.

What's Your Hurry?

George Huntington.

Baby with the curls of gold,
What's your hurry?
Time enough for growing old,
Don't you worry.
Keep the golden curls a while;
Keep the dimpled baby smile.
Leave to grown-up greed and guile
Its fret and flurry.

Boy, impatient to be grown,
What's your hurry?
Wherefore covet you your own
Man's foolish flurry?
Little maid, with rosy face,
Keep your girlish ways a space,
Woman's love and woman's grace
Cost tears and worry.

Miser, in the dollar-chase,
What's your hurry?
Spendthrift, with the killing pace,
What's your hurry?
Toiler, trader, artist, bard,
In the race so fierce and hard,
Would you but your haste retard,
'T'would save much worry.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, MARCH 13, 1910.

Theme for the Day—The Shepherd of the sheep.

Scripture—The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; He leadeth me beside still waters.—Psa. 23:1, 2.

And I first played the tune all our sheep know, as one after one,
So docile they come to the pen-door till folding be done.
They are white and untorn by the bushes, for lo, they have fed
Where the long grasses stifle the water within the stream's bed.
—Browning ("Saul.")

Prayer—Our Father, Thou art the great Shepherd, and we are the sheep of Thy pasture. Lead us, we beseech Thee, into green pastures, and beside still waters. On this holy day we praise Thee for the food on which our souls are fed. Help us to abide in Thy care and to wander no more. We were as those who go astray, but now we would return to the Shepherd and Bishop of our souls. Deliver us from the betrayer, guide us in the way we take and bring us at last to Thy upper fold in safety, for Thy name's sake. Amen.

MONDAY MARCH 14, 1910.

Theme for the Day—Fear not, be strong.

Scripture—So will I save you, and ye shall be a blessing; fear not but let your hands be strong.—Zech. 2:13.

O fear not in a world like this,
And thou shalt know erelong,
Know how sublime a thing it is
To suffer and be strong.
—Longfellow ("The Light of Stars.")

Prayer—Great art Thou, O Lord, and greatly to be praised. From everlasting to everlasting Thou changest not. Help us, we pray Thee, to know Thee with such confidence and appreciation that we may be delivered from fear, from the wavering mind and from all depression of spirit. Open doors of usefulness to us that our influence may reach those who may be helped by it, and our example may be a light to those who are out of the way. May the strength of sin be broken, and the beauty of holiness revealed in us through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

TUESDAY, MARCH 15, 1910.

Theme for the Day—The double mind.

Scripture—He that doubteth is like the surge of the sea, driven by the wind and tossed. A double-minded man, unstable is all his ways.—James 1:6-8.

And as one who unwills what he willed,
And with new thoughts changes his purpose,
So that he wholly quits the thing commenced.

Such I made myself on that dim coast;
For with thinking I wasted the enterprise,
That had been so quick in its commencement.
—Dante ("Inferno.")

Prayer—O Lord, we worship Thee as the eternal God. In Thy hands are the deep places of the earth, and the strength of the hills is Thine also. We thank Thee for health, for sanity, and for the will to live a life of purpose and honor. Keep us this day without sin, we beseech Thee, and fulfill the desires of our hearts for firmness and constancy of purpose, for the faith that grows clearer, and for the love that thinks no evil. Pardon our past, we pray Thee, and inspire our future. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16, 1910.

Theme for the Day—Our secret sin.

Scripture—For I know my transgressions, and my sin is ever before me.—Psa. 31:3.

Thou hast set our iniquities before thee, our secret sins in the light of thy countenance.—Psa. 90:8.

Thus oft it haps, that when within
They shrink at sense of secret sin,
A feather daunts the brave;
A fool's wild speech confounds the wise,
And proudest princes vail their eyes
Before their meanest slave.
—Scott ("Marmion.")

Prayer—Give us confidence in Thy power and Thy love, O God of our life. We are weary of our ignorance, our pride, our shame and our sins. Drive away our darkness by the light of Thy eternal morning, and clear up the shadowy places in our souls, where evil creatures lurk, by the clear shining of Thy presence, where sin abounds, make Thy grace much more to abound. From the sins that we love in secret and the self-will that holds us in bondage, grant us deliverance; for we ask in Jesus name. Amen.

THURSDAY, MARCH 17, 1910.

Theme for the Day—Solomon's temple.

Scripture—Then spake Solomon, Jehovah hath said he would dwell in the thick darkness; I have surely built thee a house of habitation, a place for thee to dwell in forever.—I. Kings 8:12, 13.

All gold within and gilded
This house that I have builded,
It is ready for a king in his array;
Behind the curtain's hiding,
The Highest is abiding;
We have found Him, He is with us from today.
—F. W. H. Myers ("Solomon.")

Prayer—Holy Father, as Thy servants of old rejoiced in the privilege of binding to Thee a structure for praise and glory, so may we delight to bear to Thee the triumph of our own hearts. It is our highest honor that we may become the tabernacles of the loving God, wherein dwells righteousness. May we keep the shrine pure and worthy. May our thoughts take larger hold upon our eternal house which is on high. And may we so live that to die shall be gain. Amen.

FRIDAY, MARCH 19, 1910.

Theme for the Day—The bruised reed.

Scriuture—A bruised reed shall he not break and smoking flax shall he not quench, till he send forth judgment unto victory, and in his name shall the nation hope.—Isa. 42:3; Matt. 12:20.

And if my heart and flesh are weak
To bear an untried pain,
The bruised reed He will not break,
But strengthen and sustain.
—Whittier ("Eternal Goodness.")

Prayer—Divine Father, in all our disappointments and perplexities do thou sustain us with Thy comforting presence and Thy Holy Spirit. There are moments when the weight of trouble is very heavy, and our hearts are sore and grieved. Be with us at such times, and let not our courage fail. Thou wilt not break the bruised reed nor quench the smoking flax. Thou wilt bring all things to a good ending, for Thou hast appointed Thy saints to victory, and those who love Thee to exceeding joy. Grant us Thy peace, for Christ's sake. Amen.

SATURDAY, MARCH 19, 1910.

Theme for the Day—Humility.

Scripture—Yes, all of you gird yourselves with humility to serve one another; for God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble.—I. Peter 5:3.

O son, thou hast not true humility,
The highest virtue, mother of them all;
But her thou hast not known; for what is this?
Thou thoughtest of thy prowess and thy sins;
Thou hast not lost thyself to save thyself.
—Tennyson ("The Holy Grail.")

Prayer—O God, give to Thy servants wisdom in dealing with success. It takes but little to fill us with self-confidence. A little prosperity makes us so likely to forget Thee and the true values of life. Set before us the divine example of our Saviour, who took upon him the form of a servant and ministered to the world. Help us to gird on humility, even as he did. And may no false and foolish pride ever rob us of our true happiness in lowly, quiet and effective lives. Amen.

Obedience

George MacDonald.

I said: "Let us walk in the fields."
He said: "No, walk in the town."
I said: "There are no flowers there."
He said: "No flowers, but a crown."

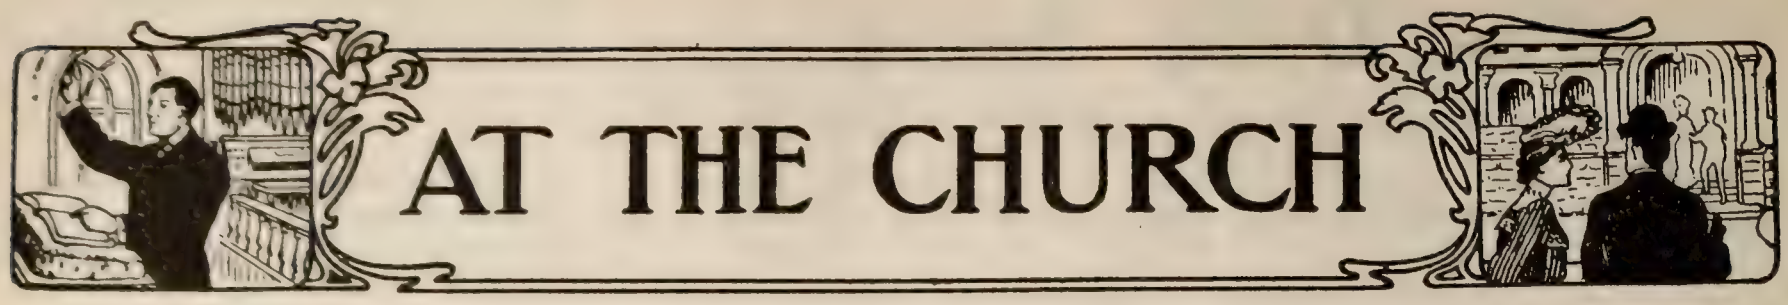
I said: "But the skies are black;
There is nothing but noise and din."
And He wept, as He sent me back—
"There is more," He said, "There is sin."

I said: "But the air is thick,
And fogs are veiling the sun."
He answered: "Yet souls are sick,
And souls in the dark undone!"

I said: "I shall miss the light,
And friends will miss me they say."
He answered: "Choose tonight
If I am to miss you or they."

I pleaded for time to be given.
He said: "Is it hard to decide?
It will not seem so hard in heaven
To have followed the steps of your guide."

Whate'er Be Mine



John Kendrick Bangs.

Whate'er be mine, may it be mine to share
With other folks the pleasure that it brings—
Gold, hapiness, or jewels passing rare,
Be what it may that Fortune's bounty flings.

If it be simple tastes, O, may I find Companions who will take them as do I,
If it be treasure of the soul or mind,
May there be those to share it standing nigh.

If it be kindliness of heart, good will,
A hopefulness of spirit, may there be
A goodly crowd about to take their fill
Of these possessions that have come to me.

Save only sorrow—if that cup must come,
Let me go forth into some spot unknown,
Where all about unnoting shall be dumb
The while I drain the bitter lees alone.

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The Paralytic and the Publican*

From the experiences on the eastern side of the lake where he had met and healed the madman who dwelt among the tombs, Jesus returned to Capernaum, his own city, and resumed the active ministries among the multitudes who thronged his way. We are not at all sure of the order of events in Jesus' life. It seems quite probable that the healing of the paralytic really occurred at some time before the events in Gadara, but the sequence of incidents was never regarded as important by the evangelists. Perhaps it was impossible at the date when the Gospels were written to reconstruct an orderly narrative of the events of Jesus' ministry.

It was on some occasion, however, when Jesus was teaching in his own home, or in some neighboring house, that the healing of the man who had suffered with some form of physical weakness, here called palsy or paralysis, occurred. The houses in the Orient were very simply constructed. The four walls were generally covered with a roof made of some light materials, either a tiling that could be easily removed or the boughs of trees covered with earth, as in the cottages of Ireland today. The stairway leading to the roof was on the outside of, the house. It would not be a difficult thing to carry a man to the roof and then remove enough of the house covering to let him down with ropes.

The place was thronged with people anxious to see and hear Jesus. His reputation had gone out widely through the neighboring country. Everybody was curious to know what kind of a man he was. Particularly had his work of healing aroused attention through all the district. People came from great distances to learn about the wonderful teacher who lived in Capernaum. Apparently on this occasion the house was completely filled with those who wanted to know what this strange citizen of their town would say and do. Not only was the house filled, but the throng extended out into the court so that access was no longer possible within reach of Jesus.

The sick man, whose friends had thought it worth while to bring him to Jesus, was unable to reach the Master because of the crowd. The four friends might easily have given up their venture because of the difficulty of access. But their faith was strong and their courage was not to be daunted. Whether the man himself insisted on every effort being made, or whether it was the persistence of the friends, certain it is that they took him up the stairway outside of the house, and removing enough of the roof so that they could let down the stretcher on which the man was carried, they succeeded in getting him into the immediate presence of Jesus. It was a novel method of procedure, and the Master was impressed by the sincerity of their faith and by their determination to succeed. No better instance of these two splendid qualities can be found in the New Testament than this case presents.

The Nature of the Malady.

Jesus looked upon the man as he lay before him apparently helpless. It is difficult to determine whether his case was one of absolute paralysis, which sometimes is the result of an immoral life, or whether some form of sickness had left him so far weakened that by a slow process of discouragement and morbid belief in his inability to use his limbs, the man had become entirely dependent upon the good offices of others to move him from place to place. We are beginning to understand, through the testimony of those who are familiar with various forms of bodily infirmity, how many are the instances in which the weakness lies in the will rather than in the limbs. Whether this case was similar to that of the man in the porch of Bethesda we do not know. In that instance Jesus merely found it necessary to exert the authority of his person and presence over the will of the lame man and summon him by an arousal of his own nature to arise, take up his bed, and depart. This may have been an instance of the same character, or it may be one of more deep-seated malady, in which the forthputting of power on Jesus' part is less easily understood by us.

Forgiveness of Sins.

But the thing Jesus was interested to emphasize in the case of this palsied man was the underlying connection between sin and suffering. His first words made no reference to the physical weakness of the patient before him. "Son, thy sins are forgiven thee," he said, as if that were all the man required. This was a disappointment to the man himself and to his friends, but, more than this, it was a challenge to the beliefs of the Pharisees and scribes who stood about. To their minds, forgiveness belonged alone to God. Any man who usurped the right to forgive sin threw defiance in the face of the Infinite. Who could forgive sins but God alone? It was thus they questioned among themselves. No better instance of false claims could be urged against this pretender than the words he had just spoken.

But Jesus met their discontented murmurs with the clear insistence upon his right to announce to the man the obliteration of his past. To be sure, that forgiveness lay not in any mere judicial act on God's part independent of the purpose of the sinner himself to achieve a righteous character. It would be a pathetic travesty of the moral order of things to suppose that any mere shifting of accounts is a forgiveness of sins. The latter is the divine recognition of a man's own determination to live henceforth as God would have him. It is the divine coöperation with human effort to realize the will of God in the soul. But Jesus was determined that his own authority as the divine interpreter of this great law of pardon should be definitely understood. His right to speak of the man's forgiveness lay in his mastery of the whole of life, physical and ethical. In the case of another it might not have been true, for the mere healing of a man's body would not signify that the healer was an authoritative teacher sent from God; but combined with Jesus' character and message, his works of healing had the value of confirming the message he brought.

So he said to the man before him and to the crowd, "That you may know that the Son of Man has power on earth to forgive sins, arise, take up thy bed and go into thy house." The response of the man was instant. Whether the word of Jesus, so compelling and imperial, aroused all the dormant energies of his being to an expression which for months and perhaps years he had deemed impossible, or whether some subtler and more profound outputting of power by Jesus accomplished the cure, he arose at once, took up his pallet and departed, leaving the crowd in astonishment at what had transpired.

Apparently upon the same day Jesus passed the booth where sat a collector of duties and tolls from the people who crossed the lake. This man's name was Matthew, though among his Hebrew brethren he was generally called Levi. No act of greater audacity could be imagined than that Jesus should summon this man to his fellowship, for the publicans were the most bitterly hated of all classes of people because of their mercenary connection with the galling system of public taxes. But Jesus did not hesitate, for he saw in the man qualities he desired in one of his followers. And he called to him to come and join the little group of disciples.

Apparently upon the same day, and as if to celebrate his departure from the old life, Matthew gathered a company of his old friends, men and women of questionable character, and made for them a feast in his own house. Jesus and the disciples were guests with this motley company, and not a little scandal was afforded the critics of Jesus' life by the event. They thought it astonishing that he should have no clearer discernment of his company than this. But Jesus met their criticism with the quiet statement that he came to help this very class of people. He could not heal those who did not know themselves to be sick, but he found welcome among the men and women who knew their evil estate and welcomed deliverance. And thus our Lord revealed the spirit of that beautiful text of Hosea's which he loved so much to quote, "I desire mercy rather than sacrifice."

Oh, one might reach before heights
By one strong burst of power;
He might emblaze the whitest lights
Of heaven for an hour;
But harder is the daily drag,
To smile at trials which fret and fag
And not to murmur nor to lag,
And test of greatness is the way
One meets the eternal day.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

Topic, March 20: Money a Curse or a Blessing. Luke 12:13-21; Matt. 6:19-21.

It is unfortunate that the subject as stated above must be given serious discussion. Yet because of the widespread confusion on the subject, and, therefore, the great difference of opinion it is of paramount importance. There are those who will assert with vehemence that money is certainly a curse; and others contend that it is an unmixed good. These represent the two extremes, and both are wrong. The whole question clears up when we make the fundamental and highly important distinction between the end and the means. When we fail to make this distinction there is endless confusion on any subject. If a medical student were to spend all the days of his life in school, while men all about him were dying with typhoid and pneumonia, we would pronounce him a failure as a physician. If, on the other hand, he insisted on treating these dreaded diseases without having made special study and preparation none would trust him, and he again would be a failure. What is wrong? You say he should have made reasonable preparation and then made a practical application of his knowledge in his attempt to relieve those in distress. That is, he should have made his attendance at school the means by which to heal the sick, which was the end in view when he decided to be a physician. The medical school, when used as a means for the cure of disease, we say, is a good thing. But, when it is made the end beyond which the student does not go, it is of no value in the relief of suffering.

The same distinction must be made in the study of the good and evil of money. In our lives money is only a means to an end. Money has no intrinsic value. If you were alone on a barren island out in the Pacific ocean with a carload of gold you could not use it to satisfy your hunger, to shelter your body, nor to dress your wounds. It would not add to your intelligence, furnish companionship, nor sympathize with you in your loneliness. Notwithstanding all this, countless numbers make money the end of their life-long endeavor. This was precisely the thing which Jesus was rebuking in the young man who wanted him to act as judge between him and his brother when they disputed over their inheritance. This is borne out in the parable which follows, by the man who relied upon his wealth to bring him comfort and happiness, and, therefore, proceeded to tear down his granaries and build larger. Foolish man, within a single night he must go and leave it all. But, worthless as it is, men, for the sake of dirty dollars, will smother their conscience, betray a trust, outrage justice, and traffic in womanhood. When money is thus made the end of life, of course, it becomes a blight and curse upon the life, and naturally enough Jesus condemns it severely and frequently. In his broad, clear vision he saw that bursting barns and concealed coffers, however carefully guarded, are subject to the forces of decay and the hand of stealth.

Jesus urges that we seek the righteousness characteristic of his Kingdom. This is the great end of life. Justice, and mercy, kindness and sympathy, forebearance and forgiveness, service and love—these are the things for which all should strive. They constitute the end. These are the heavenly treasures which time can neither mar nor destroy. They are too refined in quality and too exalted in character for the selfish hand of greed to seize them even by stealth. Christian Endeavorers, let us seek these, using whatever materials or powers we may possess or control. They are the end. Do you have money? Then make it contribute to this high end. Do you have a technique for making money--honestly and justly? Then sanctify it to this holy cause. Money acquired thus and used for this abiding purpose is a blessing beyond compare.

Our Church Men

By John Ray Ewers

"The Brotherhood To-Date"

I regret very much that my article on "System" was printed. It was very untimely, for it was written last November, was set up in December, and was ordered, by me, not to be printed at all. Through some misundersanding in the editor's office it slipped into the issue of a recent number of The Christian Century.

It was untimely because some of the things it suggested are already being worked out by the brotherhood. Foreign missions are being backed by the men, a call for men for the ministry has been sent forth, which has secured an encouraging response, the Comrades of Paul are at work, and other definite things are being developed.

I regret the publication of the article the more because some may feel that I am quarrelling with the present secretaries, while nothing would be further from the truth. Mr. Macfarlane, Mr. Elliott and I are most excellent friends, and during my recent stay in Kansas City we had good times and big arguments together.

That Kansas City office is a busy place. Bushels of letters from all over the country come pouring in asking all sorts of questions and narrating all kinds of successes. Here the magazine is written, and here the secretaries struggle with the problems of organization. Our many men have many minds. We have many tastes. Some of us would be quite content to dine on the bread of missions, the beef of social-betterment and the pure water of temperance, while others want seven courses and all the trimmings. The present policy seems to be to let each man take his platter and walk by the counter and take of whatever strikes his fancy, from soup to pie. No doubt this is the best thing to do until we get the right diet worked out. It is something to have the men hungry. Our men want something, that is sure.

Now the only place for a difference of opinion lies right here: Shall we have many things for our men to do or shall we have only one, or possibly two or three goals at the most? There is place for honest difference of opinion at this point. We have leading men with both ideas, and that the ideas differ does not for one moment imply the straining of friendship. Those desiring the greatest success for the brotherhood movement belong not to any one group or class. No one has a monopoly on the Brotherhood.

There are two or pssibly three fundamental things that we all will do well to remember. First, the Brotherhood movement is a good thing. No sane man can doubt for a moment the advisability of having an organization for men among us. Other communions are making much of their work for men, some in one way and some in another, but all live and wide-awake churches are now catching the spirit of the times, which, as Mr. Ellis says, is expressed in the demand for "unity and masculinity." The awakening of the men is one of the signs of our good times. Not only in the Layman's Missionary Movement, but in many other ways, this masculinity is expressing itself. The day of "benches, babies and bonnets" is passing. Men are now seen in the pews. The first fundamental then is that we must have among us a work for men.

Second, such a movement is inaugurated and we must all get in line. This is no time to stand outside or to hold aloof. Every men's club in every church, no matter what its character, every Bible class of men in every church, every missionary group of men separately organized no matter where, must line up with the present organization. We want all our men together. It means much even to get the men aroused and together. Swing your group into line and if you have any program send it in to the Kansas City office where, I am sure, it will be carefully considered. Line up!

Third, in our love for the Brotherhood we will with patience work and wait for the maturing program. This program must be wrought out in the flaming forge and on the ringing anvil of actual experience. No man nor set of men is wise enough in advance to plan the whole campaign. New curves develop, new situations arise, unexpected turns appear, but the voice of the people is the voice of God, and presently from this mighty throng of men will arise the battle cry. It may be, "The world for Christ in this generation." It may be, "The saloon must go." It may be, as in the French revolution, "Fraternity, Liberty, Equality." No one is wise enough at this present moment to predict the outcome. Let the men get together. Let them sense their power. Let them see the needs. Action will result.

Like Kipling's ship, the Brotherhood will find itself. God will lead the fine, clean brothers of the Christian church into a noble victory, I verily believe. Like the genius of our republic the Brotherhood is now a fashioning spirit. The spirit of the Brotherhood will evolve the constructive, challenging program. Some of us are hard-headed enough to believe that when the thing is evolved it will be tolerably definite, that not more than two or three big objectives will be set before us, but we must wait and work and watch. Just to be a part of the mighty host, just to feel the brotherly love, just to sense the potential energy is a joy at present. And then, things are being done. Many good things in many places are being accomplished. The men are busy, they are in earnest, they will arrive.

Hold these three fundamentals firmly in mind: First, the brotherhood idea is right; second, we should all line up with it; third, we should all toil and think to the end that God's will for the Brotherhood may appear. We will find it as we work.

Deacon Saved the Situation

Dr. Hilary Little Laycock, of Wheeling, at the recent diocesan convention in New York, said of a certain resolution:

"It was, perhaps, unintelligible, like the Wheeling man's prayer.

"This man, praying in meeting, for a brother who lay very ill, cried:

"'Oh, Lord, restore unto us our brother, if it does not interfere with thy perquisites.'

"The situation was saved by a deacon who shouted:

"'Hallalujah, the Lord knows what he means!'"—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Missions and Benevolence

Notes from the Foreign Society

The church at Galesburg, Ill., entered the living link rank February 27, by raising $600. J. A. Barnett is the pastor and splendid leader.

Keep your eye on Connersville, Ind., and their minister, J. C. Burkhart. He is apt to report something good soon.

Last week the Foreign Society received $250 from the estate of E. E. Day, Tiverton, Ohio.

Greater plans and reports come from the missionaries on the Congo, Africa. If we could furnish the funds we could make that a Christian land in a few years.

There is a widespread confidence that there will be a large increase in the receipts for foreign missions during the months of March and April. Words of cheer and confidence come from every quarter.

Last week the Foreign Society received an Annuity gift of $500 from a sister in Ohio. We are making encouraging gains in annuity gifts this year.

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the first five months of the missionary year amounted to $30,510, a gain of $3,072.

F. B. Vennum, Illinois, proposed to give $5,000 for the new mission building in Matanzas, Cuba, upon the condition that $5,000 additional be raised for that purpose. The amount has been secured and the work on the new building will begin at once. Melvin Menges, the missionary, will rejoice.

Secretary F. M. Rains will dedicate the following new churches: Amarillo, Texas, March 20; Fort Worth, Texas, March 27, Roanoke, Va., April 17, and Lexington, Ky., May 8.

Last week the Foreign Society received $5,000 from Frank Coop, England, on the Annuity Plan. This is the second gift from him of that amount. Thirteen years ago he made his first gift on this plan. He is a splendid business man, and knows the value of the Annuity Plan.

The churches in Wheeling, W. Va., expect to send the Foreign Society $1,000 this year.

J. H. O. Smith, Oklahoma City, says: "We are working for a good offering." Last year this church sent us $600. Look out for an increase from that source.

J. C. Archer, Jubbulpore, India, reports that the plague is still raging. He says that it has interfered considerably with the work of the press.

D. E. Dannenburg reports sixty baptisms in the region of Chu Chee, China.

R. D. Moody reports prosperity in Drake Bible College, Tokio.

Prof. Ishikawa, one of the professors in Drake College, Tokio, Japan, who attended the Centennial Convention, has returned to Japan and is now visiting the churches and giving them great inspiration by his addresses.

The missionaries in Japan report that the visit of John L. Brandt and family has been a source of much encouragement and help to them. His preaching has given inspiration and his sympathetic attitude is a source of much encouragement.

An effort is being made by our people in Wichita, Kans., to visit every member of the church and to finally bring them to an annual gift of $5.00 per member for missions. It may not be done this year, but this is the goal for which they are earnestly and prayerfully striving.

G. B. Van Arsdall, minister Central Church, Denver, Colo., is making arrangements for his new living link. This is a decided advance step for this splendid church.

We are doing our best to raise $600 for our March offering.—T. H. McVier, Blackwell, Okla.

We are making every effort to double our missionary offering this coming Lord's Day. I would not be surprised to see $500,000 raised this year.—C. L. Thurgood, Pittsburg, Pa.

The Central Church, Houston, Texas, has set for her task the raising of $2,000 this year for foreign missions, and with God's blessing we will do it.—A. F. Sanderson, minister.

The church at Norman, Okla., was apportioned $20.00. They took their offering February 27, which amounted to $200. H. F. Reed is the minister.

Items from American Missions

Secretary I. N. McCash will deliver the address on the occasion of the annual banquet and meeting of the Disciples' Missionary Union of greater New York. This banquet is to be held in the Broadway Hotel, 673 Broadway, at 7:30 p. m., on Tuesday, March 8.

R. P. McPherson is again located at Dunkirk, N. Y., as the home missionary living link of the Richmond Avenue Church, Buffalo, N. Y.

New living links in the American Society are reported each week. The latest to assure us of their standing in this regard are Johnson City, Tenn., and Warren, Ohio.

The office of The American Christian Missionary Society is being moved from its old quarters in the Y. M. C. A. building to the tenth floor of the Carew building, opposite Fountain Square. For fifteen years or more the society has been in its present quarters. In that time our work has grown to immense proportions and the present quarters have come to be very inadequate. Besides this, the Y. M. C. A. has developed its work until it requires more room than the building affords. We trust the many friends of the Home Society will find us in these new quarters, and that all correspondents will pay attention to the changed address.

The secretaries will soon be in the field in the interest of the May offering. They desire the brethren everywhere to assist them in making their dates. Correspondence and appointments are solicited. If they cannot come, they will send some one else with a message in behalf of American missions.

They are dividing each state into districts and expect through a district manager to get in close relation with every church. The hope is for every congregation to present the claims of American missions and take an offering the first Sunday in May.

Winnipeg, Manitoba, is a mission under the American Society. This is a city of 170,000 population. A. N. Simpson is the successful pastor. This is a most cosmopolitan field. In a membership of sixty-three, our church is divided as folows: Sixteen from the United States, twenty-seven from Ontario, thirteen from England, two from New Brunswick, and five from Prince Edward Island. This city presents a great opportunity for the Disciples of Christ. Our church is planning for a new building.

For the first five months of our missionary year, there is a gain of $1,004.92 in receipts from the Sunday-schools; $1,665.05 from bequests; $9,050 from Annuities, making a gain in grand totals of $10,943.98.

Church Extension Notes

There was never such a period of church building among our mision churches in all our history. During February the following applications have been made for help in the erection of new buildings. The beauty is that these churches want to build up-to-date buildings, equipped for the latest methods in Sunday-school work. Here is the list of applications: Shreveport, La.; Salyersville, Ky.; Miami, Texas; Indiana Avenue Church, South Bend, Ind.; Palouse, Wash.; Bristow, Okla.; Madisonville, Ky.; Eureka, Cal.; Everett, Wash.; Dewey, Okla.; Marietta, Okla.; Ensley, Ala.; Auburn, Neb.; Ozark, Ark.; Shoals, Ind.; Figueroa Church, Los Angeles, Cal.; Ferris, Texas; Corona, Cal.; Eugene, Ore.; Saint Francis, Kan.; Burr Oak, Kan.; El Centro, Cal.; Kerr Mission, Buffalo, N. Y., and Burlington, Colo. It will take at lease $40,000 to answer these appeals.

Since our last report we have the following Annuity gifts: $150 from a friend in Ohio, $200 from another friend in Ohio, $250 from a sister in Des Moines, Iowa, $1,000 from another friend in Iowa, $2,000 from a friend in Illinois, $1,000 from a friend in Minnesota, and $1,000 from a friend in Missouri. George F. Rand of Buffalo, N. Y., has paid recently $750 on his Named Fund which pays him up to and including 1911. These special gifts have greatly assisted us at a time when the churches are not sending much money to the Church Extension Society.

Because the board needed more room our offices have been moved from 500 Waterwork building to 603 New England building. This change of office location should be noted by the friends of Church Extension. The board had its offices in the Waterworks building for twenty-one years. Send all remittances and correspondences to G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., 603 New England building, Kansas City, Mo.

One on the Judge

A newly qualified judge in one of the small towns of Tennessee was trying one of his first criminal cases. The accused was an old darky who was charged with robbing a hen-coop. He had been in court before on a similar charge and was then acquitted.

"Well, Tom," began the judge, "I see you're in trouble again."

"Yes, sah, and when I was in this court the other time, jedge, you was ma lawyer."

"Where is your lawyer this time?" asked the judge.

"I ain't got no lawyer this time," answered Tom. "I's going to tell the truth."—Baltimore American.

Church Life

The church at Colfax, Wash., is without a minister, and is anxious to locate one soon.

W. J. Wright and singer, are now with J. Wilbur Chapman in a meeting at Dayton, Ohio.

O. V. Wilkinson succeeds E. W. Thornton in the pastorate of the Naomi Avenue Church, Los Angeles.

The March offering! Did you take it? Send your report to the office today, for publication next week.

Evangelist Herbert Martin will hold a meeting with the church at Newburg, Ore., some time in March.

Any church not taking the offering the first Sunday in March should lose not a moment in doing so.

Those churches are to be commended which do not judge the success of a meeting simply by number of additions.

The First Church, Lincoln, Neb., is making enthusiastic preparation for the Laymen's Missionary Convention to be held in that city, March 15-17.

The church at Lincoln, Neb., (First) has reorganized its "Aid and Relief Committee" and looks upon this as one of the most important works of the church.

A. L. Chapman, pastor of the church at Boise, Ida., is to lead his congregation in erecting a $35,000 house of worship this summer.

As soon as the cold weather is over the Wayne Street Church, Lima, Ohio, will begin work on their new building, which will cost $30,000.

New building operations are being pushed by the church at Orange, Cal., where C. C. Bentley ministers. All departments of the work are prospering.

The church at Heppner, Ore., has extended a call to A. M. Heldrum, of Pendleton, who will succeed J. P. Conger, who has just resigned at Heppner.

"All members of the church and as many more in the Bible-school, is the word of rrejoicing among the members of the church at Brownsville, Ore.

There have been twenty-four accessions to the church at Carbondale, Ill., where L. E. Chase ministers, during the months of January and February.

In the church at Fort Worth, Texas, where J. E. Dinger is the minister things are moving rapidly. In eleven months there have been 300 accessions at regular services.

Preachers, your church calendars placed in an envelope with a one-cent stamp, help in suggestions as to methods of work, and make the paper interesting to other readers. Send them. It will take but a moment.

T. S. Handsaker, Davenport, Wash., has accepted the position of general secretary of the general benevolent interests of the Northwest. He will make his headquarters at Walla Walla, Wash.

M. W. Harkins, who has recently closed his work with the church at San Jose, Cal., has purchased a home at Palo Alto, and will henceforth make his home in that university city.

Prof. Gray, acting president of Eureka College, delivered an illustrated lecture on the origin and growth of the English Bible, in the First Church, Bloomington, Ill., February 25.

At Nevada, Iowa, Sunday, February 27, was a great day. R. Tibbs Maxey was present to assist the church in raising an indebtedness of $1,800. B. F. Shoemaker is pastor.

The Illinois Christian Educational Association is especially interested in the young people of Illinois. A prominent feature of its work as stated in the Constitution is to solicit students for Eureka College.

E. W. Brickert has just closed a successful meeting in Mooreland, Ind. Though there were but eight accessions to the church the church life has been deepened and is now prepared for a splendid work this year.

At the invitation of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, E. L. Powell, the great preacher of Louisville, made an address at the recent campaign of this movement in Nashville, Tenn.

Mrs. Louise J. Taft, state superintendent of Bible-schools of California, occupied the pulpit of the Centennial Church of San Francisco, Sunday morning, February 27. Prof F. M. Buzick preached in the evening.

The University Church, North Waco, Tex., has just closed a meeting with W. T. Hilton as preacher. The meeting lasted but ten days and there were twenty-four accessions. Seven of the number were confessions by the University students. Colby Hall is the pastor.

"The Kendalls" are to be the helpers in a revival to begin in the First Church, Canton, Ohio, the third Sunday in February. The pastor of the church, Charles Darsie, is in a meeting with the church at Nelsonville, Ohio.

F. M. Rogers, pastor at Long Beach, Cal., has just closed a meeting with home forces which resulted in more than fifty additions to the church. During the meeting Mr. Rogers preached a series of sermons which won universal praise.

Three of the churches of Wabash County, Ind., have joined in calling G. T. Smith of Redkey, Ind., as their pastor. These churches are Roann, Laketon and Bachelor Creek. Mr. Smith began his work the first Sunday in March.

The Alabama state Sunday-school and church convention will be held with the First Church, Mobile, March 23-25. H. B. Robinson is pastor of this church. There were sixteen accessions to the membership of this church during January and February.

Mr. and Mrs. James N. Crutcher are spending the month of March in the Ozark Mountains, where they have gone on account of Mrs. Crutcher's ill health. The church at Sioux City, Iowa has granted Mr. Crutcher a month's leave of absence.

M. G. Buckner, pastor of the church at Owensboro, Ky., is cultivating the missionary spirit of his church most wisely. He has a senior mission study class of fifty members and a junior class of twenty-five members. This sort of work can but yield large and abiding results for the cause of missions.

B. H. Hayden, London, Ontario, has the encouragement of rapid growth in his church. There are accessions to the church at almost every service. The Sunday-school attendance is three times what it was but six months ago. The devotion of the members of the church makes possible a spirit of continuous evangelism in the church work.

Texas Christian University, Waco, has launched a plan for raising $60,000 to clear all indebtedness. The present plant of the school is estimated at $250,000. Under the leadership of Clinton Lockhart Texas Christian University is gradually raising its standards until it now ranks with the best schools among the Disciples.

PLACE YOUR ORDER AT ONCE FOR THE BETHANY GRADED LESSONS. Be Ready for the New Quarter which opens April 3. The supplies you order now will supply your three elementary grades until July 1. Remember, the Bethany Supplies are only for your pupils under twelve years of age. Place the main bulk of your order wherever you wish, but give your younger children the best religious instruction ever put into any Sunday school. Send for our convenient order blank at once. The New Christian Century Co., 700 East Fortieth St., Chicago.

The African Methodist Church of Galesburg, Ill., is negotiating for the purchase of the building of the First Christian Church.

Norman H. Robertson is beginning his fifth year as pastor at Colfax, Ill. The church is prosperous. We take more delight in recording long pastorates than removals.

C. L. Organ, well known for evangelistic work in Iowa, is in a meeting at Ord, Neb. There were thirty accessions the first ten days.

The missionary budget of the East End Church, Pittsburg is about $2,000 per year. The church is planning for an offering of $700 for foreign missions.

The Fifth Ave. church, Grand Rapids, has cleared off a mortgage of $1,600 and has a surplus of $400. This money was raised at the close of a three weeks revival, led by H. A. Sala, pastor, and his brother, O. N. Sala. Within six months the Sunday-school of this church has doubled.

J. M. Gordon, pastor of the church at Wellington, Ohio, resigned his charge February 27, and will remove to a farm which he has purchased near Lynchburg, Va. He will become state evangelist for Virginia. Mr. Gordon has a family of boys who will be given a chance at farm work.

On a recent Sunday the Sunday-school of the First Church, Connersville, Ind., had planned for a great day, having invited all the people of the county to be present. A present was given to each member of the primary department who would bring a new pupil.

William Adams Brown, D. D., LL. D., Professor of Hebrew and cognate languages at Union Theological Seminary will be on the faculty of the Divinity School of the University of Chicago during the Summer Quarter, and will conduct classes on "An Introduction to Christian Theology" and "The Christian Doctrine of God."

The meeting at Central Church, Peoria, Ill., under the leadership of Evangelist W. Harlow continues with over 130 accessions to the church. At the close of the meeting Mr. Harlow will give a lecture to which an admission will be charged, one-half of the proceeds going to the church. W. F. Turner is pastor of the church.

A call has been extended George T. Meeker of Petaluma, by the church at Almeda, Cal., Mr. Meeker has accomplished a good work in Petaluma and the church will not willingly let him go. We have seen no announcement that Mr. Meeker will accept the call to the attractive and important work at Almeda.

H. O. Breeden, who has just removed to California, to make his permanent home there is now in a meeting with A. F. Sanderson, and the church at Houston, Texas. This is Dr. Breeden's second meeting with this church. Following this meeting he will go to Fayetteville, Ark., and then return to the California state convention at Santa Cruz, where he is to be chief speaker this year.

Grant K. Lewis, recently elected secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society spent Sunday, March 1, with the First Church, Warren, Ohio. This great church to which J. E. Lynn has ministered for six years has now raised its yearly pledge for the support of Dr. Osgood in China. In the evening Mr. Lewis spoke at the Second Church, Warren.

T. L. Noblitt has been asked to remain for a third year of service with the church at Guthrie, Okla. A small debt of $800 due on improvements was provided for February 27, and the church now faces the future free from debt. In the past few years this church has built a beautiful new house of worship and installed a new pipe organ.

Stephen E. Fisher, minister of the First Church, Champaign, Ill., recently delivered a Sunday evening address on the cost of living, using comparative tables, based on the prices of food products in different cities of Illinois, as Fisher, Arcola, Mattoon, DeLand, Peoria, Champaign and Chicago. The address won favorable comment from the press in several of the Illinois towns.

A. R. Spicer, Dixon, Ill., has accepted a call to the pastorate of the church at Lawton, Okla., and will begin work in his new field the 20th of March. The church at Dixon has practically selected a successor to Mr. Spicer and his name will be announced in a few days. We are sorry to lose Mr. Spicer from Illinois, but bid him godspeed in his work in Oklahoma.

B. H. Melton, pastor of the church at Manchester, Va., has resigned the pastorate of this church with which he has served for eight years. The resignation is said to be due to the unwillingness of the church to make a needed enlargement of its building sufficient to meet the needs of the growing congregation.. Mr. Melton will remain with the church until the first of June.

Russell F. Thrapp is to continue his remarkably successful pastorate with the church at Jacksonville, Ill., despite the efforts of the First Church, Cedar Rapids to secure his services. Mr. Thrapp has been with the Jacksonville church seven years and has been a leader not only in the church but in the entire life of the community. It is said that in order to get him to remain this church has promised large work for the coming year.

The first Sunday in March was observed as red letter day by the Sunday-school at Canton, Ohio. L. L. Faris, state superintendent for Ohio, C. L. De Pew, superintendent for Illinois, Miss Lillie Faris, junior specialist of Cincinnati, were present to make addresses and conduct a round table on Sunday-school work during the afternoon. Workers from many other schools of the country were present.

The reports of enlargement of church buildings for the needs of growing Sunday-schools, indicate how rapidly the Disciples are increasing the number of their Sunday-school pupils. With this the better schools are demanding more effective teaching. An important equipment for this effective teaching is a graded lesson system. See the announcement of the Bethany Graded Lesson helps for which we are furnishing many schools each week.

J. R. Ewers, pastor of the East End Church, Pittsburg, Pa., announces the following series of sermons for Sunday mornings and evenings leading up to the "Decision" meetings which begin March 27: Morning, "Your Patron Saint," "Our Share of the World," "I Must be Crucified," "The Entrance of the King," "Our Living Lord." Evening, "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," "Leave Us Alone," "The Calling of Dan Matthews," "In Search of a Master," "The Final Step."

With the consent of the board of trustees of the University of Chicago, the Northern Baptist Association will hold its annual convention in the Bartlett Gymnasium at the University of Chicago, May 6 to 13. President Harry Pratt Judson of the University is president of the association this year. Bartlett Gymnasium, one of the great buildings of the University, has a seating capacity of approximately 3,000. The acoustic properties of the great hall are excellent.

V. W. Blair and his Payne Avenue Church, North Tonawanda, N. Y., united with a Baptist church of their community in evangelistic meetings recently. The report is that the fellowship was perfect and there were fourteen confessions and twelve "decisions," more than half of which will unite with the Payne Avenue Church. Out of this coöperative effort plans are forming for more work of this union sort.

There is a repulsion among the ministers of the churches, especially in the cities, against the sensational methods of some evangelists. J. S. Myers, pastor of the Temple Christian Church, Kansas City,, Kans., has just closed a meeting with his home church in which there were fifty additions to the church. The pastor held his own meeting to be sure that no sensational methods would be introduced. A commendable object, and not a bad method.

The Chicago inter-seminary banquet, in which the five theological schools of Chicago joined, was held at the Union Park Congregational Church, Thursday evening, March 3. Chicago is the home of the largest number of theological students of any city in America, and these annual banquets express the richness of the inter-seminary fellowship. The address of welcome was made by Graham Taylor of Chicago Commons, with a response by a member of the faculty of the Lutheran Seminary. The general subject for discussion was 'The Christian Minister and Religious Education." Representatives of the student bodies of the various schools spoke on special themes. Harry F. Burns represented the Divinity School of the University of Chicago.

A. B. Jones and wife, of Liberty, Mo., celebrated their fiftieth wedding anniversary by giving a dinner to the pastor, Robert Graham Frank and Mrs. Frank, the elders of the church and their wives, Monday, February 28. The Christian Century joins in the congratulations received by this happy couple.

Austin Hunter has just closed the first six months of his ministry with the Jackson Boulevard Church, Chicago. In looking over the record of his work we see that in that time there have been sixty-five accessions to the church, almost all at regular services. The Sunday-school is the largest at any time in its history, having an average attendance during the past month of 421, with six organized adult classes. An intermediate Christian Endeavor Society has recently been organized, and now numbers sixty members. It is cheering to hear these good reports from the Mother Church, of Chicago, under her new leadership.

J. M. Rudy, pastor of the church at Greencastle, Ind., is assisting J. C. Todd and the church at Bloomington, Ind., in a meeting which began the last Sunday in February. Some of the subjects of Mr. Rudy's sermons are: "The Fact of Sin," "The Fact of Faith," "The Fact of Confession and Baptism," "The Fact of the Christian Life," or "Can a Church Member be Lost," and "What it Means to be Eternally Lost." This church now has a parish list of more than 2,000 names. Mr. Todd began as pastor of this church less than two years ago and has by statesmanlike administration, and faithful preaching and pastoral work, strengthened the work in every department. It is now one of our great churches, and has the promise of a wonderful future under the guidance of Mr. Todd who has the esteem of all the people of the church and the city.

Ninety days from February 27, John P. Sala will close his pastorate of eight years with the church at Elyria, Ohio. A local paper calls his the most successful pastorate ever held among Elyria's churches. The congregation has grown from a struggling band of one hundred till it now is a great force 600 strong; the Sunday-school has gone from a mere handful to a great bee-hive of activity.

John P. Sala.

An addition to the church to accommodate this work has been built at a cost of $7,000. The work with the young men has been built up to large proportions under Mr. Sala's leadership. Mr. Sala has been alert to every interest of the community, moving among the men of the city in a manly, Christian way. He was especially active in the organization of the chamber of commerce and of a hospital association.

There are many promising conditions to encourage the heart of Pastor H. F. Reed, at Norman, Okla. The last Sunday in February pledges to foreign missions were made to the amount of $200. The church has partially adopted the new station on the Congo, Bonyeka, and is looking forward to the time when it can support its own missionary. But while giving heed to the call of the foreign field this church is not forgetting home interests and is planning to build a new church, which will cost about $2,200. The present building is located poorly, and is not adequate to the growing needs of the church. The church is looking forward to a meeting next fall under the leadership of Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore. Prof. Ohern, of the geological department of the State University, is teacher of a young men's Bible class which numbers forty, mostly students in the university.

W. H. Denison, pastor of the First Christian Church at Huntington, Ind., announces a special series of services at his church, starting Sunday, March 13, and continuing two weeks, closing Easter Sunday, March 27. The pastor and his associates in church work now deem the time ripe for such a meeting and it is believed that a week of services prior to Passion week and the services that week will result in much good for the local church.

As We Go to Press

Wichita, Kan., Mar. 6—The Central Church today made the greatest offering in cash and pledges for foreign missions in its history on the first Sunday in March. We continue Dr. Jaggard as our living link, and a man and wife promise to soon sustain another.—Walter Scott Priest.

Kansas City, Mo., Mar. 6—Thirty-four accessions today. Twelve at Y. M. C. A. meeting. Two hundred and fifty-one in twenty days. Engaged Jack Lewis, a recent convert from comic opera by Clayton Brooks. He has a very fine voice. I have several good singers, abundantly able to assist pastors in great meetings. Churches wanting singers, write me. Will put you in touch with first class song leaders.—Chas. Reign Scoville.

Ord, Neb., Mar. 5—Meeting here three weeks old, with seventy added. Will continue a few more days. We closed at Sac City, Ia., with seventy-nine added. In my three meetings there, we had 237. I am now making meeting dates for next year. Address me, Des Moines, Ia.—C. L. Organ.

Carbondale, Ill., Mar. 6—One confession at morning service. One by statement not previously reported. Two hundred seventy-three in Bible-school and fifty-seven in men's Bible class.—L. E. Chase.

W. D. Dewese, Office Secretary.
Bloomington.

Albert Schwartz, minister at Clinton, goes to Europe in May and the church has given him a vacation for the purpose.

Edward D. Jones, this city, is down with the mumps. He evidently did not live up to his privileges when a boy.

The field secretary will dedicate the new church at Sesser the last Sunday in April.

O. C. Bolman will assist B. H. Cleaver, Lewiston, in a summer meeting.

Charles H. Metcalf, Girard, is president of the fifth district and mayor of his city.

C. C. Wisher, Bellflower, goes to Saybrook and W. D. Deweese will serve the church at Hudson, Sundays only.

The field secretary was present at the ordination of the officers of the Mackinaw church, J. W. Street minister. The service was presided over by G. W. Warner. This church, besides helping support our mission at Henry will loan this minister to us for a meeting. A willing church with a willing preacher makes things come to pass.

A few days were spent with the Martinton church, Clyde L. Lyon minister, in preparation for a great summer meeting. The town is mostly Roman Catholic and the saloon and its spirit prevail but the sign is good for better things.

The places and dates of the district conventions are as follows:

First District, Dixon, June 13-17.
Third District, Rock Island, May 24 26.
Fourth District, Stanford, June 7-9.
Fifth District, Latham, June 14-16.
Sixth District, Danville, June 21-23.
Seventh District,
Ninth District, Carterville, June 26-30.

Jesse H. Story held a fine meeting at Cowden with sixty-four additions. This church was established by our society.

There were twenty-five added to the church at Carbondale during January and February. The average attendance in the Bible-school has increased from 171 to 266, the men's class, taught by the minister, L. E. Chase, has a regular attendance of fifty and there are two other classes of men besides.

Kindly send us news notes of your field. They will look good in the Century.

At Blandinville, C. R. Wolford minister, the Bible-school has increased from seventy-five to 215 since he began work there, and the men's class from an enrollment of seven to 107, and about ninety additions to the church, mostly coming from the Harlow meeting.

The church that has not made an offering to our state service is missing its share of a fine year's work. Come in, brethren.

Frank Thompson, minister of the First Church, Cairo, goes to Palestine in the cpring.

In order to meet the great demand for Sample Copies of the Bethany Graded Lessons the publishers have decided to send out Returnable samples of the complete line of supplies—Beginners', Primary and Junior—(excepting the large Beginners' pictures). Accompanying the samples a bill will be sent for $1.09, the regular price of the set. The recipient may do one of three things: (1) He may return the samples uninjured after examination. (2) He may remit $1.09 and keep the samples. Or (3) he may return the bill with his Sunday school's order for supplies and the publishers will mark it "paid." In writing for sample copies please say "Returnable."

The Great Vincennes Revival

THE PASTOR'S VIEW OF IT.

On Sunday night February 27, the First Christian Church of Vincennes, Ind., closed the greatest revival meeting that was ever held in the history of the city. The meeting lasted six weeks. It was conducted by Evangelist H. E. Wilhite, of Lawrence, Kans., assisted by E. C. Tuckerman as chorus leader and soloist, and Mrs. E. C. Tuckerman as Bible drill instructor and personal worker. The visible results are 523 additions to the church. Not only in numbers was the meeting great, but in its spiritual power. We have never known anything like it in our experience.

More than nine years ago the writer began his labors with the church in this city. During this time the church has held many great meetings. The first one was held by the writer himself while we were still in the old church edifice. It resulted in ninety-three additions to the church. Since we have been in our new house of worship we have held five great meetings. The first one was held by C. A. Young. It resulted in seventy-eight additions to the church. The second one was held by Austin Hunter, which resulted in 131 additions. The third one was held by Allen Wilson, and resulted in 233 additions. The fourth one was held by R. W. Abberly, and resulted in fifty-six additions. The fifth, and greatest, was held by H. E. Wilhite and Mr and Mrs. R. C. Tuckerman. It remains as the greatest of them all. The number of additions, as already stated, reached 523. During the entire meeting there was not a single invitation given at which some one did not come forward. Monday evening following the close of the meeting a reception was given to the new converts. At this reception more than $1,000 was pledged to more perfectly equip the already splendid church edifice. The expense of the meeting was about $600. The free-will offering made to the evangelists for him and his workers amounted to a little over $800.

Mr. Wilhite is still a young man. His boyhood days were spent in Kansas, Florida and California. He received his education in the public schools and in Cotner University. He was married fifteen years ago at Lincoln, Neb., to Miss Ratella Mitchell. For almost nine years after his marriage he labored in pastorates. For the last six years he has been in the evangelistic work. In his work Brother Wilhite is first of all a great reaper. He wields a sharp sickle. He preaches the simple gospel of Christ as it is revealed in the New Testament. He is a wonderful pleader. He fairly draws men out of their seats. His exhortations during the invitation are simply wonderful. Into all of his work he puts a warm heart. His work with us marks an epoch in the history of this church.

Mr. Tuckerman is a rare Christian character. His home is in Chicago, Ill. He has been engaged in evangelistic work for five years. More than three of this has been with Mr. Wilhite. He has a sweet tenor voice. In the meeting he had a very large chorus assisted by an able orchestra. In all of his work there is a deep spiritual frame of mind. We shall always remember him for his good work in our midst.

Mrs. E. C. Tuckerman is a "Poem in Action." Her sweet and loving way of doing things wins for her the hearts of all that come in contact with her. Her work of Bible instruction with the children adds great strength to the meeting. Through the children many parents were won. Her personal work is done with such wisdom and tact that through it many are brought to Christ and none offended. The whole church learned to love her.

During the whole time of the meeting the church worked as one man. The spirit of prayer was the most earnest and most intense that the writer has ever known. The personal work done by the members both outside of the meeting and during the invitation was simply phenomenal. While the evangelist would be pleading, strong men and women all over the house could be seen pleading with the unsaved to give themselves to Christ. We had real pentecostal seasons of grace. God was with us. To Him ultimately belongs all the praise

The church now has a membership of 1,300. It is by far the largest Protestant church in the city. It has a house of worship that when the contemplated improvements are made will easily be worth $30,000. It has a glorious future.

Now after a service of more than nine years of hard and patient labor the writer lays down the pastorate of this great church.

We sometimes have had to sow in tears and wait in patience for the harvest. There have been many sweet experiments and great seasons of grace, but the greatest of all of the ten years has been the great meeting just closed. As we look at it since it is over it seems like a "Miracle of Grace." May God bless both the church and him whom the church shall call to take up the work where the writer lays it down. "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ be with them all."

WILLIAM OSCHGER.

EVANGELIST'S VIEW OF MEETING.

Our great meeting of six weeks' duration has come to a close and I wish to give a brief account of the meeting as I see it and point out the reasons for such a victory in old Vincennes. No one force is responsible for the ingathering of 538 souls in this campaign. I wish to mention some of the influences that brought it about. (1) William Oeschger and his estimable wife have been here ten long years serving this church as pastors. No church in our brotherhood could have been more fortunate in this respect. Brother and Sister Oeschger are in the hearts of this people and their lives have been beacon lights all these years. Brother Oeschger had this meeting on his heart day and night and his study was a prayer chamber, night and day, when he was not out calling or down in the church baptizing. He wrote hundreds of letters, cards, invitations, etc., and never sent out one without literally sheading tears over every one of them. I never worked with a sweeter character in my life. Sister Oeschger has greatly impaired her health working for this great church. These consecrated workers were backed by hundreds of true disciples who had been trained for this meeting by this man of God. The chorus, led by Brother Tuckerman, was simply great; they were faithful from the start and with the orchestra rendered a service that won the admiration of the great audiences. This meeting was backed by a corps of personal workers, hard to excell. They were wise but very enthusiastic. There was not an organization in the church that did not share in the responsibility and deserve credit for a part of the success. The great official board was a leading factor and stood ready to carry out any suggestion offered by either pastor or evangelist. The expense was the last consideration. It was always placed in Pastor Oeschgher's hands and of course well done. There was not a single misunderstanding or unkind word passed between the evangelistic team, pastor or church during all our stay in the city. We simply say briefly, The Spirit was Christlike on the part of the pastor and church and the evangelists could not help being pleased. This is certainly Vincennes' greatest meeting from point of numbers and class of material secured could not well be better. Much wealth and social standing material that will greatly bless the church in the future has come into the church to be consecrated to the Christ. It is deeply regretted by the church that Brother Oeschger had resigned before this meeting began and he refuses to reconsider, feeling it will be better for all concerned that it remain as it is. I wish to say that I will always love Brother and Sister Oeschger and the Vincennes Church.

H. E. WILHITE.

Honoring God's Faithful Servants

On Monday evening, February 28, at the River Street Church of Christ, Troy, N. Y., a farewell reception was tendered by the church to Dr. and Mrs. R. E. Belding on the eve of their departure for their new home at Keuka Park, N. Y. For forty years, Doctor and Mrs. Belding have been members and faithful servants of this congregation. Mrs. Belding has served as president of the C. W. B. M., superintendent of the Junior Endeavor Society, teacher of a large ladies' Bible class and president of the Ladies' Aid Society. In addition to all this, she has been a most active member of the Christian Endeavor Society. Doctor Belding has been an elder, church clerk, choir master and teacher of a mixed Bible class. In all of these offices they have ever been efficient, faithful and self-denying. Their loss will be keenly felt by us. The only consolation we have is that what will be our loss will be Keuka's gain. As a token of esteem, the congregation presented Doctor and Mrs. Belding with a purse containing gold. It will take us a long time to get used to the absence of these two faithful servants of God and men.

March 2, 1910. CECIL J. ARMSTRONG.

Peoria, Ill., Meeting

The Central Church at Peoria, Illinois, has just concluded a most successful meeting. It began January 30 and closed March 2. There were 168 additions as follows: By letter, fifteen, by statement thirty-seven, from other religious bodies, thirty-eight, (of whom twenty-five were immersed), and seventy-seven by confession of faith. 115 were a net gain to our cause. The attendance was large throughout, many times the building being packed, gallery and all. There was never an invitation without a response and there were fourteen the last invitation. This is probably the largest ingathering in the forty-four years' history of the church. W. E. Harlow of Springfield, Mo., and F. F. Dawdy of Topeka, Kans., were our evangelists. Both are well known. Brother Harlow is one of the sanest and ablest preachers in our ranks. He uses no sensational methods. His strength is as a teacher. One of his meetings is almost equal to a course in a Bible college. He gave drills on Bible study and used the question box freely. His lectures on the new thought have created a tremendous interest. Twice he addressed the Ministerial Association on that theme. A Sunday afternoon address on,

GRADE YOUR SCHOOL
On the Installment Plan!

Every informed Sunday-school worker desires to have the graded system introduced into his school. But it seems like too big an undertaking to grade the school all at once. Hence nothing at all is done, and the school goes on in the same old absurd way of teaching the children the lessons provided for grown-up people.

The International S. S. Committee has made it possible to bring the graded system in, like the Kingdom of God comes, "without observation." You can have your school graded without any agony—almost without knowing it, except in its beneficent results. Begin at the bottom now—with the elementary grades, the pupils under twelve years old. Provide teachers and pupils with the Bethany Graded Lessons, based on the outlines already authorized by the International Committee. Later on—perhaps in nine months or a year from now—when the Committee authorizes an outline of lessons for the Intermediate grades you will be ready to adopt them and the Bethany Series will be ready with the helps for you. And so on, through the Senior and Advanced grades, follow the International Committee and as fast as they provide the lessons you will be ready to adopt them.

Our advice to all schools, then, is: FOLLOW THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE. No independent course yet devised is better than that provided by the International Committee, if indeed there is one so good in all respects. Besides, there is advantage in the whole Sunday-school world studying together when our leaders really lead—as the International Committee is now doing.

The Bethany Graded Lessons may be commenced at any time. Purchase the main bulk of your supplies wherever you wish, but let us furnish you these fascinating lessons for your pupils under twelve. THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO., 700 East Fortieth Street, Chicago.

Books You Need

We offer some of the most timely and vital books now appearing among the Disciples of Christ. You need every one of this splendid list.

OUR CENTENNIAL BOOK.

"Historical Documents Advocating Christian Union."—Edited by C. A. Young.

This book is the classic for this our Centennial year. It contains Thomas Campbell's "Declaration and Address"; Alexander Campbell's "Sermon on the Law"; Barton W. Stone's "Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery"; Isaac Errett's "Our Position"; J. H. Garrison's "The World's Need of Our Plea." Beautifully illustrated. Retail price, $1.00. No one should allow the Centennial to pass without possessing this book.

Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Ind., a preacher of national reputation, writes:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the Land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

Basic Truths of the Christian Faith, by Herbert L. Willett, author of The Ruling Quality, Teaching of the Books, Prophets of Israel, etc., etc. Post 8vo., cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75 cents, paper 25 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. It holds the reader's fascinated attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished.

J. E. Chase writes:

"It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of truer life, possible only to him who has tarried prayerfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teachers."

Our Plea for Union and the Present Crisis, by Herbert L. Willett, author of "The Life and Teachings of Jesus," etc., etc. 12mo., cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50 cents.

Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially real now may come to fruition that these chapters are given their present form."

Every Disciple of Christ will be interested in getting from his own pen the teachings of Professor Willett. No fair man will consent to judge him on the basis of newspaper reports. These books should be in every one's possession just now.

ERRETT GATES' ILLUMINATING WORK.

"The Early Relation and Separation of Baptists and Disciples."

This is the theme of the hour. Dr. Gates has put into our hand the historic facts with a grace and charm that makes them read like a novel. In cloth, 75c. Paper binding, 25c.

"We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature."—THE CHRISTIAN WORKER, PITTSBURG, PA.

"The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches."—THE CONGREGATIONALIST, BOSTON, MASS.

JUDGE SCOFIELD'S FASCINATING TALE.

"Altar Stairs."

An ideal gift book. Beautifully bound and illustrated. Price, $1.20.

Address,

The New Christian Century Co.

235 E. 40th St., Chicago.

"The Emmanuel Movement" packed the building. A pay lecture on "How to live one hundred years" with 500 tickets was sold out before the doors were opened.

This church has recently lost several members to Christian Science. Brother Harlow's work is the true antidote. He shows how we may receive physical healing without accepting a false religion. His little book on "Mental and Moral Therapeutics" is worth its weight in gold.

Only those who are acquainted with the conditions in Peoria can know what this meeting means to our cause. It is a great whisky center to begin with. Catholic influence is strong. The protestant churches have been weak and halting. The leading pastor here said he was tremendously interested to see if we could actually get an audience. The church has a new vision. With Howett St. Church self-supporting and a new lot purchased on the west bluff for our third church we thank God and take courage.

W. F. TURNER, Pastor.

Campaign at Elkhart, Indiana

Our meeting here has just closed with 110 additions, about ninety adults. Considering that northern Indiana is not natural Disciple territory this is a truly grreat meeting and beyond all comparison the best meeting ever held in the Christian Church at Elkhart. There had not been a successful revival in any church in the city for eight years. There had been additions to the church every Sunday for four months preceding the meeting. Including those who came in during the meetings there have been 200 additions in the past twelve months. The Bible-school has grown in twenty-one months from an attendance of 350 with a men's brotherhood class of over 100 enrollment and an average attendance of better than fifty. Charles E. Varney with his chautauqua style of delivery, his ready wit, attractive personality, trueness to the truth, won for himself an admiring hearing both in and out of the church. His especial force was at the Sunday afternoon theater meetings for men (which have been conducted by our brotherhood for five months). Mrs. Varney is sure to become admired and loved as her work becomes known. She was a large factor in the success of the meeting, especially in her great mass meetings for women. O. J. Marks grew in popularity with every day of the meeting. He is splendid as a leader of song and one of the best personal workers I ever knew.

R. O. Wickham was ordained for the ministry. He comes from the Lutheran Church. Another young man who came in during the meetings is to enter the ministry.

S. GRIFFITH BUCKNER, Pastor.

Miles Ave., Cleveland

W. G. Charlton of Hillsburg, Ontario, Canada, has just closed one of the most successful meetings in the history of the Miles Avenue Christian Church. There were sixty-six additions and we feel many more will follow as a definite result of the series. Brother Charlton is a man of great power and personality. His sermons are thoughtful and convincing. Men and women came miles on foot when the storm tied up all car lines rather than miss a service. We have been greatly strengthened and built up as a church by a new vision of the old plea.

Our work in every department is going on splendidly, and we hope our seventh year with this church may be better in every particular than any former. Our Bible-school had an average attendance of over 400, and has seven adult classes organized.

T. ALFRED FLEMING, Pastor.

Indiana District and State Conventions

The season for district and state conventions in Indiana is at hand. The outlook is more hopeful than any we have ever known. The dictrict convention programs are filled with the spirit of hope, enthusiasm and a determination for greater things. As Wendell Phillips says, "Our secretaries seem to feel that to be as good as our fathers, we must be better." This surely is true and we are confident that with a century's experience behind us, it will be easy to so lay our plans and prosecute the work, as to make the present century far outstrip the past. If not in numbers, at least in the strengthening of all branches of church life within our own communions and the leavening of those communions about us with the spirit of Christian union for world-wide evangelism.

District conventions begin in the First at South Bend with a splendid program. The same can be said of the program of each of the thirteen other conventions. A schedule of dates and places for the conventions is as follows:

State convention at Anderson, May 16 to 19, promises to be a glorious climax to the district conventions. Although we are disappointed because of the removal of Brother Grafton from this splendid field, yet, committees are being appointed, and local plans are being made for a large and enthusiastic convention. We are encouraged to believe that a worthy successor to Brother Grafton will be on the field with reins in hand when the convention is called. The local church will furnish lodging and breakfast and elaborate preparations will be made for luncheons and dinners at reasonable prices. The promises of those intending to attend the convention are numerous enough already to make the convention one of the greatest held in the state for years. Keep your eye on Anderson, May 16 to 19.

Schedule of Convention Dates.

First, South Bend, March 22 and 23.
Second, Valparaiso, March 24 and 25.
Third, Colfax, March 29 and 30.
Fourth, Tipton, March 31 and April 1.
Fifth, Fort Wayne, April 5 and 6.
Sixth, Hartford City, April 7 and 8.
Seventh, Noblesville, April 12 and 13.
Eighth, Brazil, April 14 and 15.
Ninth, Greenwood, April 19 20.
Tenth, Connersville, April 21 and 22.

Indiana Southern Ministerial Institute Meets with Congress of Disciples

After a careful consideration it was thought best by the officers of the Southern Indiana Ministerial Institute, not to carry out the Institute program which it had decided upon some time ago and which was to have been held on March 15, 16 and 17, at Vincennes, Indiana. The officers came to this conclusion for the reason that the National Congress of the Disciples is to be held at Bloomington, Indiana on March 29, 30, and 31. All the ministers of Southern Indiana are urged to attend the Congress at Bloomington. A business meeting will be held at that Congress of the Southern Indiana Ministers to elect officers for the Institute for years 1910 and 1911. The Congress Program at Bloomington is an exceptionally strong one. Every minister in Southern Indiana should avail himself of the opportunity of attending this Congress.

The Bethany Graded Sunday-School Lessons

Will the new Graded lessons make their way into the Sunday-schools and become the standard lessons of the Sunday-schools of the world as the Uniform lessons have done? There are many signs indicating that this is precisely what will happen.

1. All the authorities in religious pedagogy have been a long time agreed that it is better to suit the lesson to the learner than to compel the learner to adapt himself to the lesson, regardless of his stage of mental development.

2. The International Committee which has for thirty-five years selected the Uniform lessons has now begun the issue of an additional series called the International Graded Course, consisting, not of one Scripture lesson for the entire school, but of a separate series of lessons for each year or grade, chosen with direct reference to the age and ability of the pupils.

3. These lessons are being adopted by the best schools of all denominations. The Presbyterians report that about two thousand of their schools adopted the International Graded courses for children under twelve years, last quarter. This is phenomenal. The Methodists and Congregationalists had to go to press the second and third time to supply the unexpected demand for the graded lessons.

The New Christian Century Co. is supplying these lessons to the Disciples' schools. There is no single achievement in which the publishers of this paper take greater satisfaction than in connecting our schools with this most significant Sunday-school advance of the last fifty years.

The editors of The Christian Century, Mr. Morrison and Professor Willett, both regard the Graded principle as essential to the highest efficiency in religious instruction, and both believe that the Bethany Series is the truest, simplest and most artistic set of supplies for the elementary grades that has ever been put out.

Our pleasure in offering the Bethany Graded Lessons to the brotherhood is enhanced by the fact that our orders for supplies for the winter quarter have been much beyond our expectations. Many other schools have assured us of their purpose to adopt The Bethany Lessons at once. This series may be begun at any time. See full description on another page.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Volume XXVII. March 17, 1910. Number 11

UNITY

"Forgive, O Lord, our severing ways,
The separate altars that we raise,
The varying tongues that speak Thy praise!

Suffice it now. In time to be
Shall one great temple rise to Thee,
Thy church our broad humanity.

White flowers of love its walls shall climb,
Sweet bells of peace shall ring its chime,
Its days shall all be holy time.

The hymn, long sought, shall then be heard,
The music of the world's accord,
Confessing Christ, the inward word!

That song shall dwell from shore to shore,
One faith, one love, one hope restore
The seamless garb that Jesus wore!"

Anglo-American Conference on Christian Union

Preliminary Notice.

The English committee recommend the following for the proposed conference to England next summer, which was specially commended by resolution at Pittsburg.

1. The date, July 4 and 5.
2. The place, Caxton Hall, Westminster, London.
3. The name, "Anglo-American Conference on Christian Union," promoted by the Disciples of Christ.
4. Two sessions to be held each day, with two speakers at each session, one Englishman and one American. Prominent men are being approached as chairmen and some of the leading English preachers are being asked to speak.
5. The following phases of the subject to be considered:

I. Necessity:
   1. "Christian Union in the Light of the World's Need."
   2. "The demand for Christian Union by the Essence of Christianity."

II. Accomplishments:
   1. "By Inter and Undenominational Agencies."
   2. "Steps Taken Toward Actual Union."

III. Bases:
   Two addresses.

IV. Outlook:
   1. "The Difficulties and Their Removal."
   2. "The Consummation."

It is hoped that all American Disciples who may be coming to or passing through England this summer will endeavor to be in London on July 4 and 5, and attend this conference. There could be no better way to spend "the fourth."

In behalf of the committee I remain, yours faithfully, LESLIE W. MORGAN.

The Bethany Graded Sunday-School Lessons

Will the new Graded lessons make their way into the Sunday-schools and become the standard lessons of the Sunday-schools of the world as the Uniform lessons have done? There are many signs indicating that this is precisely what will happen.

1. All the authorities in religious pedagogy have been a long time agreed that it is better to suit the lesson to the learner than to compel the learner to adapt himself to the lesson, regardless of his stage of mental development.

2. The International Committee which has for thirty-five years selected the Uniform lessons has now begun the issue of an additional series called the International Graded Course, consisting, not of one Scripture lesson for the entire school, but of a separate series of lessons for each year or grade, chosen with direct reference to the age and ability of the pupils.

3. These lessons are being adopted by the best schools of all denominations. The Presbyterians report that about two thousand of their schools adopted the International Graded courses for children under twelve years, last quarter. This is phenomenal. The Methodists and Congregationalists had to go to press the second and third time to supply the unexpected demand for the graded lessons.

The New Christian Century Co. is supplying these lessons to the Disciples' schools. There is no single achievement in which the publishers of this paper take greater satisfaction than in connecting our schools with this most significant Sunday-school advance of the last fifty years.

The editors of The Christian Century, Mr. Morrison and Professor Willett, both regard the Graded principle as essential to the highest efficiency in religious instruction, and both believe that the Bethany Series is the truest, simplest and most artistic set of supplies for the elementary grades that has ever been put out.

Our pleasure in offering the Bethany Graded Lessons to the brotherhood is enhanced by the fact that our orders for supplies for the winter quarter have been much beyond our expectations. Many other schools have assured us of their purpose to adopt The Bethany Lessons at once. This series may be begun at any time. See full description on another page.

Back From Death

A Further Study of Jesus' Miracles

Probably the most impressive acts of Jesus' life, so far as the records of the New Testament tell the story, were those connected with the return of two or three human beings from the border land of the unseen world. Such unaccountable incidents, whose report went out in the early Christian communities and took form in the literature of the early church, seemed clearly beyond the range of any human experience. They were the most marvelous manifestations of the life of God with which Jesus was so abundantly dowered.

To be sure there had been traditions of earlier events of similar character. The story of Enoch who "walked with God and was not, for God took him," gradually became the narrative of a mysterious escape from the universal law of death, and by the later Jewish community was interpreted as a translation directly into the heavenly life. Similarly the disappearance of Elijah from the companionship of the younger prophets was described in terms which left no question in the thought of later chroniclers that he too had been lifted by divine power from the levels of common human weakness to the glories of the kingdom of God.

There are three events in Jesus' life which at first seem to fall under the category of the recall of the dead to life. The first of these is the revival of the daughter of Jairus, an official of one of the synagogues in Capernaum. Jesus was summoned to the home of this man, and there found a child of perhaps twelve years lying apparently dead. In the almost reckless haste which characterizes oriental preparations for interment and which opens up tragic possibilities of premature burial, the professional mourners had been assembled and the house given over to the wild tumult of grief so characteristic of an emotional people. In such moments those who are really the victims of the tragedy are handed over almost instantly to such professional supervision and advice as makes them really passive witnesses of the pageant of death.

It has been the custom to describe this event as the raising of the girl from death. Perhaps this tendency has resulted from the wish to make the work of Jesus as marvelous as possible. His words regarding her condition are usually supposed to be figurative, and intended only to reassure the despairing parents that their child was not beyond recall. But the simple testimony of the Gospel is in favor of another view. All those who stood about believed the child was dead. Jesus knew otherwise, and his words need no labored explanation, for he said, "She is not dead but sleeps." The phenomena of trance or coma is too common not to explain fully the situation so frankly and completely defined by Jesus himself. His task was that of arousal. From the deep sleep, which might easily have shaded downward into death itself, he called her back with the same voice of authority and calmness that had spoken reassurance to a multitude of the sick and the distressed. "Maiden, I say unto thee arise," was his simple word. And she wakened from her sleep and rose before them.

The second instance is one in which this explanation of resuscitation rather than recall from actual death is less probable and convincing, though not without some value. The Jew of that period shared the general Semitic conviction that the human body became at the instant of death the tenement and prey of evil spirits, whose power was so malign and whose wrath was so easily awakened that all possible contact with the dead was to be avoided in the interest of personal safety. For this reason the later law had built up a hedge of ceremonial protection against contact with a corpse. It was the invariable custom to bury the dead upon the very day of their decease. The shrieks that announced the passing of a member of a household were followed in an incredibly short time with the hasty preparation for burial, and the procession wended its way to the neighboring place of interment before the setting of the sun.

We do not like to dwell upon the possibility that the young man whose funeral cortege Jesus met as he entered the little town, was actually still living. But assuming the death of the youth as certain, we may well link it at once with the unmistakable case of Lazarus.

In studying the recall of Lazarus, and probably also that of the young man at Nain, it is natural that we should ask how far human skill and love may go in the restraining of death in its approach, or in recalling the spirit from its imminent departure from the body. Life on the physical plane is merely the complex of powers that resist death and decay. But we are conscious, even after merely superficial examination of facts, that different people are equipped with different degrees of power to restrain death and hold life intact in the cases of those committed to their care.

Let us suppose the case of a child or adult desperately ill. We know how many chances there are in the battle between life and death. Any helpful ministry thrown into the balance on the side of life will not be without its effect. Suppose by the side of the sick there is a totally unskilled and indifferent person. No doubt something could be done even in that poor case. At least much more could be achieved than if the sick man were left to fight his battle alone. But suppose that attendant is the nearest of kin, where all the emotional nature is aroused to stay the tide of ebbing life. No one would say that much more could be accomplished in this instance than the former. Suppose again that this attendant were a trained physician, with all the powers of the medical art at his disposal. Would not the frontier of possible recall be measurably widened? For medical skill may accomplish that which no personal interest can achieve. Suppose, lastly, that in the attendant there were combined all the powers that the highest skill of a physicion could furnish and in addition all the personal affection of a brother. How that frontier would still further be pushed out!

Now look, once more, at the life of Christ with its seemingly perfect mastery of the laws of life, though this mastery is gained by no mere technical study. And add to that, the overwhelming human sympathy and love which the life of the Son of God revealed in such amazing manner. When you have taken life thus at its highest terms, who shall venture to say where the boundaries of recall from death actually lie? A moment, an hour, five hours, such an interval as might spell out the total measure of ordinary human power to combat death, seems but a small limit to set before him who knew life as none of us have ever known, and who loved humanity with a passion such as even kinship and brotherhood have never reached.

Our candles are very short and soon burn to darkness as we walk with Jesus along this mysterious pathway of his power, but we know that when we attempt to explain his marvelous works by some mere term like " miracle" or "supernatural," we only cheat our own souls, because we are always longing to enter more fully into his life and to discern, if possible, at least the direction in which he goes, even if we can follow him but a very little way.

But the true miracle of recall from death is not that of the maiden in Capernaum, nor the youth at Nain, nor the friend at Bethany. It is rather the story of any individual life that has been summoned by the strong Son of God from the death of passion, of pride, of prayerlessness, to the real life of fellowship, purity and consecration. This is the marvel that goes on before our eyes, and even, if we will, within our own natures day by day. It widens its sweep to whole communities that are recalled from unsocial and unneighborly conduct to high ideals and reconstruction of life. And most wonderfully of all it appears in nations that lay yesterday in the shadow of death and have been recalled to life and power. Truly, the Master is still summoned to the awakening of the dead: he still stops and turns back the procession that goes despairingly to the grave of buried hopes; he still stands by the side of the sepulchre of humanity and calls as only he can call, "Lazarus, come forth."

The Tin Tariff and Wages

A tariff was put on tin in order to build up an American industry and give more employment. It built up the industry and it is today completely monopolized by a powerful trust. Ten years ago the men who worked in the tin mills received $2.16 per day, eight hours for a day's work, and six days per week. Today they work twelve hours per day, seven days per week, with a double shift every two weeks, i. e., an all day and all night shift, of twenty-four hours straight work, and they get $1.68 per day for it. This condition affects 14,000 men. Let us grant that it was a good thing to build up a new American industry—does it follow that we must "stand pat" for a device that brings such a wicked perversion of its reason for being? Living has gone up one-half, but the wage has decreased nearly 20 per cent. Is it ever defensible to work men twelve hours per day for virtually fifteen days every two weeks? Can it be called even a "living condition," let alone a just living condition, when they have to do it on $1.68 per day? If it is wise and lawful to interfere in the natural course of trade with a tariff for the sake of building up an industry that could not be built up without the artificial conditions thus created, is it less wise and lawful to interfere by that same power to prevent those same conditions from working men more than one-half all their living hours for less than half what any man can support himself and family upon in decency and comfort? In other words, if we can make a tariff for the purpose of creating wages and profits, why cannot we make something else that will prevent "profit" from taking most of the wages? Or else, why cannot we take off the tariff that has first made wages then afterwards made a monopoly so powerful and godless that it grinds the faces of the poor? Such an issue is not merely economic, it is moral.

Politics and Statesmanship

"Laws are like cobwebs that entangle the weak, but are broken by the strong," said Solon. So it is when laws are compromises with principles and gifts to privilege. When bills are introduced that bring powerful lobbies to the legislative halls with no pretense of public good but avowedly for private purpose, danger lies in the way. When bills are passed by strict party vote and with the bias that is undeniably for party ends, statecraft goes down before "spoils of office." When legislation becomes a checker board to play the game of political preferment, men are little less than traitors for they trade the welfare of all the people for the advantage of themselves. We have in our legislative halls too many of what Tallyrand called "mud in silk stockings." It has ever been so, but it does not have to ever be so. There have been statesmen in every time, but fewest in times of great prosperity. When Queen Elizabeth asked Speaker Popham what had passed in Parliament, he replied "seven weeks." So of our Congress. About all that has passed is twice the seven weeks. The Illinois Legislature in its extraordinary session bungled practically every bill it was called upon to consider, and passed perversions of what the demands required in most of those that became laws. Political quarrels held the focus of attention and legitimate business was but a stalking horse for factional contests. Gov. Deneen has tried to play politics by the most decent methods, but his error has been in playing politics at all. By that much he has missed his opportunity in these days when the bold stroke and an appeal to the people that was so plain and marked that its honesty could not be mistaken, would have put him in control and brought about legislation so effective that he might have been the redeemer of his state from the columns of the more notorious among the legislative failures of the union. A politician does things with reference to himself and his party. A statesman does things with reference only to the good of the commonwealth.

The Penalty of Good Times

We all welcome good times. But they have their dangers and carry their penalties. Good times always brings speculation and are liable to end with a panic that falls most hard upon the poor. We are moving slowly towards an economic adjustment that will prevent an inflated prosperity and the deflation that brings panic. George Washington spoke of his own times, but he might have been describing ours when he said, "Speculation, peculation, and an insatiable thirst for riches seem to have gotten the better of every other consideration and almost every order of men. Party disputes and personal quarrels are the great business of the day, while the momentous concerns of an empire are of but secondary consideration and are postponed from week to week."

And so in our times our legislative halls are the centers of party interest more than of the interests of the commonweal. Special interests clamor for protection and acts that will inure to the benefit of their schemes. The seeking of riches runs riot in our society. Mothers teach their daughters to look for none but rich marriages and fathers their sons that no occupation is worthy but that promising wealth. And yet all know of the folly of it in the end. When Jesus warned so severely against the evil in wealth seeking and the abuse of riches gained, he knew human nature and but sought to forefend against its greatest temptation. Not great wealth nor great poverty, but a plenty for all and a chance for each to have enough, makes the golden age.

A Working Program at Westminster

American newspaper dispatches, especially the headline information, has been of the sensational rather than of the news type since the convening of the new Parliament at Westminster. One would think the Asquith ministry was standing on a precipice with the antagonistic elements deterred only by mercy from pushing them to a fatal plunge. Real news from the scene of action does not so read. Of course the Labor and Nationalist parties have used every opportunity to impress the government with their ability to undo the situation, but the fact remains that they are neither one anxious in the least for the election it would bring. They have everything to gain from a strong working coalition with the present ministry and everything to lose from a chance of a defeat of the Liberals in another election.

The coalition has arrived at a working program. It is a victory for the Nationalist, Labor and more radical Liberals, who demanded the passing of a resolution abrogating the lord's veto before presenting the Budget. If the Budget were presented first the lords would pass it quickly on the excuse that the election was a referendum in which the electorate declared for the Budget. Then there would be a strong stand against the veto resolution. As it is they must face the resolution first and accept the verdict of the electorate as to their own powers or refuse to abide by it and see the King forced to either compel their acquiescence or allow an appeal to the country on that single proposition, with no finances provided for running the government. The radical elements proceed on the theory that no progressive legislation can be enacted until the veto of the lords is annulled. It looks as if the ministry had the lords on the hip, and there is certainly enough to hold the coalition together until the veto is taken from them, unless the King risks all to side with the lords. Edward holds the balance, but risks much to the crown if he upholds the upper house.

The War of Labor

Philadelphia is in the throes of a labor war at this writing. A strike is a form of war. Therefore let men beware of condemning strike violence unless they condemn war and are willing to seek means of peace for adjustment of differences that cannot be adjusted by the parties to the contention. When a nation cannot get what it deems is justice by any other means, it fights by that last resort, an appeal to physical force. When a labor union or an employer cannot get what they deem their rights by any other method they appeal to the same court of last resort. The employer may make his appeal with less brutal or spectacular use of force, but nevertheless that is just what he does when he summarily discharges men with no reference to their future employment, or blacklists them until finding employment is impossible. The employe is handicapped because he has no such powers and because he has no legal protection for the working asset invested in his skill and brawn, while the employer has legal protection for his investment in property.

Whatever may be at stake in Philadelphia, the final contention is for the recognition of the union of the employes. The company is charged with discriminating against union men and with a determination to break up the union. The men ask 25c per hour and recognition of the union. Both claims are certainly just. It is archaic in this age for corporations, powerful unions of capital, to deny the recognition of unions, powerful corporations of labor.

Violence marks the strike as much because of the overt and arbitrary acts of the company assisted by the mayor, their personally made mayor, who contends against any arbitration of the difficulties. He refused to allow busses for the carrying of the public to work. The strikers refuse to allow cars for the same purpose. He refuses to allow arbitration, always the appeal of justice, that industry may proceed unhampered and the men call out fellow workers in sympathetic strike. The effect is the same in both cases. Neither are just within themselves, both are acts of war, and no act of war is ever civilly just. There have been several deaths and many injured, but most of the fatalities and injuries have been inflicted by police and strike breakers, while the strikers have destroyed much of the property of the "enemy." The traction company have a property franchise to the use of the public streets of the city and receive police protection in the execution of their property right. The men have a moral right to a living wage and the privilege of co-operating as fellow workers, but there is no protection for them aside from the brawn of their strong arms, and so they oppose police force with personal force. It is war. Every day there are skirmishes and battles. So long as corporations can elect mayors the power of police will be a reserve force for their side. When labor unions elect mayors they will claim the same power. Neither should elect mayors, but all the people should arise to stop civil war on the streets of our cities and protect themselves and give justice to every cause of labor or capital by creating and enforcing arbitration laws.

The real fight in Philadelphia today is not for a certain wage nor for recognition of the union, but for the right to have a grievance arbitrated. This the mayor and the company refuse to grant, and for this the employes and their sympathizing fellow workers are fighting. The men have presented a claim. The company refuses to recognize it. The men ask for an arbitration of their difference. The company refuses to arbitrate. The men fight to compel the company and the administration to submit to arbitration. The company, backed by their personally elected mayor, fight to win their contention, refusing to arbitrate.

The Tyranny of the Labor Union

Men like Post of "Postum" fame spend thousands on what their very highly individuated persons think is a menace to the welfare of the country. They see the country through their own close-visioned glasses and so, of course, that which does not accord with their personal interests looks threatening to the country. As kings always fought the franchise of the people and lords the common councils of the public, so men like the Battle Creek knight fight the idea of allowing those who work for them to co-operate for their common welfare. These gentlemen are finely caparisoned. They know the art of advertising and just how much the dollar means to the ordinary publisher. They know that the advertising columns often draw lines about the editorial sanctum and forbid the consideration of themes that might be unpalatable to the advertiser. Religious journals are always sought by causes that need the bolstering of good company. Patent medicines and every other doubtful business seeks their columns. And so Mr. Post buys space to fight the labor union.

No man who is intelligent to the real situation is misled by his skillful evasion of the real issue when he states the issue as he sees it. He puts the part for the whole and condemns unionism in the apparent effort to condemn "bad unions" and especially the American Federation of Labor. If his cause was just he would not need to buy his space. We do not condemn religious papers for listing his advertisements, but they should not become apparent parties to his arguments. They should comment upon them and help their less tutored readers to discriminate. Mr. Post is not wholly wrong. There are tyrannical unions just as there are tyrannical employers. But the tyranny of some unions does not condemn unionism any more than the tyranny of some employers condemns capital. Here is an instance of tyranny in unions. It is but one of many that might be cited. But it argues against the abuse of a good thing only and not against the thing that is abused.

The lathers of Chicago have a strong union. There are only about 800 lathers in it and they do not allow much of an increase because that would make their services less demanded and weaken their ability to name their own wages. Lathing is not a specially skilled trade. Almost any one can learn to nail on lath in an acceptable manner in a few weeks. Consequently it does not draw the most intelligent labor and there are many objectionable characters in its ranks. They are now getting $5.20 per day, more than carpenters and as much as plasterers, both skilled trades. They have a charter and are members of the trades council, so the rules forbid union men from working with any but union lathers. This is their club and they have so abused it by their present strike for a raise in wages that they may be expelled from the council.

Here is a case of tyranny. The men are receiving much better wages than their fellow workmen, yet they use the cause of co-operation to strike for an unjust wage, tying up the employment of carpenters and plasterers and bringing loss to the builders for the sake of their selfishness and by their arbitrary abuse of a chance power. They forbid union lathers from other cities coming to Chicago and give them two days' work to insure them money to leave the city.

Here is where unionism should defend itself. Its cause is good so long as it is that of a just wage, fair working conditions, and the ultimate readjustment of profits so that labor will get its share of the surplus. But it must have public sympathy to win. It will get public sympathy by fairness and by consideration of public welfare along with that of its own special welfare.

Temperance Notes

Since January 1, unmarked packages of liquor cannot be shipped from one state into another. The package must be marked just what it is and must carry the name of the actual consignee. If a toper in "dry" territory wants a bottle he must be shameless enough to take it out marked plainly and over his own name.

The United Brewers' Association reports a slump of sales in beer in Ohio for the last year of 342,875 barrels. Does prohibition increase the sale of beer?

Senator Bankhead of Alabama, who opposed the proposed amendment, says, "the people who defeated the amendment are just as strongly against a return of the saloon as those who favored it."

Let those who comment upon the recent "defeat of prohibition" in Alabama remember that much of the opposition was ardent in its opposition to saloons in the state.

During the recent and prolonged strike in Sweden all grog shops were closed. It was an absolutely peaceful strike. It has created a demand for no saloons.

The English drink bill decreased last year by $29,000,000. Lloyd-George estimated that under the increased duties there would be a revenue of $8,000,000, but it turns out to be one-half that sum. The estimated reduction in spirits consumed is 18,000,000 gallons. He thinks there will be a permanent reduction of 20 per cent and rejoices in it.

It Is Glory Enough

By William Herbert Carruth.

It is glory enough to have shouted the name
Of the living God in the teeth of an army of foes;
To have thrown all prudence and forethought away
And for once to have followed the call of the soul
Out into the danger of darkness, of ruin and death.
To have counseled with right, not success, for once,
Is glory enough for one day.

It is glory enough for one day
To have marched out alone before the seats of the scornful,
Their fingers all pointing your way;
To have felt and wholly forgotten the branding-iron of their eyes;
To have stood up proud and reliant on only your soul
And go calmly on with your duty—
It is glory enough.

It is glory enough to have taken the perilous risk:
Instead of investing in stocks and paid-up insurance for one,
To have fitted a cruiser for right to adventure a sea full of shoals:
To sail without chart and with only the stars for a guide;
To have dared to lose with all the chances for losing
Is glory enough.

It is glory enough for one day
To have dreamed the bright dream of the reign of right:
To have fastened your faith like a flag to that immaterial staff
And have marched away, forgetting your base of supplies.
And while the worldly wise see nothing but shame and ignoble retreat,
And though far ahead the heart may faint and the flesh prove weak—
To have dreamed that bold dream is glory enough,
Is glory enough for one day.

The Visitor

When the train pulled out of the Chicago station toward Nashville on the evening of Monday of last week, it carried two carloads of enthusiastic friends of religious education who were on the way to Nashville to attend the Seventh General Convention of the Religious Education Association. Seven years ago in this city the first convention was held, and out of that convention there grew the organization which has in this space of time accomplished one of the most remarkable pieces of work that ever fell to the charge of any body of people. That convention was confronted with the fact that the forces of religion, consisting of the churches, the Sunday-schools, the theological seminaries and the church colleges, were working almost entirely without the sympathy or cooperation of the great educational forces of the land, embodied in the universities, the secular colleges, the normal schools, the public and the press. They saw that it was absolutely necessary to inspire the educational forces of our country with the religious ideal; to inspire the religious forces of our country with the educational ideal; and to keep before the public mind the ideal of religious education and the sense of its need and value. The organizing and inspiring personality of that first convention was President Harper. Many prophesied at the time that even his tremendous personality would be unable to furnish the power for so impracticable a plan as this seemed to be. And when a little later he passed on into the larger life, and left the circle of his friends to gradually measure the greatness of their loss, it was the pronounced feeling that the Religious Education Association to which he had given name and character would soon cease to be.

Yet, after seven years, the Association has not only continued its work but has proved its right to be, it has demonstrated the necessity for its activity, and it has the records of some of the most important achievements that the last few years have witnessed. At that time the graded system in the Sunday-school was the dream of a few disregarded enthusiasts. Today it has come to be regarded as the indispensable feature of every successful school, and, reluctantly the International Sunday-school Association has yielded to the overwhelming demand for the new method. Seven years ago no one thonght of the work of religious education as a special department of church activity. Today most of the theological seminaries that are at all in line with modern affairs have introduced courses preparing men and women to become directors of religious education in local churches, and large numbers of churches are equipped with such educational leaders. Seven years ago few of the universities felt the obligation to provide religious and ethical instruction. They either contented themselves with courses in biblical literature or omitted all notice of this field. Today the obligation of the university or college to the ethical and spiritual life of its students is becoming one of the great themes for consideration and adjustment. And so on through the long list of seminary programs, church activities, public school ideals, and other instruments of religion or of education which have been freshened, invigorated, reconstructed and inspired through the ministries of the Religious Education Association.

The sessions of the Seventh Annual Convention were held in Nashville, Tennessee, Tuesday, March 8, to Thursday, March 10. Nashville is one of the most attractive, most historic, and most conservative cities in the South. The capital of the state looks down from the hill just in the border of the business district. In the capital grounds there are the equestrian statue of General Jackson and the tomb of James K. Polk. Along the corridor and in the library of the capitol building there are many mementoes of the past, in the form of battle flags, portraits of distinguished men, and souvenirs of the early history of the state. A short distance down the street from the capitol one is pointed to the spot where, only a few months ago, Governor Carmack was shot to death by the Coopers, father and son, who are just entering upon their penitentiary experience of expiation. Nashville is a city of schools. Vanderbilt University is there, the great Methodist institution; Fiske University, the colored school from which the Jubilee singers have gone out to sing their way into the hearts of all America, is there; and fiive or six important girls' schools complete the list.

There were three public evening sessions in the great Ryman Auditorium, which is said to seat more than five thousand people. The attendance from outside of Nashville was said by the railroads to number about two thousand, and the splendid work of the local committee in placarding Nashville with intelligence about the convention, and the admirable assistance of the daily press made the convention the chief feature of the city's life for the three days. Ryman Hall was almost completely filled on the three evenings, and the most unique feature of those evening audiences was the presence in the gallery of delegations from each of the colleges, filling completely the designated sections. The first half hour of each evening was given over to music, freely interspersed with college yells and songs from the students of Vanderbilt, Fiske, Belmont, Radner, Ward and Bascobal, the colors and pennants of which were draped over the balcony and about the great hall. Perhaps the most notable single feature of the music of the convention was the singing of the Fiske Jubilee singers on Wednesday night. Again and again these colored students were called upon for their weird and stirring religious songs. Even after the program was copleted the audience refused to leave, and even the most conservative Southerners forgot for a moment their prejudice against the negro and cheered enthusiastically.

The theme of the convention was "Church and Education." On the first evening the topic was, "The Church Educating Itself," with addresses by President George A. Coe, on "Old Duties," President W. H. P. Faunce, on "The Minister," and Professor Herbert L. Willett, on "The Sunday-school." The second evening the theme was, "The Church Inspiring Local Educational Forces," with addresses on "The Home" by Bishop E. R. Hendricks, "The Public School" by Professor Jesse H. Holmes, and "The Community" by Professor Graham Taylor. On the final evening the theme was, "The Church Christianizing National and International Ideals," with addresses by President James D. Moffat, President William O. Thompson and Rev. Harry F. Fosdick. The annual meeting of the Association was held on Thursday forenoon, at which time Chancellor James H. Kirkland presented his annual survey on the topic, "Progress in Religious and Moral Education in the South," and addresses were delivered by Professor Bruce R. Payne, Rev. Wm. P. Merrill and Secretary Cope of the Association.

The churches of Nashville cooperated delightfully in the work of the convention. Their places of meeting were thrown open generously for the departmental gatherings, and even the Jewish synagogue was placed at the disposal of one of the sections, and the rabbi was present throughout the session devoted to the work of the Young People's Societies. Thirteen of these sections of the convention held separate sessions, and some of them two or three. These close, hand-to-hand conferences over the great problems of religious education were marked by deep interest and the closest attention. They proved beyond question the fact that the Religious Education Association is recognized as one of the most notable and important organizations in America today, and that while it does not aim to supercede nor disturb existing agencies of religious and educational character, it is very definitely successful in inspiring them with new ideals and to greater activity.

At the election of officers, Bishop William Lawrence of Boston was chosen president, and Superintendent Maxwell of the city schools of New York City, vice president. Professor Coe of Union was chosen president of the Board of Directors, and Henry F. Cope, who has proven himself an executive officer of the very first rank, was reelected General Secretary. The next convention will be held in New England, probably at Hartford, Connecticut, and will be devoted to the theme, "Religion in the Home," which is recognized as one of the most important subjects for American educators to consider. In close connection with the convention there will be held a very important series of conferences in New York City, at Columbia University, under the direction of the Council and the departments of universities and colleges, and public schools. The theme of this conference will be, "Moral Instruction in the Public Schools."

The Disciples of Christ in Nashville are divided into two groups. Perhaps as no where else in the country, one becomes aware that we have a wing which is definitely and persistently non-cooperative. These brethren who have a publishing house, a journal called "The Gospel Advocate," and a small training school a little way out from Nashville, have been led for many years by David Lipscomb. He lives some miles out from Nashville, but drives in on pleasant days to the Gospel Advocate office. There are several congregations of this group of Disciples in Nashville. They are strongly opposed to the organ in public worship, to coöperative missionary work and to the pastoral idea in the church. From their position of rock-ribbed orthodoxy the members of the Bible College at Lexington, Kentucky, look like bold and inexcusable radicals, though it is said they have rather kindly feelings toward Professor McGarvey. The more liberal group of Disciples in Nashville are chiefly connected with the three congregations on Vine Street, Woodland Street, and Seventeenth Street. Of the first P. Y. Pendleton is the pastor; R. Linn Cave, ministers to the church on Woodland Street, whose congregation numbers about four hundred; and J. T. McKissick is the pastor at Seventeenth Street, where a fine new church has just been built, and the congregation numbers about two hundred and twenty-five. It was a pleasure to meet Brother Cave and Brother McKissick, the latter of whom was active in making the Disciples who had come to the convention feel at home in the city.

Christ's Resurrection and Ours

The gospel that has won the hearts of men is the story of the risen and exalted Christ. The living Christ awakens hope. To him men turn for inspiration in moral crises. A church of this world has too limited an outlook to arouse enthusiasm. We can philosophize without the living Christ but we need him for the more serious problems of the practical life. The eternal hope fills the present with meaning and sustains interest in common duties. Belief in the resurrection that leads to the writing and singing of such words as, "I am only waiting here to hear the summons, child, come home," is occasionally encountered, but it is not dominant in the church, and it may well be doubted that it has ever been the prevailing type of belief of Christian people. The sensible disciple of the Lord likes the world that now is, and he is in no hurry to exchange it for that which is to come. He grieves when his friends leave for the other world. But he needs the vision of the New Jerusalem that he may live for the best here and now. The heavenly vision is to him more than a fiction because he believes in the living Christ.

An example of what belief in the Christ who triumphed over death can do is given in the life of Paul. The attitude of Paul toward life in this world is misunderstood if we read only what he says about his desire to depart and be with Christ. When he wrote those words he was no longer young and he was in prison. The fight had been a hard one for him and he was willing to quit. Nevertheless, he did not ask to be released. He had work which he was anxious to do before his departure. The welfare of all men was his chief concern. Before his conversion he was a brutal persecutor, devoted to a theory of religion rather than to religion itself. After he heard the voice from heaven, he had as his chief purpose the winning of men to right ways of living, not the killing of them for differing from him in faith. He risked his life that he might accomplish his mission. He knew in whom he had put his trust and he did not doubt that his labors would be fruitful.

"Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven." Our understanding of the future life depends upon what we are at the present. If we live for the flesh to gratify its lusts, the city of God will attract us more by the gold of its streets than by the glory of him who is the light of the city. We cannot understand the power of gold to purchase what base desires demand. Sectarianism, one form of the life of the flesh, fills heaven with its own brand of people. It sees no hope for pure and generous souls whose manner of life has not conformed to its rules of casuistry. It holds that Christ rose from the dead for the purpose of condemning men for indifference to the distinction between tweedledee and tweedledum. The spiritual view of heaven impels us to the work of making men fit to enter heaven. The Christ who lived on earth among men gives us our conception of heaven. To be like him is to be fit for the life to come. Thus the future joins itself to the present in a very practical way.

The victory over death is the defeat of the forces of unrighteousness. It is the good that abides. The power of the resurrection is available wherever intelligent and sincere men devote themselves to the task of enlightening the ignorant and bringing harmony into disordered lives. To believe that Christ lives is to believe that the goodness and mercy of God may be experienced today. His representatives go to the worshippers of cruel gods of lust and violence and tell how love overcomes the hate and cruelty born of greed and lust. We heard the other day of a church that has among its officers men who are adulterers. The guilty men are loud in their professions of loyalty to Christ. They are quick to detect a heretical tendency in the teaching of the minister. They are greatly offended if the preacher urges the election of decent men to office in the town and state. They have no patience with the missionary propaganda. They seem to think that they believe in the resurrection. It is an abuse of language to call them believers. They are infidels of the worst sort because they deny the power of the risen Christ to transform the lives of men. They believe that the flesh can inherit the kingdom of God. Paul, for one, does not agree with them. For him the resurrection of Christ means that the true believer participates in the life of Christ. He becomes dead to sin and alive to righteousness. He unites with the church because the church has a vision of universal conquest. He will not tolerate a preacher with no zeal for missions and no message of civic and economic justice.

Biblical Problems

By Professor Willett

Is there any biblical proof that Peter suffered martyrdom?

B. C. F.

The early Christian tradition that Peter perished at Rome by crucifixion, and that at his own request he was crucified with his head downward, has no biblical foundation unless it be gotten from John 21:18, 19, which appears to refer to his death as a martyr, though the manner is not indicated.

If Paul's words in Galatians 4:4, "In the fulness of time God sent forth his son," be interpreted as indicating that Jesus came at just the moment in human history when things were best prepared for his arrival, how comes it that it has taken so long for the story of the Gospel to reach the many parts of the world which are today the scene of missionary activity? Questioner.

The timeliness of Jesus' arrival in history is to be seen in the admirable adaptation to the work of the gospel of such world facts as the Greek language and civilization, Roman law, opportunities of access to the different parts of the world, the unity of the nations and the peace of the age, as well as that dispersion of the Jewish people which gave everywhere an opportunity for the preachers of the Gospel to use the synagogues as points of departure for the preaching of the new faith. No such combination of propitious circumstances had ever occurred before the days of Jesus, nor indeed has it ever happened since, unless we regard the present age as a second moment of exceptional opportunity for the world-wide diffusion of Christianity. The Gospel could not go out until it was able to create for itself a competent body of interpreters. And although this process seems unaccountably slow, yet all Christian history has been the record of that preparation for a great forth-putting of missionary zeal which is the chief characteristic of our own age. No doubt nineteen hundred years is a long time to wait for a prepared evangelism to reach the distant nations. Yet, in the providence of God, it seems to have been the exact measure of the time required, and God has ways of bringing forth new duties as rapidly as his servants gain competence to discharge them.

In I. Samuel 28:11-13, there is an account of a medium calling forth the dead. What light does this story thrown on Samuel's character, and what justifies its presence in the Bible? J. A. M.

The story of the fortune teller of En-dor was one of the traditions which gathered about the closing days of Israel's first king, and was used to illustrate his unhappy decline of character. One of the laws which he had most strongly insisted upon was the expulsion or suppression of witches, mediums and all who had commerce with the dead. Nothing could more fully prove his unhappy falling off at last than this story, that he himself resorted to one of the class he had placed under ban. The story may or may not be based upon fact. If it is, no doubt the king was made the victim of one of that designing class who have not ceased to play tricks upon society. It was easy for her to recognize him, and since all the manipulations of the event were in her own hands, she could easily delude the distracted chief with the story of the prophet's apparition. The whole narrative only serves to illustrate the fact that ancient Israel accepted without question the reality of such mediumistic powers, although its laws strongly forbade their invocation under severe penalties.

The Massachusetts Board of Charities says that the cost of pauperism is 79 per cent greater in "wet" than in "dry" cities.

The Pastor-Preacher

A Brilliant Book and a Ringing Call to the Ministry

By Bishop William A. Quayle

In this volume Bishop Quayle has given the ministry not only a brilliantly written book, but a most inspiring and helpful message. Its keenness and striking quality will readily appear from the passages which follow:

Preaching a Manly Business.

If God or man has a manlier business than preaching, that business has not been set down in the list of masculine activities. Preaching is a robust business. It is in nothing ladylike. "If after the manner of men I have fought with the beast of Ephesus" is not a phrase descriptive of physical or metaphysical lassitude or incapacity. The preacher is not a man of cartilage: he is a man of bone and sinew. He feels the riot of mighty deeds. Life is epic to him. "I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus" was another of the granitic sayings of brother Paul, sometime preacher in the Church of God.

And no man of the Christian ministry will find it possible to lack virility if he associates much with preacher Paul. Battle was a first notion with him; and battle is robust. The first degree, as the lodge-men say, in the gospel ministry is to feel that it is a man's job.

We shall not fill up the ranks of the ministry by talking smooth talk of ease or emolument. That is not how the matter is. The battle beats fiercely. It is against principality and powers, against spiritual wickedness in high places; it is tireless as the dreadful fight before Port Arthur. The easy brother should not undertake this job. I call it "job" because that is what it is. Put preaching where it belongs, not with the so-called learned professions, but with the eternal working professions, the serious sweaty toils of men, where the corn is planted and the wheat is reaped and the trenches are dug and the sewers laid—the ever-lasting labors of mankind.

The unaffrighted and the unaffrightable man, that is the figure of a preacher cast in bronze.

Were I sculptor I would frame a masculine figure mete to wrestle Hercules to the ground, and he should, level-eyed, look straight forward as to see the face of man and God.

Must Preach Great Matters.

A preacher may not be a great man, but he must preach great matters. His pronouncement is sublime. The little child who holds a geography in his hands holds a geography of a whole round world. He is a lad; but the geography is a planetary concern. Initial to any dignified preachment, is the sense of its sheer immensity. To sail a toy boat on a puddle is quite a different employment from sailing a toy ship on an ocean. To some men preaching is sailing on a puddle. To such men, need it be said, preaching is a childish performance. A big man at a trivial task is ridiculous. Except a gospel be voluminous as an ocean, to preach is petty employment. A stupendous gospel makes its proclamation a regal performance.

The Lure of the Gospel.

The lure of the gospel is the lure not of wages, not of leisure, not of prestige, but the lure of things to be done, which, if left undone, this world would be left a wreck along the shores of the universe. If the gospel be not utterly necessary, it is utterly unnecessary. There is no half-way permission or commission to this Christ apostolate. Man is so great and so lost in the theory of Jesus as to lift all that touches him into the supreme passion of the world.

Unless a man feels this like the hack of a sword or the fierce jab of a spear, he must not preach. He is not big enough to preach to whom this gospel is not supremely great. Except a man's ministry be momentous, himself is trivial.

A Dangerous Fallacy.

Fallacies lurk almost everywhere. They are treacherous. Who does not guard against their guile will probably be slain by them in the dark. This preacher-task is peculiarly liable to this wily attack. The fallacy of special prevalence is that a man must content himself to be a preacher or a pastor: he can not be both. This is often said, and often, too, by such as should know better. In no vocation is a fallacy quite so treacherous and damaging as in the preacher vocation. These incorrect premises will mislead, if they do not ruin, a career. Many look on the activity of a minister as if he were to be either an assistant pastor or to have an assistant pastor. Such expectancy is plainly deceptive. It neither will be that way, nor ought it to be. A man should be big enough for both procedures, and can be that big. It is his distinct business to be. Not infrequently advices to ministers are tendered by such as could not preach or could not visit, and sometimes could do neither, and then these visible infallibilities stand qualified to criticise all who in weakness and weariness and yet with manly fidelity are trying to do both. The axiom of a preacher's career should be, "By the help of the great Pastor of the flock, I will be a pastor-preacher." The supposition that a man is so important that he can not afford time to make pastoral calls is a piece of irreligious conceit which is intolerable in a man who is to be a servant of all. What ought to be done, that is the business of the preacher to do, and to do gladly. A sign to all men who are to engage in this preacher trade with all its exaltations and all its heart-weariness is that the greatest of human preachers, Paul of name, visited from house to house and did so betimes with tears blinding his Christ-dimmed eyes. After that example we lesser men may well refrain from suggesting to ourselves that we are too important to do the menial service of pastoral visitation.

I have not met any minister who had once been a visitor from house to house amongst his people, giving over the custom, on further knowledge of that way, finding it inexpedient. Those who once try "calling" as a means of grace both for themselves and their parishioners, see the sweet effectiveness of this ministry and use it with growing eagerness as the years go on.

But the novice will naturally inquire, "If I go calling so much, when will I get time to prepare my sermons?" The question is valid, but not discerning. He must preach and he ought to preach capable sermons, by which is meant sermons freighted with intent and thought and aspiration and the fine fire of warming the cold heart. But pastoral calling will aid, not retard, this very sermon preparation. No average man can bend the full force of well-trained faculties to study more than six consecutive hours without intellectual fag. If he spend more time, if an apt student of himself, he is aware that he binds a certain haziness of atmosphere around all the objects of his thought. To study well while in the study, and to visit well when out of the study, are reciprocals. They do not, like trains trying to run on one track in opposite directions, collide; but, like trains on the same track going in like directions, they carry double commerce. The distinct blame of most study habits is that there is a dissipation of force, because the entire attention is not held to the matter in hand. The student reads twice what he should have read but once, and the twice reading was necessitated by not giving absolute heed to the first reading. A rigid disciplinarian will not allow his mind to woolgather, but demands of it in imperious fashion that it tend to business in business hours.

Plea of No Time.

The pastor has all the time there is, for which reason he has no cause to complain. He has enough time—let us put it that way. And many a preacher will demur. In a way he has a right to, but in another way he has neither right to nor cause to. We have all more time than we use. We have not need so much of more time, but need of redeeming the time we do possess. "Value time; for it is the stuff of life," said wise Ben Franklin, which is a more recent putting of a laconic and perspicuous saying from the lips of a man who a real master in the art of using time, preacher Paul, who said "redeeming the time."

The preacher says, "I am busy every waking moment." Likely enough. That is the trouble. "Busy" people are fussy people. They lack calm. They perturb themselves and others. A saying of John Wesley has always impressed me as the wisest word I have ever heard touching the use of time. That sagacious workingman observed, "I am always in haste, but never in a hurry." That is as acute as the cryptic sayings of Bacon in his essays. Hurrying wastes time: haste loses time. To be fussy does nothing much except to make a bluster like as the passage of a speeding train brings in behind it a track of leaves and winds and papers, which rush frantically into the vacuum the train has made. There is plenty of hurry, but no locomotion; a bluster of dust, detached, useless, nervous—that is all. I have known preachers who made you wild: they were in a tempest, rather a teapotty tempest, to be sure, but still a tempest. The world was riding them as if they had been a nag. When they came and where they were there was dust and scattering among children, church members, and church matters. They mistook sputter for proceeding. They simply slew the effective procedure of themselves by their dusty bluster. They worried around; they told everybody how busy they were; they could hold you any length of time, detailing how unmercifully they were pressed with work, and fooled away (that is the exact phrase to fit the exact fact) enough time talking about their work to have done it. They simply mistook sputter for speed and execution. Work is done in calm just as boats which build the breakwater on windy seas must have calm for the prosecution of their industry; so must a preacher. He can not bully a sermon nor bluster his way through serious labors. He can command a calm.

The Tyranny of Books.

Now, for a preacher to use a book is legitimate; but for a book to use a preacher is illegitimate. If a congregation can discover by a preacher's Sunday utterances where the preacher's week-day reading has been, then is that preacher in sore need of amplifying. A preacher's entire life of reading (in so far as a book may) should minister to each Sunday's utterance, and not some book on which he has browsed during the week. I know a preacher whose preachments Sunday after Sunday will counteract each other with as much fidelity as the sentiments in some of Emerson's essays. The reason was apparent. He was a cheap man and belonged to the book of the hour. Books of the hour are petulant. Especially if a man reads theology (calling each tome theological which avers itself to be theological) he will find himself conducting a menagerie with many anomalous beasts in his tents, but the names of them he does not know.

Bookish Preacher.

The bookish preacher is defective because people are more than books; and when a man can not digest books and brings them into the pulpit as if he brought them in his hand, he becomes a ditto mark with many another preacher. His sermon is not him. It has a tang of a school. He has gotten it by heart, but his heart has not got it. The sea drinks all rivers which crowd from mountain levels to the sea sands; but all rivers become sea when once the mighty thirst of the ocean has engulfed them. So the reading of many books is in keeping with the preacher's manliness and ministry if all he reads he appropriates as the sea, and gives his multi-information the color of his personality and thought as the sky may give its color to the sea.

The reason why so many ignorant preachers are more interesting than many cultured preachers is that the ignorant man has not been mutilated and mastered, but comes such as he is fresh from the fields, with his own force backed up by his own personality, saying the things he thinks. There is in him a freshness like the dewy fields, and strength like the rocks which apply their massiveness to constructing mountains, and are a surprise like the finding of a new wild flower. When books master a preacher they are his foes: when the preacher masters books they are his good friends.

The preacher must read: he must read widely; he must be aware of things; he must want knowledge and feel its thrill; he must want to know and feel, not that the cutaneous hearer shall say, "How much he knows!" but that all hearers may feel how far afield he has gone to bring the message to their immortality. The untechnical reading of the preacher, this is his influential reading.

Theology he must read and ponder, lest he be a guide who knows not the road; but what pertains to humanity is, after all, the profoundest sea. Here all ships will sail. And it is heartening to my mind, having been my lifetime a reader of many books, to note with what sure persistency the human sea reaches its tide out toward God. The world books are feeling after if haply they may find God. The world's wisest love is in happy fact, in glorious fact, in quest of God.

About Themes.

As a specialist the preacher has that which forever renders his going to new fields for themes a needless expenditure of effort. I am no stickler in regard to the often mentioned sensationalism. That is often a blessing. The gospel on Pentecost was confessedly sensational. It aroused, fired, amazed. Some so-called sensational preaching is, instead, sense preaching. Being dull and uninteresting some divines interpret as being non-sensational, while the living Word, the keen thrust of wit, or irony, or strength of presentation they interpret as sensational. I have no fellow-feeling with this narrow mood. It is narrow and unphilosophical. The preacher's business is to create a hearing. A preacher is commissioned of God to make men listen. "How can they hear without a preacher?" is Paul's putting of the case. God commissions the preacher to bring forth from the armory of intellect every weapon with which he can make execution for God. But some ministers take topics to lecture on. They fail to preach. They seem to have a call to turn the pulpit into a lecture platform. In my humble opinion this is coming down from the eminence to grovel in the morass.

Current Topics.

Some take current topics and discuss them: as, "Robert Elsmere," "John Ward, Preacher," and similar topics. They turn themselves into a newsdealer's bulletin-board and receive no compensation for their services. I think it is generally accepted as a truth that the sale of "Robert Elsmere" was indefinitely extended by this method of advertisement. The doubt in the book was effete: its skepticism was diluted and colorless. The character of Elsmere was as weak a thing to be called character as one can well conceive. The book was prosy and unsatisfactory. The author's polemic and philosophical power were patently of a mediocre sort, and she herself appeared a weak imitation of Matthew Arnold. The ministry took the book in hand and gave it a notoriety and sale wholly disproportionate to its merits. A minister of my acquaintance gave an hour and a half to a review of the novel of the day, when he might have been discussing the themes of eternity. He sent his auditors home eager to buy the book. It seems a misfortune to take Goliath's blade to slay a weakling.

The Disciples' Congress

The eleventh annual congress of the Disciples of Christ will meet with the church at Bloomington, Indiana, March 29-31. Bloomington is 221 miles south of Chicago, and 104 miles north of Louisville, on the Chicago, Indianapolis and Louisville R. R., and fifty-six miles southwest of Indianapolis on the Indianapolis Southern R. R., a branch of the Illinois Central which connects Indianapolis and Effingham, Ill. Bloomington is the seat of Indiana State University, which enrolls over two thousand students every year. This was the first state university established in the United States. Over two hundred students from Christian church homes are in attendance at this school and there is no better Bible Chair opportunity in the brotherhood than here. Professor E. H. Lindley of the department of Philosophy in the university will speak on Wednesday evening during the congress on "The Psychology of the New Thought Movement." Hon. Ira C. Batman, an officer in our church in Bloomington, a lawyer of wide prominence in Indiana, and a trustee of the university, will deliver the address of welcome. Mr. Batman is a brother of Levi Batman of Youngstown, Ohio.

Bloomington is in the limestone belt of southern Indiana and the quarry and stone mill interests of the city and surrounding country make quite an industrial center. A visit to the great quarries is one of the most interesting experiences of visitors.

The church was organized in 1818 by immigrants from Kentucky. The first meetings were held in the homes of the members or in the open air. John Henderson was their minister for twelve years. In 1826 a lot was purchased for $61 and a log house built and used for church and school purposes. Barton W. Stone held a meeting in 1827 and gave the church a new start. In 1833 Michael Coombs was pastor, during what is known as the "coming out into the reformation." Then James N. Mathes, Elijah Goodwin, John C. Miller and B. M. Blount. In 1864 James H. McCullough became pastor. He is still living, in California, was at the Centennial convention, and visited the church here last October. Amzi Atwater was pastor from 1865 to 1868 and has made this his residence for the most part since that time and is responsible for much of the progress and growth of the church. Then W. B. F. Treat and H. D. Carlton. Allan B. Philputt was pastor from 1879 to 1886 and was followed by James B. Peak, Peter Martin, W. F. Ross and L. T. Van Cleave. Thomas J. Clark was pastor from 1894 to 1908, and under his ministry the church received its greatest growth and development. The church has a resident membership of 1,200, is a Living Link in the Foreign Society, has recently doubled all other offerings, including the local budget, and is planning to erect a new $60,000 building.

Rev. Joseph C. Todd, Pastor at Bloomington, Ind.

All who intend attending the congress should send their names to Joseph C. Todd, 213 East Kirkwood avenue. Lodging and breakfast will be furnished in the homes of the church according to the custom of the congress.

Our Readers' Opinions

A Parable on Baptism

"The discussion of baptism, which continues to be a vital problem for the Disciples, has suggested the following parable: A farmer bought a tree through an agent, who told him that in planting it he should cover the roots with water before filling in around them with soil. A few years after, the agent visited the farmer, and found the tree in good condition, bearing the finest fruit. The agent inquired whether his directions to cover the roots with water at the time of planting had been followed. He found that the farmer had not done so, but instead had used moist earth. 'That will never do,' said the agent. 'You must take up the tree and plant it exactly as you were told to do.' The farmer reasoned that it was the fruit which was important to him, and concluded that it was not necessary to replant the tree. Neither could the agent prove that the fruit would be improved or increased by obeying his directions."

I think the above parable may have some interest for your readers in connection with your renewed discussion of the subject involved. E. S. AMES.

Formal Church Membership

Editors Christian Century: Years ago, soon after entering the ministry, the writer felt that there was some inconsistency in our practice in regard to "church membership." We were apparently attaching too much importance to the formal acceptance of members by the local congregation. The right hand of fellowship and enrollment seemed to carry with it great consequences, involving some of the important doctrines of the church. As long as a Christian was willing to work and worship with us without asking this formal recognition we were willing to grant him the privilege of actual fellowship in all the blessings and service of the church.

What is involved in fellowship more than a joint participation in the service and blessings of the church? If we are simply a movement in the church in the interest of unity why make so much of "church membership?" Why emphasize those things that tend to denominationalism? Why not make an effort to get back to the original ground of the Campbells? Here is the crux of the situation. Can we better serve the cause of Christian unity as a distinct denomination as or simply a voice crying, "One is your Master, all ye are brethren?" This matter needs careful consideration. The tendency has been towards denominationalism, with denominational machinery and denominational tests of fellowship and all the denominational peculiarities. Is this desirable? If it is then we are headed in the right direction. If it is not, we need to call a halt and modify some of our teachings and practices. L. E. MURRAY.

Tampering with God's Law

Editors Christian Century: I feel like offering my endorsement to the several editorials which have recently appeared in your periodical relative to baptism. The position of Dr. Gates, Col. Church and many others amongst us that we can promote the cause of Christian union by becoming optionists on the baptismal question seems utterly at variance with the philosophy of church history. The ideal of the earlier reformers seems to have been the restoration of the church to its pristine condition as to government and ordinances. They only tolerated subdivisions with reference to such matters on the broad principle of expediency for the sake of Christian unity. I am persuaded that this was their great mistake. The great mistake with the Jewish church was that they were not steadfast in the maintenance of the laws and ordinances given them of God but thought that they must make changes in order to be like others. One can scarcely read with discernment the history of the Christian church without realizing that they have made a similar mistake. We can readily see this illustrated in the government of the early church, every official in the Roman government from the Emperor down gradually finding a counterpart in the government of the Christian church.

I am persuaded that the most potent work that any man or set of men can do in behalf of Christian union is to impress it upon the minds and consciences of all men that it is both sinful and inexpedient to compromise or subvert God's laws and ordinances and that if we seek Christian union we are likely to find it only by returning to the old paths and walking therein (Jer. 6:16). Will the reader kindly read and ponder well Isa 24:1-6, on tampering with the laws and ordinances of Almighty God. H. MILES.

A Live Issue

Editors Christian Century: As long as it continues necessary to proclaim the gospel, the question of baptism will remain a live issue. Whether considered a carnal or spiritual ordinance, it is evidently destined to remain with us. Two thousand years of discussion pro and con, and still it is alive, and with no signs of death apparent. It seems bound to connect with some phase of the Christian religion in spite of all protest on the part of the world, the flesh and the devil.

Why did the Author of Life introduce what many are pleased to term a "carnal" ordinance into a purely spiritual religion—especially when He could fore-see what an awful bar it would be to church membership with so many people, and also what a barrier it would be to Christian unity?

When the time has come when everybody (who is anybody) is wanting to show his loyalty to the Christ, how sad it is that anything so infinitesimally insignificant as a mere "form of doctrine" should obstruct the pathway and cause the brave soldier of the cross to flinch or jeer aside or turn back altogether.

I for one am sorry the question seems to be so big a bug-bear. It is a feeling akin to sorrow for all who reject the blessed Christ in any particular. The baptism test is a great test. I have an explanation which helps to reconcile my own rebellious senses, and which leads me to sort of say to my own worldly wisdom and scholastic (?) mind, "There is doubtless a reason."

Of course no one can see any vital or philosophical connection between water and salvation. Perhaps there is none. But might it not be that the Christ foresaw that it would be the best test of our faith and of our love that He could give. He saw how the "smart set" or worldly wise rejected John's baptism, and He knew that worldly pride and wisdom, being much the same in all ages would reject His baptism. So He inserted it into His plan as a part of the sifting process. He knew that the man of simple faith and true love would ask but one question, "Did Christ command it?" If so, his faith and love would prompt him to gladly do it, whether he saw any sense in it or not. This may be one reason why Jesus chose baptism and placed it at the very threshold of His kingdom. Just as in the case of Naaman. The spirit of unquestioning obedience must be in the heart or there is no salvation. What a wise and gracious God will do with the "pious un-immersed" who really desire to do His will is another question. "The Judge of all the Earth" will do right. But the spirit of obedience must be in the heart, and it looks from the evidence in the case as though the command of Christ to be baptized was chosen to both test and to help perfect the spirit of obedience in our hearts.

The great tendency of people both in the church and out of the church is to get away from that little word "do" as emphasized in the Sermon upon the Mount. Anything that requires inconvenience, or self-denial, or humility, or sacrifice, is repulsive to the flesh. This is the tap-root cause of much of the objection to Christian baptism; the balance of the objection is due to lack of faith, due to much erroneous teaching upon the question, and a failure, therefore, to see its spiritual import or to comprehend its beauty.

I have heard more or less all my life about the "letter" and "spirit" of the law living. Is it not possible to obey "the letter of the law" and obey it also "in the spirit"? Must I do away with the letter of Christ's commands and make null and void His law before I can obey him in the spirit. Is it not possible to obey form and at the same time "obey it from the heart"? "Form" is not to be traduced and discarded because it is form; nor "letter" because it is letter. "What God hath joined together let no man put asunder." Some churches are ruling out the bread and wine because they are carnal. They put on the table-linen and sit around the table and commune spiritually. When they get a little more spiritual they will rule out the linen also, I suspect, and then the material table, and the material meeting house, and perhaps the material preacher.

There is an old shoemaker here, who recently got out a little booklet, entitled, "No natural water needed." The gist of it is, " Water never means water in the Bible. It invariably means spirit or law. Jesus, when He was baptized, simply went down into the law and came up out of the law."

When teaching a Bible class once, a man from another church started to cut out of my Bible (Acts 2:38) because it taught "baptism for the remission of sins." The poor man afterward landed in the insane asylum. People should be careful and not get insane in their effort to expurge baptism from the Bible. It is dangerous business—and very likely to prove unsuccessful.

Whatever the relation also, which "baptism" sustains to Christian unity, I cannot believe, brethren, that any weak-kneed compromise of truth will help in bringing about that glorious consummation. There must first be a unity of faith on these vital questions before organic unity is possible. Meanwhile we can be tolerant and charitable, working with and for one another, until love, guiding us into all truth, shall bring us together in Christ, where there shall be forever "one body and one spirit."

More About "Baptizo"

Editors Christian Century: It is gratifying to know that my recent questions greatly interest our eminent state librarian, Professor Demarchus C. Brown. He doubtless gives the only answers that up-to-date, accurate knowledge of Hellenic scholarship can make to the critical questions asked, without conceding the entire immersionist contention.

He says: "The fact that it (John's baptism) is from men makes it a part of righteousness." It is easy to say: "The theologians have read into these terms meanings foreign to them." It is as easy and more accurate to say that modern Hellenists are seeking to read out of these terms what the united scholarship of the world finds in them which do not suit modern uncertainties.

As the authorities cited—Stephanus and, later, "Papiri"—do not give sprinkle or pour among the meanings of baptizo, it is fair to assume that neither of these words can be honestly found in any recognized lexical authority.. Stephanus is not quoted in full, and the meanings given are secondary and "per consequence" and cannot apply in the passages cited from the first gospel.

Hence the hoary old question is still unanswered by new scholarship.

It stands as concededly true that there is no such lexicon in existence. The only seeming exception is Grove's lexicon, into which some editor foisted sprinkle, which the author did not put in.

It is quite the fashion in these days to belittle what cannot be fairly met by not deeming it "worthy of an answer," but this is simple weakness. This baptism controversy must be settled by determining the meaning of one word in one sentence, viz.., baptizontes, in Matthew 28:19. The same word with the same meaning occurs in Matthew 3:13-17. These are the example and command of our Lord on which hang the whole question. If modern thought cannot determine this little matter of scholarship, it cannot be trusted with the weightier matters of justice, mercy and faith. "I think we should be ashamed of the whole thing" of seeking to break the force of one of even the least of these commandments and teaching men so. Faith follows Jesus implicitly, as one who knew his mission and how to fulfill it, and does not deem unworthy or little anything that is supported by his example and precept, which may be easily understood.

When my questions are conceded or fairly disposed of otherwise, by grace of the editors I hope to show their bearing on the present problem of religious fellowship.

Important, If True

Editors Christian Century: I notice in your issue of March 3, a communication from my good friend, Prof. Demarcus C. Brown of Indianapolis, in which occurs the following statement:

"The greatest lexical authority" Stephanus gives a meaning of baptizo in the latter days of the Greek tongue (the period of the New Testament) as—tingo, to moisten—to wet; abluo, to wash off (by throwing water on the object washed); lavo, to wash."

This is an important piece of news. Very important, if correct. I know my friend, Brown, is a good authority on Greek and I am a very poor authority but I wish to inquire if the above statement is taken literally from Stephanus. I must confess that I have not Stephanus in my library but was always under the impression that it was a bi-lingual rather than a tri-lingual lexicon. I may be wrong about this matter and I will thank Brother Brown for giving me a proper correction, if I am. Sincerely and fraternally, Z. T. SWEENEY.

The Man in the Porch

Editors Christian Century: I like to read your writings. "The Man in the Porch" article interests me, for your treatment of it is unique in my experience. Do you sufficiently emphasize that expression, "He was made whole," which is used five times of this case? And in the maze than twenty times the word whole is used in the New Testament with regard to restoration, it has reference to unsound bodies, incomplete bodies, made miraculously sound, complete, whole, your illustrations are of cases where a great shock or jar relieved a nerve or brain cell. The man in the porch did not know Jesus, and there is need of some illustrations showing where thirty-eight years of hopelessness is relieved by a look and word, and no shock. WM. ROSS LLOYD.

Bellevue, Pa.

Prominent Virginia Laymen on Unity

In a recent issue of The Congregationalist and Christian World (Boston) the statement is made that "The plan of a great church trust, or union, does not accord with the ethical standards of our time." The main body of the article in question presents as the basis for such judgment the experience and results of the union between the Free and United Presbyterian churches of Scotland, as the United Free Church, some ten years ago.

I am glad the writer of that article uses the words "organic" and "corporate" in describing the proposition in which he cannot figure a leading indication of successful and pleasing issue.

Now Scotland is a "bonnie" land, peopled with men and women strong in the faith and clinging to it with steadfastness, a noble trait. But will the writer of that article aver that the action, either with or without controversy, of two Christian brotherhoods in Scotland, nearly allied as they were; furnish a controlling index as to what may be accomplished under the leadership of a combination of evangelical brotherhoods in some larger country, say the United States. Further, when the effort is put forth seriously in this country we will not have to contend with the difficulty arising from "corporate" existence and possessions because none of the "communions" as such, have "corporate" existence.

Again, among the real friends of unification or "unity," of the Christian brotherhoods, union, organically, has not been advocated. The most advanced and thoughtful worker in promotion of unity believes that the prayer of the Master, John 17:21, will in large measure be answered when every person calling himself a Christian, who has publicly confessed Jesus and obeyed the ordinances, will feel as free to enter and worship in the church building of any other congregation of Christians as if it were the one on the roll of which his name appears, and because he knows he is welcome.

Unity will come because God will have it so. The prayer of our Lord and Master will prevail. What matters it in the twentieth century, that at its inception Methodism blazoned its banner with "Holiness." Do they not believe in "faith and works?" Do not all the evangelical brotherhoods believe, too, in "faith and works"? If Calvin emphasized foreordination and predestination, those leading tenets in the Presbyterian canon in its early history, is this true of that brotherhood today, do not they, too, preach and teach "faith and works"?

If earlier in her history the great old Protestant Episcopal brotherhood, declared for strict interpretation of "apostolic succession," it is surely far from unanimous on this score now. If she now exhibits pride in the "Historic Episcopate," surely she has lived long enough under her form of church government to be called "Historic." In all good conscience there be nothing in her claim in this behalf to annoy another brotherhood. Aside from our immersionist brethren, the communions not specifically named may be fairly compared to those already mentioned. A great obstacle seems to loom ominously when we approach the differences between immersionist and non-immersionist.

This should not be so, because every intelligent Christian brother, Methodist, Presbyterian, Episcopalian, Lutheran, Baptist or Disciple, admits that each enjoys the same prospect of salvation with the other. Nearly every one cordially greets the other around the Lord's Table in the most sacred of ordinances. In this presence surely we do find the very acme of Christian fellowship. Do we mean it? Every active member of the communions named above has been baptized with water in the name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost.

Having acknowledged each fully and freely, as a Christian, deserving all we can and do hope for, as in the sight of our Heavenly Father; how can the non-immersionist question the conscientious performance of obligation as understood, on the part of the immersionist, or how can the immersionist raise the question as to conscientious performance of obligation as understood, by the non-immersionist? Both have obeyed according to understanding. This is what God asks, shall man demand more?

The writer firmly believes that within the first half of the present century will be found the dating time for the "new era" in Christianity; when mind, heart and purse of all Christians, yes, including the Romanists, shall be joined in one earnest and impassioned diapason of effort to bring the "kingdom of our Lord and Master" into the hearts of all men everywhere. I am strengthened in this belief because of what I veritably conceive to be divine leading; in the many earnest attempts in recent years, in the shape of "federation meetings"; by the great "Laymen's Missionary" movement in this country, Canada and England, and the wonderful success that has so far crowned this really glorious work. Evidences are not lacking that a leaven has been incorporated and is now at work. The writer is personally cognizant of a movement to this end having its origin in the minds of members of the Protestant Episcopal Church, in what is probably the most conservative diocese in the United States, as it is certainly one of the oldest.

Baptism and Bethany Lessons

Editors Christian Century: I want to thank you from the bottom of my heart for what you are giving us in The Christian Century. These articles on the baptism question are going to the bottom. More than once have I tried, in sermon, to present the subject as you are giving it to us, but I did not succeed, of course, as you are succeeding.

The Century of February 17, ought to prove one of the most helpful numbers you have ever issued, because of all those most excellent articles on the Graded Sunday-school Lessons.

Surely the long-looked-for and much desired new day for teaching is breaking upon us. I enclose 25 cents for which send me as many numbers of the Century of February 17, as you can. I want to give a copy to each of my Sunday-school teachers and members of my training class. Send samples also of the Bethany Graded Lessons.

The Book World

THE PASTOR PREACHER is Bishop William A. Quayle's latest book. The bishop is the most popular preacher in the Methodist church today. His book is written out of his heart and is rich with the juice of his experience. It deserves extraordinary notice. But the best review of it is to let it speak for itself. This we have done in pages 8 and 9. (Chicago: Jennings & Graham. Pp. 411; $1.50 net ;$1.62 postpaid.)

THE STANDARD DOMESTIC SCIENCE COOK-BOOK. compiled and arranged by Milian H. Lee and Jennie A. Harvey, author of the Century Cook-book. The possession of a good cook-book is a joy to any housekeeper. The present volume has thirty-two departments and 135 especial drawings and is indexed so that any department is easily found. The recipes are good and such as people in ordinary circumstances can use, which cannot be said of all cook-books. Any one using this book will find no difficulty in serving good meals. (Chicago: Laird & Lee, publishers.)

MEN THE WORKERS. By Henry Demarest Lloyd. This work by the splendid champion of industrial democracy, Henry D. Lloyd, was issued after his death. It is a series of twelve addresses, delivered by Mr. Lloyd at times covering a period of twenty years, and represents the best of his ideas on labor themes. They were delivered under varying auspices, such as labor unions, church societies, at public receptions, etc., and thus represent his ideas as spoken from all standpoints. Mr. Lloyd was the firm friend of organized labor and believed in the future of industrial coöperation. His religion was that of brotherhood, and though a man of large means himself, he devoted all his time and great powers to the advocacy of the cause of the workers. He was a man of extraordinary literary gifts and there is rare charm in all he has written or spoken. These addresses are no exception. He is cogent, poetic, true to facts, and keenly logical. He was an interpreter to his time of the things the morrow promised, a sort of social prophet in a material age. These brilliant addresses read well and one is cheered by their humanity and optimism. (New York: Doubleday, Page & Company. Pp. 280.)

THE ARMENIAN AWAKENING, by Leon Arpee. Armenia has been the land of desolation to our minds so long that we have little idea of the integrity of their national life or of their ecclesiastical government. They are a powerful factor in the Ottoman Empire and have for many years had a kind of governmental autonomy through their Patriarch, the official head of their national church, who was endorsed with civil powers by the Sublime Porte. The tendency of this ecclesiastical government has been to become both Romanistic in its quest of authority and the tool of the wealthy Armenian oligarchy at Constantinople for the advancement of their privileges. This book tells the story of the revolt from both and the triumph of evangelicalism in the church by the democratization of it and outside the church by the success of Christian missions under the support of the American Board (Congregational.) The missionaries began in the early thirties with the design only of leavening the ancient Armenian church with evangelical ideas. This succeeded so well that the ecclesiastical authorities persecuted converts to the evangelical cause and attempted to bind a Romanistic creed and polity upon the national church. The persecution forced the native progressives out of the church and into a purely Protestant movement. The result is that the missionary churches now number some 14,000 active members with an evangelistic community of 56,000, the old obligarchy of merchants is completely dethroned, the Patriarch is elected by representatives of the church and the ecclesiastical rule is under a constitution. The volume is a very interesting accession to history. (Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. Pp. 253. $1.25 net. $1.36 postpaid).

THE GATEWAY TO THE SAHARA, by Charles Wellington Furlong. This well published book has the halo of the romantic about it. It is of strange yet real lands and lands of the present day. Old Tripoli is yet new to us. It is the "Gateway to the Sahara," that vast desert that we are accustomed to think of as an arid half continent, as extensive as our republic, but which is in reality a vast half desert populated by millions of human beings who are yet living in the feudal days and many of them under the sway of Moslem fanaticism. Of the Hausas alone there are fifteen millions and they form a great feudalistic nation in the southern Sahara or Soudan, and traffic in slaves and Central African wild products. It is rather shocking to us to find that their slaves literally number millions and that there is a well defined code of dealing in them as well as of feudalistic tribute. Through all the book there is the sinewy form of the Arab, the misty glamor of the strange unknown, the adventurous spirit that is upon the men who dare the unexplored. In it is the thrill of adventure through the telling of tales of a Hausa slave story of his escape, a night ride with Arab bandits, and stories of the wild white Tauregs of the interior. The book is valuable to those who have the missionary interest at heart. Not because it has any interest in the missionary problem but because it reveals the extent of those Soudanese lands into which the missionary has as yet not pushed his pioneer work and the vastness and virility of the population that are yet to be sought out by him. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. Pp. 306. $2.50 net).

MEN AND MISSIONS, by Wm. T. Ellis. This book has a lofty note in it. It is a clarion call to the Knight Errantry of a new chivalry, the chivalric care of the strong of the earth for the weak among nations and peoples. It rings vibrant with the robust and masculine and calls for a presentation of missions in terms that pass beyond sentimentalism and advance to the heroic. It challenges men to put into this cause the moral heroism that other ages put into war and to get into the heart of the greater thing in today's world movement. Mr. Ellis's trip around the world studying misions brought him home a confirmed advocate of them and to the cause he is now devoting his best energies and talents. He is not the first man who has received a call to bigger things by such an investigation and he is but a promise of the multitude that will follow. The Laymen's Missionary Movement is full of intelligent enthusiasm. It challenges the biggest in big men and they are answering. It proposes nothing less than that the virile and successful manhood of Christendom take the world for all that is best in our Christian civilization. It is the logical reaction from an overdone commercialism. Mr. Ellis does not claim that every missionary undertaking has been an unqualified success, but he does claim that missions as a whole have been the most surprising of successes. He does not think there should be no criticism but he does think the cause is so great that every fault in it should be discovered and remedied. There is the sweep of big things in this book and every Christian man should read it. (Philadelphia: The Sunday School Times Co. Pp. 316. $1.00 net).

THE IMMIGRANT TIDE: ITS EBB AND FLOW. By Edward A. Steiner. Prof. Steiner is well known for his books on "Tolstoi, the Man," "On the Trail of the Immigrant," and "The Mediator." He is an extraordinary man with an extraordinary experience. An immigrant himself, he has a viewpoint few students of the problem possess. He not only came from the land of the immigrant, but he has made several voyages with him in the third class passage, and is familiar with his emotions, the reasons for his coming and the hopes he has when he comes. A year or two ago he conducted a class of home missionary students through the southern lands of Europe in an investigation of the folk who make their future parishioners. In this book he does not study statistics but interprets the phenomena of immigration and discusses the meaning of the new country to the newcomer and his relation to us and our institutions, and seeks to "disarm prejudice and to give it no new weapons." This volume is full of the human touch. It tells the stories that are typical and searches the hearts of the immigrants for their weal and woe. It is wholesome for us to be made familiar with them from that point of view and the more we know of it the less we will be prejudiced against them because of the superficial externals we see in the passing. A book like this makes one ashamed that he ever passed judgment on a people whose human side he never knew but of whom he saw only those things that we posses and they do not. Prof. Steiner's greatest contribution will be to the true Americanism of those who look through his sympathetic eyes at the poor of the old lands who come to share our hopes and our prosperity. (New York: Fleming H. Revell. Pp. 370; $1.50 net.)

THE SOCIOLOGY OF THE BIBLE. By Ferdinand S. Schenk, Professor of Practical Theology in the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Church in America. This is a rather gratifying book with an entirely new title. It gives to the sociology of the Bible the sort of discussion that is generally given to its theology. Its province is the effect in society rather than the cause or fact of the idea of a revelation of God. It accepts the methods of higher criticism as a means of investigation and holds fast to the fact of a revelation and proceeds to discuss the work of that revelation and the immanence of the God who gave it on the evolution of the society that accepted it. The social attributes of Christianity are taken up and their bearing on the contemporary problems of the family, property, culture, government, etc., is discussed. The church is treated as a great potential social force, designed by Christ as the means of bringing the Kingdom of God to a full realization and as just awakening to its ministering duty and power. The historical manner in which Christianity has led civilization from the days of Rome until today, and the way it is leading it today in the mission field, is described, and the glories of the future held in promise are portrayed. It is a thoroughgoing book on the theme that is to receive increasing discussion. It is good reading for any close biblical student and is especially commended to theological students and professors. (New York: Board of Publication, Reformed Church. Pp. 428; $2.00.)

A STORY OF THE TRUSTS

BY JANE RICHARDSON

CHAPTER XX.

Breaking the News.

When his unwelcome visitors had gone Randall sat absorbed in his unhappiness, his elbows upon his desk, supporting his bowed head in his hands. He saw, in anticipation, the terrible suffering and loss which must follow the enforced closing of the Works—a loss which he could afford, but which would fall with crushing force upon the men and their families. To the credit of his manhood tears ran down his face and fell upon his desk. He could not refuse the sum offered by the Trust, even though he realized that he was being shamelessly robbed; such refusal would only lessen his power, by that much, to help his men hereafter. It was useless to appeal to the courts of Indiana; for inevitably their decision would be reversed by the courts of New Jersey, the Court of Last Appeal for Trusts in every State in the Union! He knew too well what invincible defences such corporations had built up.

For the present, he could arrange to lend his men, at a nominal interest, and an indefinite length of time, such sums as they might require, and meanwhile, he would look about and ascertain if it were possible to establish some other industry in which they could be re-employed. But this would take time and careful study. Furthermore, they had had twelve years' training in the business which had come to so sudden an end. He was compelled to the admission that it had come to an end! Many of his workmen, while plodding and faithful, were slow of intelligence; they had mastered the routine of their tasks and would find it hard to make a new beginning. He himself had little heart for a fresh venture after this day's experience. He could have no assurance that the same thing might not happen again, and yet again. He was not living, as he had supposed, in a peaceful country where he could count upon the protection of mere moral force. It was a hostile land; every situation was an ambuscade for relentless enemies, waiting to attack where they dared to plunder and despoil!

He realized that sacrifices on his part would be necessary; even a great capitalist could hardly go on as before after having sustained such a blow as that under which he was now staggering.

The day dragged on, and at five o'clock Randall sent for Clark, the foreman, and said that he wished the men to wait a moment after the closing hour; he had something to say to them. Clarke looked at him curiously, but as Randall proferred no explanation, turning to his papers again, he went out.

Randall watched the clock in nervous apprehension. He shrank from the duty he had to perform, as a humane man always shrinks from inflicting pain upon his helpless fellow creatures. He sighed deeply as the whistle blew at last.

To the men it was not only the signal for knocking off for the day, but for turning their faces homeward. They were sober and industrious, for Randall would not employ any other kind. He sighed again, more heavily than before, then passed into the outer office where Mary Benson, having closed the typewriter, was putting on her cloak.

"Come with me," he said, and, astonished, she looked at him inquiringly as if she had not understood him. "Only to the door of the shops, Mary, I have something to say to the men, which you must hear as well."

He found them waiting for him, wondering, but without anxiety; Clark was the only man amongst them who habitually borrowed trouble. The older men were talking indifferently, while the younger ones were scuffling like awkward, shambling puppies, the laughing onlookers backing their favorites.

Randall threw open the door, and, at the sight of his stern face, a thrill of foreboding went through them. Even the young men were sobered instantly. They waited then, as men standing with their backs to the wall, for the volley that kills.

It was useless to prolong the scene so Randall began at once: "My men! Today the Trust has forced me either to shut down at a total loss, or sell out to them. They have bought up all the wire in the country and we cannot go on when our stock is exhausted. I have refused to join the Trust; it would be of no benefit to you or to me if I did, for I believe that they intend to shut down the Works never to reopen it. It would be folly for me to refuse what they have offered me—not half the value of the plant—as its agents have informed themselves—otherwise we would have been let alone. It would only deprive me of the means of lending you a hand should you need it, or of establishing some other business here in Carlinville in which I can once more offer you places, as I hope to do. It is a heavy blow for us all. The Works will be compelled to close at the end of the month."

It was some moments before the men could fully grasp the meaning of his words and when at last it penetrated their bewildered minds, each received it as his peculiar nature inspired him. The light died from their eyes. The faces of several grew rigid and of ashy paleness. They stood motionless in their places for a few seconds and Randall's keen ear, straining for every sound, heard deep, shuddering breaths; the sighs of men suddenly stricken with almost unendurable anguish.

He waited a moment, no one spoke to him and no one made a movement to approach him. They could not, just yet, grasp the hand that had delivered the blow, which they realized threatened the destruction of all they cherished; that for which they had toiled cheerfully and honestly for so many years. It had come without warning—at a time when they had reason to look for better things.

The thought uppermost in the minds of the married men was: "How can we go home and tell our wives?"

"Out of a job—out of a job"—they repeated it to themselves over and over, the anathema, maranatha of their doom.

The young men having few responsibilities—although several were supporting their parents—were more self-confident and hopeful, and bore the news more stoically. A few assumed an air of bravado and walked out of the shops with smiling defiance. The older and more despondent—those who had tested life and knew its bitterness—followed in silence. Not a word of either regret or reproach was spoken; they were stunned and dazed.

Randall closed the door, and Mary Benson turned to him with appealing eyes. She saw the home that, of late, had been her constant thought, crumble into nothingness, and she broke into passionate weeping.

Randall was pierced to the heart. "Oh Mary, child, don't—don't," he pleaded. "Have courage; Have more faith in me! You shall not suffer. Teddy shall not give up the little home if I can help it!"

But Mary knew her lover better than Randall did. He would sacrifice everything before he would accept from any man money that he had not earned.

When she was sufficiently calm, she bade Randall good-night and he was left alone. It was dusk when he finally locked the office door. As he drove slowly across the bleak common toward the town he glanced backward across his shoulder. The Works loomed up black and forbidding against the murky sky; the darkened windows, the tall chimney from which a thin film of smoke curled upward, were prophetic of the day when the place should stand abandoned and desolate.

CHAPTER XXI.

Susan Rises to the Occasion.

Teddy and Alonzo were late, and Susan watched the clock somewhat anxiously for Teddy had remained with them after his recovery. Both were usually prompt, compelled to be by Susan's complaints when "victuals were spoilt"; and she had also made it clear to them "that it kept back her work dreadfully."

Alonzo had eaten very little dinner and Susan was of the opinion that he felt "poorly, but he wouldn't say so if he was dyin';" He had seemed out of sorts for several weeks, was more silent than ever, and—an unusual thing for him—somewhat peevish. He was annoyed with the children when they were noisy, and he had been impatient with Susan when she was disposed to argue some unimportant matter with her usual spirit.

With all her sharpness of tongue Susan never contradicted or quarreled with Alonzo—she had too much genuine respect for him. She looked ruefully at the toast she had prepared specially for him, which she hoped might tempt his feeble appetite; it was slowly drying up. She endeavored to divert her mind by hearing Ned say his speech.

It was his first appearance as an orator, and Susan was anxious that he should do himself credit. It was short and of her own selection and abounded in that wholesome moral sentiment which good women believe in administering to children regularly with the simple remedies, which their physical well-being occasionally calls for.

Ned stood on a stool in a corner, and was shrouded from head to foot in a gingham apron, "to keep himself clean because he would waller on the floor playin' with Jody 'stead of settin' down in his chair and lookin' at his picture-book, like a nice boy!"

Ned's attention was distracted by his playfellow, who was beguiling him from his duty, chasing a ball, a pastime in which his little master always took part.

"Do for mercy sake, look at me! and leave Jody go for five minutes," exclaimed Susan. "You don't half know these pretty words, and I don't know what your teacher'll say."

"She won't say nothin'," Ned replied with a sense of injury. "'Cause I do know 'em already!"

And he set off in a high, loud voice, taking his breath in gasps, and swallowing where no punctuation marks were required:

"How pleasant is Saturday night,
When we've tried all the week to be good,
Not spoken one word that was bad,
And obeyed every one that we should."

"Well," said Susan, mollified, but still feeling it her duty not to excite Ned's vanity by over-praise, "I reckon that'll do, but it would have been a heap prettier of you to have said it right in the first place!"

Spring Months

March, the first month of the season,
Often brings us snow;
Part of spring and part of winter
In this month, you know.
Such a boisterous, noisy fellow,
Making high winds blow.

April is a little teaser,
And I'll tell you why;
She can brightly smile one minute,
And the next she'll cry.
Better take a good umbrella,
Or you'll not keep dry.

May is just a little darling,
Bringing flowers gay,
Birds that sing the sweetest music
All the sunny day.
There is not a bit of wonder
Every one likes May.

Where the Doll Comes From

Doll making did not become conspicuous as an industry in the Thuringian Mountains until the middle of the nineteenth century, when a citizen of Sonneberg brought from London a doll, which was regarded as a great curiosity. It had come originally from China, and its head, legs and arms were movable. This furnished an inspiration to the ingenious Thuringian toy-makers, who promptly improved upon it. Up to that time they had made dolls only of wood and leather, but soon they evolved the wax head—at first a crude article, the wax being applied with brush, but later brought to perfection, thanks, it is said, to an accidental discovery. A man engaged in making the heads dropped a thimble into his pot of fluid wax, and, on taking it out, found it covered with a smooth and beautiful coat of the substance. He was not slow to seize the idea, the result being the adoption of the dipping process, the final touches of color being put on with a camel's hair pencil. Later on the movable eyes and closing lids, to fein sleep, were added, and the fleece of the Angora goat was substituted for human hair in the making of wigs, holding its color and curl much better, the doll, as it is known today, thus assuming its final and highly artistic form.

Dressing the dolls after they are made has become an industry in which numbers of women and girls are employed. For the small, inexpensive dolls, little chemises, finished with a ruffle of lace around the neck and arms, are made by hundreds and require no skilled labor for their construction.—The Circle.

Five Seattle Boys

Postmaster George Russell, according to the Post Intelligencer, is one citizen with a high regard for the honor and principle of that numerous genus known as the Seattle small boy.

"A few days ago," said the postmaster, "three badly frightened and exceedingly nervous boys were ushered into my office. They had informed the clerk in the outer office that the matter in hand was for my personal ear.

"'We done it, and we'll take what's coming to us,' said the smallest of the trio.

"'Done what?' I asked.

"'Him and him and me and Beany and Scotty were playing 'follow the leader,' and Beany jumped over the mail box, and then I jumped and the box tipped over and hit a rock and broke the lock, and the letters all flew out on the ground,' said the spokesman.

"'Where is the box?' I asked.

"'It's the box on the corner of Thirteenth and Union,' answered the boy, 'and Beany and Scotty is guardin' it with clubs.'

"'We knew we had done something awful, and we was goin' to run away. Then we decided to put our names and addresses in the box and let you find us if you could. Then we decided to come and tell, and we're here.'

"I'm not strong on the sermonette,' said the postmaster, "but I will assure you that I did my best to show those boys that they had done a very brave and manly thing, and that such a principle, if followed through life, could not lead them far astray, I assured the boys that their honorable conduct in not only confessing, but in leaving some of their number to guard the government's property, entitled them to absolute forgiveness."

"Three very happy youngsters left the office to convey the tidings to the guard at the mail box. As they left, one boy said, 'I knew they wouldn't hang us.'

"I sent a man for the broken box. When it came in we opened it, and there was the letter the boys had written before they had decided to face the music:

"'Mister Postmaster: We done it, but we didn't go to. Yours truly,

"'Henry ————,
"'Beany ————
"'Scotty ————,
"'Louis ————,
"'George ————.'"

The Sleepy Song

By Josephine Dodge Daskam.

As soon as the fire burns red and low,
And the house upstairs is still,
She sings me a queer little sleepy song,
Of sheep that go over the hill.

The good little sheep run quick and soft,
Their colors are gray and white;
They follow their leader nose to tail,
For they must be home by night.

And one slips over and one comes next,
And one runs after behind,
The gray one's nose at the white one's tail,
The top of the hill they find.

And when they get to the top of the hill
They quietly slip away,
But one runs over and one comes next,
Their colors are white and gray.

And over they go and over they go
And over the top of the hill,
The good little sheep run quick and soft,
And the house upstairs is still.

And one slips over and one comes next,
The good little, gray little sheep!
I watch how the fire burns red and low,
And she says that I fall asleep.

In the Days of the Air-Ship

By Theresa R. Robbins.

Elsie Lewis peered out from among her furs at the great, bleak stretches of snow and ice over which the air-ship was speeding. She had long wanted and begged to go to the north pole, and now at last she was to have her wish.

"We shall be at the pole soon, deary," said her father, smiling. A few minutes later he called to the aeronaut: "Slow up, please, Carter! I think we are about there." He made his observations, then announced: "Yes, here we are!" and the air-ship dropped slowly to the ground.

Elsie, aglow with delight, jumped out and stood beside her father and Carter. She, a girl of fifteen, was actually at the top of the earth! They looked about at the desolate waste on all sides.

"Think of the men who made their way here with only sledges and dogs!" said Mr. Lewis. "What a length of time it took them! Why, we have come in a day!"

Just then there was a snap and creak behind them. They turned to find the air-ship floating off, the cable which bound it to the ground having been broken in the high wind. It was whirled rapidly away by the blast, dwindled to a speck, and was lost to sight.

They were thus abosolutely deserted—without even a sledge such as the old-time explorers used.

"Our only hope is to wait here on the chance of an air-ship," said Mr. Lewis. "We must keep walking for fear of freezing."

So they walked about on the snow and ice in the piercing wind, hour after hour. Elsie, mechanically lifting one foot after the other, could not keep back the tears that froze on her cheeks.

At last, when she was almost worn out, Mr. Lewis pointed to the sky and cried: "An air-ship!"

It was a large air-ship, making swiftly for the pole. When it arrived, the three were cordially welcomed by its occupants. Elsie, wrapped in fur rugs, was soon in a deep sleep, homeward bound.—St. Nicholas.

Bobby's Exchanges

John Kendrick Bangs.

I wish I owned a motor-car—a slashing big red-dragon.
I'd swap it in a minute for a handsome horse and wagon.

And then I'd take that horse and cart, delaying not a minute,
And swap 'em for a new canoe with nice soft cushions in it.

And then I'd take that new canoe—I wouldn't wait a jiffy—
And swap it for a puppy dog with manners fine and sniffy.

And then I'd take that sniffy dog for fear that I'd be bitten
And swap it off with someone who preferred it to a kitten.

And then I'd take that kitty-cat and sell it for a quarter,
The which I'd swap for one big pail of fizzy soda water.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, MARCH 20.

Theme for the Day—The Triumphal Entry.

Scripture—On the morrow a great multitude that had come to the feast, when they heard that Jesus was coming to Jerusalem, took the branches of the palm trees, and went forth to meet him, and cried out, Hosanna: Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord, even the King of Israel.—John 12:13, 4.1

All glory, laud, and honor to Thee, Redeemer, King!
To whom the lips of children made sweet hosannas ring.
Thou art the King of Israel, thou David's royal Son,
Who in the Lord's name comest, the King and blessed One.

—Anonymous.

Prayer—Our Father, we open with joy the gates of our souls to let the King come in. Not for a passing hour of triumph would we receive him, to send him hence away with broken heart and frustrate purpose, but we welcome him to abide forever as Lord and King. Prepare us for his coming. May our hearts be cleansed of sin and our purposes purified from evil. Search us as with candles. Create in us clean hearts, and renew right spirits within us. Then with gladness and the voice of praise we shall greet him whose right it is to reign. Amen.

MONDAY, MARCH 2d.

Theme for the Day—The Brooding Spirit.

Scripture—And the earth was waste and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep; and the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters.—Gen. 1:2.

Thou, O Spirit, that dost prefer
Before all temples the upright heart and pure,
Instruct me, for thou know'st; thou from the first
Wast present, and, with mighty wings outspread,
Dove-like sat'st brooding on the vast abyss,
And mad'st it pregnant.

—John Milton ("Paradise Lost," I.)

Prayer—Merciful Father, our lives need recall from the waste and chaos of sin by Thy voice, and by the calm and hovering presence of the Spirit of grace. Into our hearts may he come, and may we make for him such room and such supremacy as shall give us kinship with all the holy and the pure. Bless our home, our loved ones, our daily work and our hopes for better things. May we find for ourselves the deeper springs of joy, and may Thy good presence sustain us in all the hours of trouble. We ask for Thy name's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY, MARCH 22.

Theme for the Day—The Tides of Cities.

Scripture—Who by his strength setteth fast the mountains, being girded about with might; who stilleth the roaring of the seas, the roaring of the waves, and the tumult of the peoples.—Psa. 63:6, 7.

The city is the sea,
Its waves go to and fro,
And the thunder of its waters
Rolls in the depths below.
And night is in its hollow caves,
And men go down beneath its waves.

—Marianne Farningham ("The City Sea.")

Prayer—Our Father in heaven, Thou hast set our lives in places where there is much to be done for Thee. In the quiet of remote homes, in the activity of village or town, or in the rush and roar of the city, we have still the consolation of Thy presence. Give strength, we beseech Thee, to those whose lives are cast amid the fret and worry of busy places. Save them from the lonliness of the solitary among the multitudes, and from the pressure of conflicting and compromising influences. And help us all so to use our lives that we may be worthy of a place in the City of God. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 23.

Theme for the Day—The Blessing of Sleep.

Scripture—He giveth his beloved sleep.—Psa. 127:2.

Care-charming Sleep, thou easer of all woes,
Brother to Death, sweetly thyself dispose
On this afflicted soul; fall like a cloud
In gentle showers; give nothing that is loud
Or painful to its slumbers.

—John Fletcher ("Invocation to Sleep.")

Prayer—Our gracious Lord, we thank Thee for the rest of the night. Thou art very good to us, and in Thy protection and love we find our comfort. As the day has for us its duties and blessings, so may the night bring to us the restoration of our strength for the new day. If we are sleepless, may we find refuge in Thy Word, with its glorious hopes and its counsels of grace. As our Saviour found his chief satisfaction in nights of prayer, may we count all time precious, even the hours of night, that we may spend with Thee. Amen.

THURSDAY, MARCH 24.

Theme for the Day—Progress Toward Perfection.

Scripture—Till we all attain unto the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a full-grown man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.—Ephes. 4:13.

While man knows partly but conceives beside,
Creeps ever on from fancies to the fact,
And in this striving, this converting air
Into a solid he may grasp and use,
Finds progress, man's distinctive mark alone,
Not God's, and not the beasts': God is, they are,
Man partly is and wholly hopes to be.

—Robert Browning ("Death in the Desert.")

Prayer—Our Father, Thou art the source of our life, and toward Thee our best life ever takes its way. Our Master has taught us that we are to be perfect, even as Thou art. Save us, we beseech Thee, from contentment with any lesser goal. May we crave that daily growth that brings us the increasing sense of attainment of holy things. We love Thee; may we love Thee more each day, till we meet Thee in a world without end. Amen.

FRIDAY, MARCH 25.

Theme for the Day—The Crucifixion.

Scripture—And he went out, bearing the cross for himself, unto the place called the place of a skull, which is called in Hebrew Golgotha; where they crucified him.—John 19:17, 18.

O come and mourn with me a while;
O come ye to the Saviour's side;
O come, together let us mourn;
Jesus, our Lord, is crucified.

—F. N. Fever ("Christ and the Cross.")

Prayer—Merciful Father, we stand in wonder at the foot of the Cross. Thy love, made known in the death of Jesus for the sin of the world, has given us the final proof that Thou dost count us worthy of even the highest price. May the cross draw us to the side of our Master, that as he bore our sin away, we also may be the sin-bearers for others. Help us to die to the world, that the life of Christ may be manifested in us. For His sake we ask. Amen.

SATURDAY, MARCH 26.

Theme for the Day—The Sepulchre of Jesus.

Scripture—Now in the place where he was crucified there was a garden; and in the garden a new tomb wherein was never man yet lead. There they laid Jesus.—John 19:41, 42.

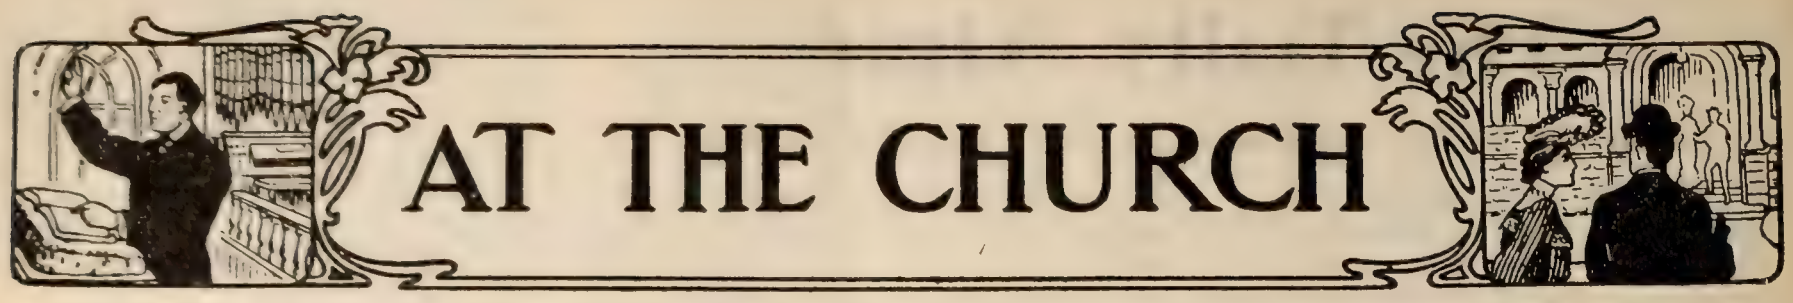
All is o'er, the pain, the sorrow,
Human taunts and fiendish spite;
Death shall be despoiled tomorrow
Of the prey he grasps tonight;
Yet awhile, His own to save,
Christ must linger in the grave.

—John Moultrie ("The Sacred Tomb.")

Prayer—Divine Father, in solemn reverence may we think of our Saviour's tomb, of his burial, and of what the world would have been if it had held him fast! In his tomb help us to lay our lesser selves, our selfish aims, our unholy thoughts; that we may henceforth not be holden of them. Then may we wait with confidence his coming back to life, in whose hands are the keys of death and the grave. Amen.

A Dream

A good Christian lady, we are told, once opened a home for crippled children. Among those who were received was a little boy three years old, who was a most frightful and disagreeable-looking child. The good lady did her best for him, but the child was so unpleasant in his ways that she could not bring herself to like him.



One day she was sitting on the veranda steps with the child in her arms. The sun was shining warm; the scent of the flowers, the chirping of the birds, and the buzzing of the insects lulled her into drowsiness. So, in the half-waking, half-dreaming state, the lady dreamed of herself as having changed places with the child, only she was, if possible, more foul and more disagreeable than he was. Over her she saw the Lord Jesus bending, looking intently and lovingly into her face, and yet with a sort of rebuke as if he meant to say: "If I can love you, who are so full of sin, surely you ought for my sake to love that suffering child."

Just then the lady awoke with a start and looked into the face of the little boy who lay on her lap. He had waked up, too, and she expected to hear him begin to cry; but he looked at her—poor little mite—very quietly and earnestly for a long time, and then she bent her face to his and kissed his forehead more tenderly than she had ever done before.

With a startled look in his eyes and a flush on his cheek, the little boy, instead of crying, gave her back a sweeter smile than she had ever seen on his face before.

From that day forth a complete change came over the child. Young as he was, he had hitherto read the feeling of dislike and disgust in the faces of all who had approached him; but the touch of human love which now came into his life swept all the neevishness and ill nature away and woke him to a happier life.

Do you know that there is no power in this world so strong as the power of love? As some one has truly said, "love is the greatest thing in the world."

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

Risen from the Dead*

The sentiment which hails the return of Easter day as a fitting reminder of the glorious fact that our Saviour rose from the dead is appropriate and helpful. To be sure it has often been mingled with observances so formal and superficial that many sections of the church have hesitated to give to it and the days immediately preceding it the emphasis that might otherwise have been accorded to a precious day in the calendar of the church. But the fact that the Greek and the Latin churches have invested the Lenten period and the Easter time with gorgeous and elaborate ceremonies ought not to prevent the Protestant churches from a due appreciation of the value of such periods in the annual calendar. For there is something deeply impressive to be found in days that bring vividly to mind the great events in Jesus' life.

The Value of Easter.

Whatever may be the grounds on which the hope of the life to come is based, it is evident that the most beautiful expression of the sentiment will evermore gather about the Easter day. There at least, so far as the period of the year and the great events of the life of Christ are concerned, we are on fairly certain ground. The Jewish Passover, which was, of course, a movable feast following the lunar rather than the solar season, gives a slight variation from year to year, but we are always aware that at the Easter time we are very close to the period that marked the great crisis in Jesus' ministry, and brought to the world its most convincing proof of the persistence of life after death.

Next to that wonderfully beautiful narrative of the interview between Jesus and Mary in the garden of the tomb, as it is recorded in the Fourth Gospel, there stands this account of the women bringing spices to the tomb of their dead Master, that they might complete at leisure the hasty offices of love in which the coming of the Sabbath sunset hour had interrupted them. The disciples were plunged in hopeless gloom; no ray of light pierced for them the darkness. But the women at least had the sad consolation of caring for the body of the great Friend who had meant for them the resetting of life in new perspectives. They could not bring him back; they had no hope that he would ever speak with them again in the old familiar ways. But they took a melancholy pleasure in pouring out their affection in these simple ministries for the lifeless body, which still seemed to them the most precious thing on earth.

The Glorious Morning.

Accordingly, early on the morning following the long, lonely Sabbath-day, they journeyed out of the city toward the tomb which had been sealed and guarded on that sad Friday evening when Jesus was laid away in the new rock-hewn sepulchre. Already the sun was rising when they reached the place. And the question they had asked themselves as they came along, Who shall roll away the stone? was still unanswered. They hoped that some attendant might be near, or perhaps the guards posted by Pilate would be good enough to assist them in their undertakings.

But to their astonishment they found the tomb was open. The stone had been rolled back in its groove. Their emotions as they looked at the open door were many and tumultuous. Had some one stolen the body away or was it still within, exposed to the rudeness of any chance passerby? They knew that the disciples had not been back to the tomb. In their heart-broken dejection they had given up all hope, and felt it useless to invite the taunts of the Roman guard posted by Pilate in case they should revisit the spot. As the women thought of these things their astonishment and alarm grew, and they hastened to the open door of the tomb to make sure of the facts.

A Message fro mJesus.

But there they were met by one who seemed to know whereof he spoke. A youth sitting quietly within the tomb assured them that the crucified was no longer there, but had come forth from the grave and would meet them in the north among the old familiar Galilean spots, where so much of his ministry had lain. Meantime they were to return at once and tell the disciples of these things.

With this injunction there was joined a word of tender sympathy and forgiveness. Probably no heart in the company of disciples was so bitterly torn as that of Peter; for to the sorrow of the general bereavement in the death of Christ there was added the anguish of personal remorse over his own panic-stricken denial of the Master. Of course, now Jesus was gone, and he did not think of him as likely to pass his way again. But if he could only have wiped out that one scene from his life, he would have been able to bear with greater composure the awful blow that had fallen upon them all. What, therefore, must it have meant to his burdened spirit to hear the wonderful news the women brought, and most of all the words which Jesus had sent to him, singling him out from all the rest for special assurance, as if he wanted no moment of uncertainty to elapse after Peter knew of his resurrection. The gracious kindliness of this message of forgiving remembrance is one of the astonishing and inspiring touches of the Gospel story. The human sympathy of the Master for his wayward and impulsive disciple was not for a moment lost in the strange transfigurement that had fallen upon his own life. He was the risen Lord, but he was still the friend and companion of these disciples.

The Return of Hope.

No wonder the women fled from the place with their souls filled with a mysterious terror, an awful consciousness of the wonder and glory of what they had seen and heard. That must have been a great moment when they came breathless into the presence of the grief-stricken disciples and overwhelmed them with the unspeakable news that Jesus was risen from the dead! It seems easy enough to tell today, when eighteen centuries have confirmed its wonder and made it the commonplace of Christian history and one of the foundation stones of our holy faith. But it was all quite different then, and none but those who have gone down into the shadow of death only to behold in some transporting moment the light of immortality breaking in waves of quiet and irresistible power upon their lives, can ever know what the disciples experienced of returning faith and supreme happiness in that hour.

The manner of Christ's rising from the dead is one of the mysteries of our holy faith whose explanations rise beyond the sphere of our knowledge. Of only one thing can we be assured, and that is that Jesus gave to his disciples such indubitable proofs of his presence and power that they went forth as men arisen themselves from the dead, to preach with confidence and heroism the great fact that he was not dead but alive, and alive for evermore. There are many hints that nature, science and philosophy give us concerning the reasonableness and probability of the continuance of life after death. But in the nature of the case there are three proofs which rise beyond all others, significant and convincing.

They are, first, the fact that beyond all questioning and misgiving the disciples were convinced that Jesus had conquered death and risen into the glory of his new life; second, the fact that death is evermore convincing us of its futility and powerlessness when those who are a part of the very fabric of our own being leave our side to enter into whatever other experiences lie beyond. It becomes increasingly real to us then that those lives at least which have been noblest and best in their influence upon us cannot have ceased to be. God is the great economist, and nothing that is worth while can perish. And how supremely worth while are some of those we have loved and still love, though they have ceased to walk with us. And the third great proof is our own sense of infinite survivals. In our best moments the truth whispers itself in our hearts that we are greater than death, through the companionship of Him who lived and died for us.

*International Sunday-school lesson for March 27. Easter lesson—The Empty Tomb, Mark 16:1-8. Golden Text, "I am he that liveth and was dead; and behold, I am alive for evermore," Rev. 1:18. Memory verses, 6, 7.

A Blessing

The Lord bless thee!
How shall he bless thee?
With the gladness that knows no decay,
With the riches that can not pass away,
With the sunshine that makes an endless day
Thus shall he bless thee,
And keep thee!
How shall he keep thee?
With the all-covering shadow of his wings,
With the strong love that guards from evil things,
With the sure power that safe to glory brings—
Thus shall he keep thee.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

Topic March 27 Getting Ready to Live Forever. Eccl. 12:1-7.

Naturally at this Easter time our faith turns to the doctrine of immortality of the soul. On the anniversary of the resurrection of our Lord, which we have long been taught is the pledge and guarantee of the immortality of our own lives, it is but natural that our minds should dwell on this the most fascinating of all themes.

The form in which the subject is stated seems to presuppose that our lives are divided into two epochs; one, our temporal life here upon earth; the other, our life after death. The former is further conceived of as the time and place of preparation for the latter. Such a classification may help us somewhat in our thinking, but as a matter of fact, the stream of our lives is hardly so disconnected. The Christian might better say, "My life is eternal. Immortality is not a matter of choice, it has been thrust upon me. In its evolution, it changes form as in death, but the same life, the same personality, the same soul continues." We do not, therefore, have a time to get ready in order that we may begin living forever at some future date. We are living forever now and will continue to do so. By the thoughts, deeds and intents of our lives from day to day, we are weaving fibers, good or bad, into the woof of our own characters.

With this conception of the problem, life in all its seriousness, looms up before us. Let us not be deluded, thinking that God by miraculous power will relieve us instantaneously and completely from the folly of our own sins. If a man abuses his body with drink, breaks down his constitution and ruins his health, and then turns to lead a better life, he will carry marks of his dissipation to his grave, though the change in his manner of living may greatly improve his health for many years. And so with our abuse of the soul. If conscience is outraged, if moral and decent laws are disregarded, although the Father willingly and gladly forgives, the mark stays on the soul. Who has ever been guilty of a foul slander, a wicked untruth, or a filthy story in earlier days that he does not remember it after years of moral and spiritual growth with deep humiliation and regret? If, therefore, we are practicing things now which in our heart of hearts we know are wrong BE SURE that they will rise up in after years, yes even when we will have passed into the great beyond, to humiliate us.

"Life is real! Life is earnest!
And the grave is not its goal;
Dust thou art, to dust returnest,
Was not spoken of the soul."

Life then presents a task of the strongest. Appearances were never so deceptive as now. The greatest dangers are the most attractive. Real temptations were never so promising and, therefore, so deceptive. The inducements for the pleasure seeker are richly gilded and alluring. The cheap music of the nickelodion, the cheaper associations of the public dance hall, the delirium of the wine room, and the dens of social vice and crime are but steps on the road to ruin. They mark the soul for all time. For all who will travel this broad high way, "evil days" will come. For such "the sun and the moon, and the stars shall be darkened," "strong men shall bow," "the daughters of music shall be brought low," and "the keepers of the house shall tremble." He who can move in the midst of all this, keep his vision clear when the white light of temptation glares in his eyes and maintain his pose when the impact of immoral forces strike him, has the heart of a hero. Such a one is living forever now.

Missions and Benevolence

Congratulations

The Brotherhood is to be congratulated upon the splendid returns from the March offering. Note the following cheering points:

1. More churches ordered March offering supplies than in former years.

2. The first nine days of March the churches gave $3,352, a gain over the corresponding nine days last year of $2,285. However, weather has been more favorable this year than last. The number of contributing churches for the first nine days of March is 150, a gain over last year of ninety-five.

3. The total receipts for nine days amounted $15,869, a gain over last year of $8,604. Of the above there were two good sized annuities.

4. Fifteen new Living-link churches have been reported, and a number more are expected, before the month closes, and after Children's Day.

5. Many of the Living-link churches have greatly increased their offerings of last year, some doubling, and even more.

All the signs are most favorable. We congratulate the missionaries, the native churches, the friends who have worked so hard and all who are vitally interested in the spread of the gospel throughout the earth.

Let the churches be prompt in forwarding their offerings. F. M. RAINS, Secretary,
F. M. RAINS, Secretary,

Echoes from the March Offering

I shall try to make our church an Every Member Church this year, and perhaps by that means we can become a living link. It is my ambition and I shall not be satisfied until I realize it.—G. L. Peters, Central Church, Springfield, Mo.

Congregation not so large as usual today, but think we shall remain in the living link class.—Levi Marshall, Minister, Hannibal, Mo.

Made a beginning last Sunday calling for $10 gifts. I have set the mark at $150. The church raised $42 last year.—Kyle Brooks, Artosia, N. H.

I feel sure that the Charleston church will take the greatest offering in its history.—G. H. Brown, Charleston, Ill.

Last year our offering was $51 and the apoprtionment this year $55. Offering yesterday more than $51 with more to follow.—M. O. J. Edgerton, Ohio.

Raised 130 per cent of our apportionment as against nothing last year, and $27 in 1908.—H. D. Webber, Morristown, Ind.

We more than doubled our apportionment.—E. W. Sears, Pontiac, Ill.

The Vine Street Church, Nashville, Tenn., P. Y. Pendleton, minister, started their offering with $320.

Cash and pledges exceed apportionment.—W. C. Pruitt, Niagara Falls, N. Y.

We hope to make $300. This is a record-breaker.—L. E. Murray, Vermont Avenue Church, Washington, D. C.

Exceeded our apportionment yesterday.—H. W. Carpenter, Shelbyville, Ind.

It looks as if our offering will go at least to $700. Quite a little in advance of last year.—Madison A. Hart, Columbia, Mo.

Total of cash and pledges yesterday, $757. We hope to raise this to $1,000.—W. J. Lockhart, Acting Pastor, Union avenue, St. Louis, Mo.

The Walnut Hills Church, Cincinnati, Ohio, A. W. Fortune, minister, becomes a living link in the Foreign Society.

Our offering yesterday was $50, doubled our apportionment, the best in the history of the church.—W. M. Mayfield, Butler, Mo.

We were apportioned $15. We raised $50. Every member gave.—O. P. Spiegal, West Point, Ga.

First Church of Christ, Sterling Place, Brooklyn, N. Y., is again a living link. Foreign mission collection yesterday over six hundred dollars, not all in.—William A. Sinclair.

We passed our apportionment the first call. Expect more.—E. J. Nickerson, Laurens, Iowa.

Offering for foreign missions from Main Street Church yesterday was $106, an average of $1.49 per member. This church is not a year old. We hope to grow substantially and rapidly until we become a living link.—Claude C. Jones, Jacksonville, Fla.

You can count upon us as a living link.—John G. Slayter, Portland avenue, Minneapolis, Minn.

I think that we will about double the March offering of last year because of the personal canvass.—William Ross Lloyd, Bellevue, Pa.

Last year Twenty-fifth Street Church, Baltimore, Md., gave $23.45. This year a little over $50 is already in and some more to come.

Reached our apportionment at Bay Christian Church.—J. H. Bovee, Bellevue, Ill.

The March Offering in Bolenge

A Letter to Chicago.

Dear Brethren of the Christian Century:

I am not addressing any one in particular because I want this to be a personal message to you all. This is personally to you Brother Morrison, Brother Willett and Brother Taylor and all of the rest of the Chicago "Boosters." I sure enough think that you are the "Boosters" for the Congo. The fellowship we enjoyed was very real to me. The expressions of sympathy were very practical and the interest was so unanimous, more so I will say that in any other town we were in in all of our travels.

The proposals of the Englewood friends in by dear wife's behalf make me realize more than ever that Christianity is still powerful in the old home-land and bridges over, yes surpasses the ties of "blood." Brethren, my heart warms to you and to my own "living link" church of Seattle and I do not worry for I know that loyal and true and warm-hearted brethren are doing their part more than ever. It makes much of the sacrifice worth while.

I want to tell you of the Bolenge Church's "March Offering."

Bolenge Church has outdone itself this time in its usual Christmas offerings. We did not have the big feast this time, there seemed to be a need for a closer fellowship and heart-searching, and so for the week preceeding the "day," we had a series of special meetings for the church only We talked about several things about which they had been remiss. Friday before Christmas we began with a special early morning prayer service, 5 a. m. There was a spirit of conviction so pronounced that many stood, one at a time, while the rest bowed in prayer for each one specifically as he confessed. This was so remarkable and there was such a desire for it that it lasted three hours and a half, adjourning to convene again at 5 p. m., when again for three hours and a half we had a service that was remarkable for its power and effectiveness. There was an evident presence of the Spirit of God. They were amazed themselves after it was over, saying this was indeed the coming of the Holy Spirit into our hearts.

This was the introduction to the "March Offering" (Christmas gifts) of the Bolenge Church. At 5 p. m., the whole church gathered in the big tabernacle (but few from the farther distant towns, and the sick not able to come being absent). After an opening exercise and prayer service, they passed around in single file, singing the songs they have learned to love so well, each placing on the tables prepared aforehand, their "birthday" offering to the Christ. In all the offerings amounted to 11,620 brass rods in goods and currency. Goats, bags of salt, chickens, brass rods in neat little packages, glasses, plates, dishes and even articles of clothing from their scanty stock from those who had no money and who wished to have a share in this wondrous service. It was most solemn, most impressing.

The joyous gladness of it all, "hilarious giving" and our own Brother McLean calls it, was the predominant note. It was good to see. Men and women who cared nothing for their fellows weal or enlightenment previously, now giving in a spirit of self-sacrifice that those who were erstwhile hereditary foes and feudal enemies, might have the same joy and "life" that they had received. You may call it what you wish; you may think of it as you may; it is a miracle of transforming grace and ours, yours and mine, is the privilege of spreading this still farther to the millions still in darkness and sin. Our prayer for you is that you may have a like joy in your "March Offering" so soon now to be consecrated.

Brethren, be true to the very heavenly vision you have had. Our God is calling us in no unmistakable way to the conquest of these people. We, your workers in Africa, are not calling for you to provide for pet schemes, but we are trembling before the great responsibility that He is giving us, a race begging for the gospel message and messengers. Men must come this year. Money must be given to enlarge or we will be held responsible! Your part, friends of the home-land, yours is what is lacking. Bolenge's little body of Christians is nobly doing a great share. It is for you to send your best sons and daughters, as your share. Oh! do it now! Could I make Matt. 9:36-38 more emphatic, I would. Men and the means for lighting up of the darkness of "Darkest Africa."

The Next Thing

Our next task, now that our great campaign in the interest of foreign missions is over, is that of providing for the widow and the orphan. Easter comes close to the first Lord's day in March. Having done well in making a generous offering for world-wide evangelism, we must complete our well-doing by a generous provision for the poor of the church; 500 unfortunate children and sixty-three aged, indigent veterans of the cross are anxiously awaiting the church's response to their appeal. Remember the saying of Jesus, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me," and therefore make your Easter offering large.

Eight aged indigent Disciples of Christ made application for admission to the Jacksonville Home in the month of February. The appeal of these worthy brethren had to be denied because first, our homes are all full, and second, if we had room we have not the means for their support. Surely the churches that stand for the return of primitive Christianity will not say to these aged brethren in distress "Be ye warmed and be ye filled." The Master says "Give ye them to eat." The Easter offering is our answer to this command.

The beautiful new $12,000 building erected in Denver for the Colorado Christian Orphanage will be dedicated on Easter Sunday. $6,000 will be needed to clear this home of indebtedness. There is a widely growing interest in the Gospel of the Helping Hand. Everybody will want fellowship in this beautiful ministry.

By the unanimous verdict of those who attended the Centennial Convention, the National Benevolent Association presented to its friends the most attractive souvenir. It is unique in design. It was artistically gotten up. It told the story of the Gospel of the Helping Hand at a glance. Everybody wanted one as a memento of the great Centennial occasion. The Association has a few thousand left. It will give these free, as long as they last, one to each person who contributes $1 or more towards the Easter offering.

Giving to the Orphan Not Stealing from Our Own

Teddy and Lee were wandering among the graves of the cemetery. Many were placing flowers on the graves of loved ones and the two little boys watched the decoration with peculiar interest. In their stroll they came to one little grave that had no slab at its head and no flowers were placed on it. Teddy, the younger brother, hastily looking about to see that no one was watching, slipped over to a grave that was covered with costly roses. He selected two beautiful flowers and holding them under his coat, crept up to the neglected grave and tenderly placed the flowers upon the tiny mound. The boys hurried away. Not a word was spoken until they were outside the gates. Then the younger said,—"That wasn't stealing, was it?" Promptly the reply came, "Course it wasn't. Don't you suppose that little baby had just as much right to a flower as some of them grown folks?" Beloved, it will not be stealing from your own if you take some of the flowers out of their lives, especially when they have so many they can not appreciate their beauty, and use them to brighten the lives of others who are friendless and lonely. Often we spend upon our own more than they need and more than is good for them. We should let them know that there are children who are cold and hungry and naked. Awaken their sympathy in behalf of such and teach them to share their good things with these unfortunates.

From an address by W. T. HILTON.

Pay the Lord

'Twas curly-headed Muriel,
Of two years and a half;
That she was having lots of fun,
We knew by her merry laugh,
With kitty, all in baby's dress;
A lovely dolly, she,
Was next to mamma's darling girl,
Or sister Marcia.

'Twas time her child should go to bed,
And say her "Now I lay!"
If kitty goes to sleep, she said,
She ought to learn to pray.
She held poor kitty in the crib,
In spite of the discord;
And said to her in firmest tones,
"Now, Kittie p'ay the Lawd."

The words kept ringing in my ears,
Of little curly head,
As much of sound advice in them,
As if by elders said.
Sometimes more hopeful subjects than
The kitten, so they say,
When asked to pay the Lord his due,
Squirm hard to get away.

Church Life

May 9-12 is the date of the state convention of Texas.

The church at El Campo, Texas, has called to its pastorate W. T. Selby, and he began work March 1.

A two thousand dollar pipe organ has been installed in the church at Jeffersonville, Ind., where M. C. Hughes is the minister.

Claris Yeuell, Paulding, Ohio, writes, "Three confessions, liberal offering for Foreign Society, Endeavor Day observed with good results; splendid prospects."

Charles S. Medbury, pastor of the University Church, Des Moines, has been invited to deliver the commencement address at Butler College in June.

Colby Hall is pastor of the University Church, Waco, Texas, and is doing a good work in the community and with the students, keeping in close touch with them.

Mr. and Mrs. R. E. Hieronymus of Eureka, will attend the Edinburgh world missionary Conference in June and visit the Passion Play at Oberammergau.

Peter Ainslie, Baltimore, Maryland, began a meeting with the Central church, Des Moines, Iowa, the sixth of March and will continue until the 27th.

The Missouri state convention will be held in Jefferson City, in June. Robert Graham, pastor of the church at Liberty, is president of the convention.

J. W. Lowber and wife began one of their social reform meetings with the First Church, Fort Worth, Texas, the first Sunday in March.

Charles W. Perry was recently ordained to the ministry by Hugh Wayt and the church at Zainesville, Ohio. Mr. Perry has accepted a call to the church at Quaker City, Ohio.

The church at Lyons, Kansas, will give four times as much for Foreign Missions this year as last. Such growth in giving speaks well for the work of the pastor, J. W. Reynolds.

The readers of the Christian Century will rejoice to know that F. D. Power of Washington, D. C., has so far recovered his health as to be able to attend services of the church.

The calendar of the church at Millersburg, Kentucky, not only announces the service of this church, but those of the other churches of the community as well. W. A. Gardner is the minister.

W. J. Lhamon goes from Humiston, Iowa, to Beaver City, Neb., for an evangelistic meeting. His work in evangelism is spoken of in the highest praise by the churches where he labors.

The Englewood Church in Chicago and the First Church, Springfield, hold the record for large giving to the anti-saloon campaign now on in Illinois. The former collected about $300 and the latter about $600 on a recent Sunday.

Everything is on the upward move at Gainesville, Texas, where Ernest C. Mobley is the energetic pastor. He is preaching regularly to audiences that fill the church building, and there are baptisms nearly every Sunday.

An error in the printer's reading of A. W. Taylor's article on Dr. Butchart two weeks ago made him say "the credulous who love Christianity more than they love a certified experience." Mr. Taylor wrote "mystery" instead of "Christianity."

The Springfield, Ill., United Brotherhood, includes the men of the three churches of the Disciples in the city. At their last meeting early in March, the men of the Stuart Street Church were the hosts. Stephen E. Fisher, pastor of the church at Champaign, Ill., was the speaker of the evening.

W. S. Johnson recently held an eighteen days' meeting with the church at Missouri Valley, Iowa, with twenty additions. This is Mr. Johnson's third meeting with this church, the second since the present pastor took charge. The church has purchased a lot and will build at once.

R. L. Prunty, pastor of the church at LaBelle, Mo., says the apportionment of the church for Foreign Missions was raised in three minutes at the close of the service the first Sunday in March. We venture to suggest there must have been three months of preparation for such quick work.

A missionary rally of the churches of Wayne and Henry counties, Ind., was held at Richmond, Ind., March fourth. The speakers were, President McLean, L. C. Howe, New Castle; T. H. Kuhn, Richmond; R. R. Eldred, Africa, Dr. J. A. Walls, Richmond.

The Memorial Church, Rock Island, Ill., now under the leadership of E. T. Mac Farland, is to continue in the Living-link class. The church has started its third mission Bible-school. There have been forty-five accessions to the Memorial Church since Mr. MacFarland began his ministry there last November.

At the farewell reception, held for evangelists Wilhite and Tuckerman at the close of their meeting with the church at Vincennes, Ind., pledges were made for $11,000.00 for the purpose of enlarging and finishing the basement of the church. It is the purpose of the church to bring the amount up to $I4,000.00.

B. Franklin Hall, who has been pastor of the church at Woodbine, Iowa, for the past five years, has been given a unanimous call to remain for the sixth year at an increase in salary. This is the sort of record that counts in a man's life work and in the growth of the kingdom.

C. L. Morrison, pastor of the church at Wellsville, Ohio, recently preached a sermon on "The Value of Character in the Life of the Individual, the Home and the City." The mayor of the city, the head of the police department and the firemen all attended in a body.

Rev. C. H. Hands, who has just come to the Disciples from the Baptist church, uniting with the church at Springfield, Illinois, has been the preacher in a meeting at Riverton, Ill. Mr. Hands sermons are highly commended as reaching to the consciences of men and impelling them to the best life. His work in Riverton is very successful.

The card gotten out by the Laymen's Missionary Convention held in Witchita, Kans., Feb. 17-20, giving a comparative statement of the strength of the churches of the city, and their offerings for home and foreign work, shows the Disciples to be the largest $1.15 per capita; the Presbyterians $1.21; the United Presbyterians, $1.61; the Baptists 63 cents; and the Disciples $1.76.

The follwing is the tabulated report of the work at Iago station, Philippine Islands, for the past year:

Whole number of patients treated	5082
Actual number of treatments and sales	9896
Number of new patients treated	1729
Number visits made to the homes of the sick	382
Number of visits made to outside towns	84
Receipts for the year	4589.22
Expenditures	pesos 4113.90

A commendable use of the daily press is made by Leroy M. Anderson, pastor of the Christian church at Honey Grove, Texas. He is editor of a small space in the paper called "Paragraph Pulpit," in which he each day writes in short and telling sermons some truth which he feels will strengthen the cause of righteousness. In a recent number of the paper the subject was "The Church and Its Twentieth Century Task."

W. T. Hilton, Greenville, Texas, at the invitation of the university, spent several days in meetings held in the auditorium of the school. One of the happy results of the meeting was that one of the best students in the university dedicated himself to the ministry of the word. Others are seriously considering the same calling. Mr. Hilton gave much time to personal conversation with the students, and enjoyed the helpful ministry.

F. M. Rains will have charge of the delication of the new twenty thousand dollar church at Amarillo, Texas, the third Sunday in March. Walter P. Jennings is the pastor of this growing congregation.

The Sunday schools of the First Christian Church, Fort Worth, Texas, and the Presbyterian church of the same city, have been in a fourteen weeks' contest for membership. The Christian church won by a majority of 109. J. E. Dinger is the hustling pastor.

L. H. Stine, pastor of the church at Aberdeen, Mississippi, gave on a recent Sunday evening an address which attracted the attention of the entire city, and was published in the daily papers with favorable comment. The subject of the address was, "The Reformers Under the Administration of the Spirit," in which he traced the development of the church from the first century to the present time, showing the progressive reformations.

The First Church, Springfield, Ill., is making careful preparation for the Laymen's Missionary Convention in that city. This church has the reputation in the city of leading in all good work, and is sustaining its reputation in this matter. The offering of the church for local option this year was $618. Dr. Hugh Morrison, editor of the parish paper, says: "We are entitled to a degree of pride that our offering was more than double that of any other local congregation."

At Everton, Ontario, where G. G. Welsman ministers, things are moving encouragingly, as shown by the following word: All branches of church work have taken on new activity, the Sunday school in particular having ended the most successful year's work in its history, both from the standpoint of attendance and other things attempted. The Y. P. S. C. E. and the Junior Mission Band gave encouraging reports. We hope for better things during the present year.

I. J. Spencer, who has been holding a series of meetings in the University Church, Des Moines, Iowa, has taken occasion while in the capital city to study its government under the commission, and will report the results of his investigation to the leaders of the progressive element of his own city, Lexington, Ky., with the hope that the same plan may eventually be adopted by that city. This is a fine illustration of the attitude of the best ministers toward the larger interest of their communities.

William Oeschger, pastor of the church at Vincennes, Ind., announces a fine program for his church and city during the next few days. March 9, Rev. A. W. Conner, made an address on "Doing Things for Boys." March 15, Harry G. Hill, the popular pastor of the Third Church, Indianapolis, gave an address on "The Church and Civic Righteousness." March 16, S. D. Dutcher addressed the church on "Financing the Kingdom." The closing address of the series was by T. J. Clark, pastor of the church at Albion, Ill.

Hugh McLellan, for many years pastor at Richmond, Ky., has been persuaded by the Central Church at San Antonio, Texas, to accept a unanimous call to their pulpit. Mr. McLellan is one of the brilliant orators of the Kentucky pulpit, and has been sought after by some of the best churches of the brotherhood. His Richmond congregation has hitherto succeeded in holding him against all comers. We predict an era of exceptional prosperity in the San Antonio church under his leadership.

J. W. Rose, is pastor of the small band of people at Belen, New Mexico, but he does not mean that the church shall remain small. He says that "Territorial Evangelist Stout" has just closed with this church the most successful meeting ever held in the town. There were twenty accessions to the church—eighty by baptism. At the close of the meeting the church pledged $150.00 for the purchase of lots, upon which to erect a new church building. Plans have been adopted for a great tabernacle meeting to be held with the church in June or July, next.

G. W. Woodbury, and the church at Belle Vernon, Pa., has just closed a meeting "with home forces," which lasted three weeks and brought thirty-one additions to the church. Mr. Woodbury has been with the church since January first and has seen the Sunday grow from an average attendance of eighty to 162. The attendance at the church services has more than doubled. "The Christian Endeavor Society has been reorganized, the prayer meeting revived, and a great outlook for additions at regular services in the future."

Special meetings are to be held at the Englewood Church, Chicago, beginning March 13. Evangelists W. J. Wright and H. S. Saxton will assist. It is not often that our stronger Chicago churches attempt the revival meeting, but the strong church at Englewood, under the leadership of C. G. Kindred, always does large things, and has the courage to face any situation. Mr. Wright announced the following sermon subjects for the first week: "What I Owe to Jesus Christ," "A Chance for Every Man," "A Venture of Faith," "A Penitent Sinner," "A Good Confession for the Soul."

W. J. Wright has been invited by the church at Enid, Okla., to preach for them during May and June, next, with a view to becoming permanent pastor of the church. It is announced that after some extensive correspondence in regard to the matter, Mr. Wright has decided to accept the invitation and will make a careful study of the field, with the probability that he will accept the call of the church. This caution which Mr. Wright is exercising in the choice of his pastorate is commendable. Were it followed more generally we should have longer and happier and more useful pastorates.

H. Erwin Stafford, whose announcements of sermon subjects has attracted our attention several times, has just made in his parish paper the announcement of the following suggestive topics for passion week, services being held each evening: General Theme, "Jesus, the Interpreter of the Real and Full Life As Needed Today." "The Man Christ Jesus," or Idea Human Life; "Jesus Our Brother," or Our Need of a Friend ;"The Ministry of Jesus," or The Debt We Owe to One Another; "They Had Been With Jesus," or The Power of Divine Companionship; "We Would See Jesus," or The Longing of the Human Soul; "What Would Jesus Do?" or Christ, the Solution of Onr Problems; "Jesus and the Young Man," or The Best Answer to Life's Greatest Question, and "Jesus the Risen Lord," or Life's Uplifting Magnet.

The Hyde Park Church, Chicago, E. S. Ames, minister, has undertaken an enterprise which, if carried to success, will be a great accomplishment for this comparatively small church. At the suggestion of the pastor, and with the sympathetic help of the missionary society of the church, the money is being raised to send two members of the church, Mr. and Mrs. Guy Sarvis, to Japan, as the living-link missionaries of the church. Mr. and Mrs. Sarvis are graduates of Drake University and have for the past two years been doing postgraduate work in Chicago. They are therefore well equipped for the very best work. To send them will cost the church twelve hundred dollars per year. The membership of the church is not more than two hundred, and it will therefore be seen that this is no ordinary undertaking, but there is at present good promise of its success.

J. C. Crosby, pastor at Wellsville, reports a splendid meeting held by W. J. Lhamon of Des Moines, Iowa, with Byron L. Burditt of Lafayette, Ind., as singer. There were forty-seven confessions and Brother Crosby speaks highly of both the evangelist and singer.

Friday evening, March 11, the Vinctus Honore Choral Society of the Central Church, Anderson, Ind., gave a great concert under the leadership of Edward Podmore. There are sixty voices in the chorus, and its work attracts the attention of the entire city.

The movement toward unifying Disciple and Baptist churches moves on apace. At Ladysmith, Wis., the two churches have agreed to unite their forces for one year, with a view to permanent union later on. The united body will be known as "Church of Christ." R. E. Stevens is the minister.

The Foster Avenue Church of Buffalo, N. Y., H. A. Baker, pastor, is at present writing in a meeting with O. L. Hull of Garrett, Ind., as evangelist and his brother as singer. An enlarged Bible school and careful preparation on the part of pastor and church make the prospects of a great ingathering good.

Hugh T. Morrison, although having received a unanimous call to continue a second year as pastor of the Union church at Bothwell, Prince Edward Island, finds it necessary, on account of the severity of the Island winters, to close his labors there and seek a different climate. His address until further notice will be 434 South Central Park avenue, Chicago, Ill.

The elders of the church at Fort Collins, Colo., have prepared resolutions expressing their regret that their pastor, J. F. Findley, is to leave them to make a trip around the world, and commending his work in the following words: "We cordially commend him to any and all people among whom he may work in the future, for his devotion to the duties of his high calling; for his irreproachable character; for his tireless efforts in behalf of the poor and sick and suffering, whether in the church or out of it, and that we extend to him our sincere good wishes for many successful years of labor in the Lord's work."

The wisdom of the old tithing system of the Jewish law, and of the early Christian church, has been again demonstrated by its operation in the First Church Terre Haute, Ind., where S. D. Dutcher is pastor. When Mr. Dutcher took this pastorate about two years ago, the congregation faced the task of building a new house of worship, and was not at all sanguine about its ability to build as it wanted to. Mr. Dutcher led in the forming of a tithing league, composed of those who would try the plan of tithing their income for at least three months. The plan worked so much to the satisfaction of the people who tried it, and to the church, that it was continued and by an increasing number of people until today there are four hnudred people in the church who give regularly one tenth of their income to religious and benevolent work, and the offerings of the church on a single Sunday morning are sometimes as high as $600.

The following word concerning some of the men recently called to New York state churches will have interest: V. W. Blair has located with the First Church of North Tonawanda and reports everything on the move. M. M. Ammunson has located with the Sterling Place Church of Brooklyn and reports eight additions recently, a men's brotherhood class of thirty, and all departments advancing. D. H. Patterson has located with the church at Gloversville and reports from there show that both pastor and church are happy in the new relationship. C. M. Kreidler has located with the church at Elmira and very hopeful reports have been received. Bayard Craig has become pastor of the Lenox Avenue Church and things are moving in the right direction. G. H. Steed has assumed the pastorate of the Tabernacle Church of North Tonawanda. A recent decision day resulted in nine additions to the church. Mr. Bower remained two weeks after the coming of the new pastor, with the result that there was no break in the work, a very commendable thing to do.

Follow the International Lesson Committee

Every informed Sunday-school worker desires to have the graded system introduced into his school. But it seems like too big an undertaking to grade the school all at once. Hence nothing at all is done, and the school goes on in the same old absurd way of teaching the children the lessons provided for grown-up people.

The International S. S. Committee has made it possible to bring the graded system in, like the Kingdom of God comes, "without observation." You can have your school graded without any agony—almost without knowing it, except in its beneficent results. Begin at the bottom now—with the elementary grades, the pupils under twelve years old. Provide teachers and pupils with the Bethany Graded Lessons, based on the outlines already authorized by the International Committee. Later on—perhaps in nine month or a year from now—when the Committee authorizes an outline of lessons for the Intermediate grades you will be ready to adopt them and the Bethany Series will be ready with the helps for you. And so on, through the Senior and Advanced grades, follow the International Committee and as fast as they provide the lessons you will be ready to adopt them.

Our advice to all schools, then, is: FOLLOW THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE. No independent course yet devised is better than that provided by the International Committee, if indeed there is one so good in all respects. Besides, there is advantage in the whole Sunday-school world studying together when our leaders really lead—as the International Committee is now doing.

The Bethany Graded Lessons may be commenced at any time. Purchase the main bulk of your supplies wherever you wish, but let us furnish you these fascinating lessons for your pupils under twelve. THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO., 700 East Fortieth Street, Chicago.

E. E. Violett started March 5 on a trip to the Holy Land. He will return in the autumn.

Lou D. Hill is in a growing meeting with the church at Vernon, Ill. The church is a child of the state society.

Walter L. Martin, of Mitchell, Neb., has accepted a call to the church at Douglas, Ariz., and will begin work at once.

S. G. Fisher, pastor, and the church at Walla Walla, Wash., are in a meeting led by C. H. Hilton of Milton, Oregon.

Joseph Keevil, pastor of the Second Church of Brooklyn, is leading that church in preparation for special meetings in May.

It is announced that the Jefferson Street Church, Buffalo, N. Y., is planning to erect a gymnasium and an institutional work shop.

Marion H. Gerrard, minister of the church at Saginaw, Mich., is enlisting the men of his church and community in definite work for the church.

The Fifty-fifth St. Church, New York, will soon move into the new property which they have just purchased on West Eighty-first streets.

Z. L. Lobdell, pastor of the church at Chico, Calif., has been leading the First Church, Sacramento, in a meeting with fine results.

The church at Niagara Falls, W. C. Prewitt, pastor, is placing emphasis on evangelistic effort in connection with the regular services with splendid results.

Bayard Craig, minister of the Lenox Avenue Church of New York City reports twenty-two additions and all departments of the work advancing.

The church at Rockford, Ill., has called W. B. Clemmer as its pastor to succeed W. D. Ward, who resigned recently to accept a call to Ohio.

"The Service and News Bulletin" is the name of the parish paper of the church at Weatherford, Texas, where Owen Livengood ministers. It is a neatly printed leaflet.

C. H. McCord is now pastor of the church at Oskaloosa, Ill., succeeding S. H. Zendt. Mr. McCord came from the pastorate of a Presbyterian church in Marshalltown, Iowa, about a year ago.

A reception was given Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Devoe by the church at Mason City, Iowa, recently, in which they heartily welcomed their new pastor to their fellowship and their tasks.

At Sterling, Colorado, where W. B. Harter ministers, we have a growing church. Many people are going into the northeastern section of Colorado and there is a bright future before the Disciples there.

J. E. Cresmer has resigned his pastorate at Valley Junction, Iowa, and will close his work there the last Sunday in March. Mr. Cresmer will become managing editor of a daily paper in Kalamazoo, Michigan.

A. McKenzie Meldrum has been elected to the pastorate of the church at Athena, Oregon. Mr. Meldrum closes a two years' pastorate at Pendleton, Oregon, to accept the work at Athena.

F. F. Grim, corresponding secretary for West Texas and New Mexico, has been holding a meeting in the Baptist church at Estancia, N. M. It is his purpose to lead in the organization of a church of the Disciples.

The annual report of the church at Eureka, Ill., shows $8,504.90 raised for all purposes. This includes $900.00 for parsonage improvement. Total gifts to missions and benevolences, $4,392.28. David H. Shields is pastor.

After two years of service at Paxton, Ill., S. Elwood Fisher has resigned to accept a unanimous call to serve the church in Dixon, Ill. He feels that prospects are bright at Dixon for a good work. He will close work at Paxton April 30.

W. E. Ellis, pastor of the Cynthiana church, will assist William D. Ryan and his congregation at Ashland, Ky., in a series of revival services, to begin April 3. The Ashland church will soon break ground for a new $35,000 house of worship.

The First Christian Church of Colorado Springs, Colo., has contracted for a pipe organ to cost $3,350 and to be installed by the beginning of the tourist season. For about fourteen years this object has been the ambition of the church. Mr. Carnegie donates $1,250 of the amount. The offering for foreign missions will exceed the apportionment of $200. The Laymen's Missionary convention was a great success in the Springs. The church is enjoying a healthy growth under the leadership of the pastor, George B. Stewart.

At the close of the fourth year of the ministry of W. H. Bagby with the church at Missoula, Montana, the chairman of the church board made to the church a statement of the work that had been accomplished during this successful pastorate. During the last year the church has raised through all channels, $3,500. Fifty-seven members have been received into the membership of the church. The Sunday-school has an enrollment of 150, and is noted for its wide awake work. "'A good growing Young Peoples Society, a large active Ladies' Aid Society, and Auxiliary to the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, are notable factors in the church life." During the past four years 126 names have been added to the church roll, and the present membership of the church is 171. "In results achieved the past year has been one of the best in the history of the church."

As We Go to Press

Canton, Ohio, March 13—Began an eight day meeting this morning; the Kendalls assisting; P. H. Welsheimer preaching. Forty-eight added today, 1603 in Sunday-school. Katherine Stants pastoral helper.—P. H. Welsheimer.

Moberly, Mo., March 13.—Closed great twenty days' meeting with home forces at Central tonight with 130 additions, seventy-two by conversion. Many adults and heads of families. Church united, happy and preparing for great things.—S. Boyd White.

Kansas City, Mo., March 12—We just closed Missouri meetings at Lockwood and Salisbury with over 150 additions. Plea presented powerfully, plainly and persuasively by Evangelist Richard Martin. Urged to return for another campaign.—Martin Family.

Larned, Kan., March 13.—We are in a splendid meeting here with the well known evangelist, James Small, and Edward McKinney as singer. There have been forty-six added first week. Great crowd and deep interest. W. R. McCrea is our able minister. He is a busy man in the meetings. We continue with great prospects.—W. H. Hoffhins.

Chattanooga, Tenn., March 13.—Closed at Newark, Ohio, with 219 additions in fifteen days of invitation. New members pledged $700 to the current expense funds. We began here Wednesday with I. M. Boswell. Twenty-six additions the first day of invitation. We continue with bright prospects. Tapp and Lewis are doing fine work.—W. T. Brooks.

Lockwood, Mo., March 7.—Dade county's greatest meeting. Richard Martin, evangelist, of the Martin family leading. Over fifty additions already, mostly adults by confession and baptism. Greatest crowds, most perfect attention. Evangelist wise, tactful, kind, educated, eloquent and strong on Scripture. Four special meetings filled greatest auditorium here each time. Sunday collections meeting all expenses. Continue another week. Home forces helping gloriously.—Elder J. T. Arbegasit.

Kansas City, Mo., March 13.—Ninety-six added today. Was with the great Independence Boul. Sunday-school this morning. George P. Taubman, superintendent; Dr. Combs, pastor. Thirty-five responded to the invitation. Then came back to Linwood Boulevard, reaching sixty-one here today and 382 in all to date. Church board unanimously requested us to continue another week, but we are one month behind schedule, hence must close Monday. Dedicate building in Pendleton, Ore., next Sunday and continue one week en route to Tacoma, beginning the 27th. Have greatly enjoyed the fellowship of Dr. Jenkins here. He is a true yoke-fellow and the Linwood Boul. Church is a great church in a great field. We regret seriously our inability to stay on. This is the largest meeting ever held in a Kansas City church.—Chas. Reign Scoville.

In order to meet the great demand for Sample Copies of the Bethany Graded Lessons the publishers have decided to send out Returnable samples of the complete line of supplies—Beginners', Primary and Junior—(excepting the large Beginners' pictures). Accompanying the samples a bill will be sent for $1.09, the regular price of the set. The recipient may do one of three things: (1) He may return the samples uninjured after examination. (2) He may remit $1.09 and keep the samples. Or (3) he may return the bill with his Sunday school's order for supplies and the publishers will mark it "paid." In writing for sample copies please say "Returnable."

A Large Offering is Needed at Easter for Orphanage Work in Mission Fields

For the past three years the National Benevolent Association and the Young People's Department of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions united in a joint appeal at Easter to all our Bible Schools, Mission Bands and Intermediate and Junior Societies of Christian Endeavor for offerings in behalf of Orphanage work in this and other lands. This year the National Benevolent Association has decided that it will be wiser that they and the Young People's Department do not unite in a joint observance of Easter, but that each make its own appeal for its own work.

The Young People's Department of the C. W. B. M. supports six large Orphanages and one Babies' Home in foreign lands in which hundreds of boys and girls who have been rescued from idolatry and other sins of heathen lands are loved, cared for and fitted for efficient service in the Kingdom of our Lord. There are no Christian Homes in mission lands in which to place orphan children, so those taken by our missionaries must be kept and supported in our Orphanages until they are grown, thus giving an opportunity for fitting them for service. In addition to maintaining the hundreds of orphan children we must erect a new building for our Girls' Christian Orphanage in Porto Rico. The old building that was used for an Orphanage was examined and condemned by the officials of the city where it is located. So our girls had to be taken out at once. A new building that is substantial and commodious should be erected in the spring.

We give a few telling testimonials to the value of our Orphanage work from some of our leading workers:

I know of nothing in the way of foreign mission work which is being more used of God to advance the kingdom than the care of orphan children; these helpless ones are saved from their awful condition and at the same time led to Christ and trained under the missionary tutelage for future service in the church. STEPHEN J. COREY.

Orphanage work is a process and requires continuous and extended support. Results justify the expenditure. Orphanages furnish workers. Maintain the orphanages and Christianity in heathen lands will some day begin to "work from the inside." E. C. DAVIS.

God is no respecter of persons and one orphan child is as near His herd as another, we might argue. But we remember the parable of the one lost sheep and the ninety and nine; and surmise that the orphan in the heathen land lies heavy upon the heart of God. In the homeland there is apt to be a heart to love and a hand to help it somewhere? But in the darkness of heathenism its pitiful cry is most likely to reach no willing ear. What can it do but die? No more beautiful work can engage our hands than to help care for God's little ones who have no friend but Him. MARION STEVENSON.

I can conceive of nothing so beautiful in all the activities of the church as that which our C. W. B. M. is doing in their orphanage work in the foreign field. It is going to the head waters of the heathen races and means the uplifting of those races to such planes of life and service as promises their redemption to God for the good of others.

PETER AINSLIE.

Taking orphan children from the conditions in which they are usually found in heathen lands and placing them in Christian Orphanages and Schools is one of the most beautiful ministries done to mankind, and I doubt if anyone could do anything more pleasing to the Master than the taking of helpless orphans out of surroundings that are detrimental to their moral growth, and placing them where the environments would be of a tendency to make them nobler, better men and women. This of course is not only helpful in an individual sense, but in a collective sense as well. R. A. LONG,
Kansas City, Mo.

Orphanage work in foreign lands appeals to me as a most important phase of our present activities. Here in this favored land the call for such work is most urgent. What must it be in the darkened lands beyond the civilization and Christianity and prosperity which we enjoy here at home! You can hardly put too much emphasis upon this call to our people. C. J. TANNAR,
Detroit, Mich.

The greater future good, at least present expense, can be wrought for God and humanity by the orphanage work on foreign lands.
CHARLES A. YOUNG,
Oakland, Cal.

A Christian Young Woman in Bengal, India.

No investment can yield larger returns than that in an individual life. To take a little child from heathenism and transplant him into a Christian home where he can develop amid conditions making for the largest possible Christian life is nothing short of divine. Other gifts he may lose, but the gift of life —real life, the "life that is hid with Christ in God," remains as his permanent possession, a source of constant joy to himself and the greatest asset to the church which made that life possible.

HOWARD T. CREE, Augusta, Ga.

Our Orphanage work in foreign lands is a feature of missionary effort that takes strong hold of every heart that has any capacity for sympathy; any desire for service or any power to love. The appeal is irresistible. Especially is this true when related to countries less favored than our own. Such work raises our holy faith high in the estimation of the world without and wins approval of the One we care most to please—Jesus Christ our Lord.

E. RICHARD EDWARDS.
Kokomo, Ind.

Nothing on this earth affects my heart so much as the needs of children. With Victor Hugo I can say, "Even about the rags of childhood, there hangs a halo." When we consider what Christians owe to non-Christian lands, I believe there is no one department of our work so rich and prompt in its returns, as our Orphanages. Remember the golden words of the Great Teacher when He said, "Unless ye become as little children."

REBEL WITHERS,
Ocoee, Fla.

To take a child from the midst of heathenism, and train up this child in the way it should go, leading it to Christ, giving it education and culture, and then sending back a full grown Christian man or woman to his or her own people—it looks like the leaven that is to leaven the whole lump. Surely no work can be greater than such a work, and may the Lord raise up multiplied thousands to assist you in thus doing the King's work in the King's way.

CHARLES REIGN SCOVILLE.

The key to the situation in any land is the child. The training that the children receive in the orphanages supported by the C. W. B. M. in heathen lands, means much for the future. These children so trained will become light bearers among their benighted people. The children in the home land should every one help this work. Easter will afford a special opportunity for helping. Let every Church do its duty on that day. WILLIAM OESCHGER,
Vincennes, Ind.

If, in our own home land, where the historical proofs of Christianity are accessible, the best apologetic the Church can give to the world is its unselfish work in behalf of humanity, how much more must this be true in those lands where Christianity is now being introduced? Every child rescued from dire want, disease and neglect and trained to intelligent and useful manhood or womanhood, becomes a "living Epistle" certifying to the beneficent influence of the Christian religion and to its divine origin.

J. H. GARRISON.
St. Louis, Mo.

I do not know anything, technically of orphanage work in foreign lands. Its appeal to the Christian heart of America ought to be immediate, and the response ought to be generous. I can hardly think of any work in connection with foreign missionary enterprise that comes with greater insistence, and at the same time is a most beautiful and gracious ministry. There can be no two opinions about so simple a proposition. There are some enterprises that stand out so clearly on inherent merit, that you need only to say "Look!" and you are forever more pledged to the support of them.

E. L. TOWELL.

From such information as I have been able to get, it would seem to me that not only the spiritual interests but the physical welfare of the children in heathen lands depends upon the substantial maintenance of our orphanage work. And it is of the most supreme importance in the evangelization of the world that these who have been nurtured and trained under close inspection and through years of companionship of missionaries shall go out among their own people strengthened by force of habit and convinced through experience of the value of Christ in the life, to speak the message each in his own native tongue. In my estimation no work is more important. FINIS IDLEMAN,
Des Moines, Ia.

Pioneers in Union

C. C. Morrison preached at Monroe, Wis., Sunday, March 6, in the Union Church, whose pulpit is made vacant by the recent resignation of the pastor, J. H. Berkey. This union church is well known throughout the brotherhood for its pioneer efforts in bringing about the unification of two congregations—Baptists and Disciples—some five years ago. Mr. Berkey had been the pastor of the Disciples Church for nearly five years when he resigned and removed to a distant state. Later his old congregation recalled him to its pulpit and he made his acceptance conditional upon the uniting of the immersion-practicing congregations of the town. Under his leadership overtures were made and the details worked out for the organization of the "Union Church in Christ." In the union compact it was provided that all missionary offerings be divided equally between Baptists and Disciples, that the Lord's Supper be observed on the first Sunday of each month, that delegates be elected to both Baptist and Disciples' conventions and that the church house owned by the Disciples be leased to the union congregation. For five years this work has gone on in peace and blessing. Mr. Berkey as pastor has emphasized constantly the deeper fundamentals of the gospel ignoring the petty differences that cause division. He has been a leader in every cause of righteousness in his community, and holds the respect of all Christian people. The prohibition party recently called him to head their ticket as a candidate for governor of Wisconsin. He will be engaged after May 1 in lecture work for the temperance cause. In any community where Baptists and Disciples are striving to break down their sectarian walls Mr. Berkey's aid would be invaluable. Such communities should send for him and allow him either by a protracted meeting or personal counsel to contribute his experience to the effecting of union. The church at Monroe offers a splendid opportunity for a vigorous and broad-visioned man to accomplish a great work.

A True Story from the Lecture Platform

The chairman of the lecture committee was a very absent-minded man, and when he had reached that portion of his introduction of the Eminent Lecturer wherein it was fitting that he should mention the name of the honored visitor he forgot it completely, and in the hope that it would return unto him, began to spar for time:

"When I say that it is a household word all over this broad land of ours, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the Penobscot to the Gulf, I make no mistake. When I say that it is the name of one of the Princes of Literature, I but do its honored bearer scant justice. When I say that in oratory the mere mention of it calls to our minds the days of Demosthenes, I but speak the simple truth."

Still the name did not come.

"And to think that he is with us here tonight! To think that I should be privileged to stand upon this platform here, in this town, with—ah—with him!"

Still no glimmer of the Immortal Name.

"I can hardly believe it, and yet my eyes tell me that he is here. My very being echoes to his honored name. My spirit rejoices that one like this should pause in the midst of his inspired labors to be our guest tonight."

Identity of gentleman still elusive.

"My friends, in a life-time of happiness, and I may say of honor, among you, I have known no happiness, attained no no! I will not speak the name, for is it not graven in letters of golden fire on all our hearts? It is. And so, let me say to you simply, but in all sincerity, that he is here, that we are privileged to look upon him, to hear his voice, to drink in the wisdom of his utterances and the splendor of his eloquence."

The Resurrection of Christ

The Solid Ground of the Easter Hope

This great theme, perhaps the most impressive of all the facts of early Christian evangelism, is significant at this moment for the double reason that it appropriately concludes the series of studies we have been making in the field of Jesus' work of miracle, and also because it is the overshadowing consideration of the Easter season. In accordance with our plan of investigation of this side of Jesus' work, it is our first privilege to consider the facts as they are set down in the early Christian documents.

The earliest witness of the New Testament to the resurrection of Jesus is found, not of course in the Gospels, but in the writings of the Apostle Paul, most of which antedate all of the Gospel records. The Resurrection is one of the most familiar and outstanding themes of Paul's preaching and writing. Throughout the record in Acts, which describes in the language of another the evangelism of the great missionary, Paul preached everywhere the return of Jesus from the dead. Perhaps in later years the fact of the sacrificial death of Christ, at first so difficult to explain to Jews and Greeks, occupied a larger place in the apostle's thought, but the resurrection was never for a moment lost to sight. And its evidential value was regarded as easily first in the apologetic of Christianity.

Paul seems to have laid no stress upon any particular theory regarding the manner of the resurrection. As a Jew he naturally accepted the doctrine of physical revival, without which it was difficult for one of Semitic training to realize the possibility of any survival of death. On the other hand, to men of Greek training the physical resurrection seemed a repulsive and impossible belief, although immortality had long been a tenet of their schools. The effort to reconcile the thought of Jewish Christians to the larger fact of the future life without the presence of the body that had been left behind, is evident in Paul's great utterance in First Corinthians 15, which is, to be sure, a mild, but unquestionably a definite, departure from accepted Jewish belief in the return of the old body from the grave.

When one comes to the Gospels the same facts are observed. There is a clear and definite insistence upon the resurrection of Jesus, with a puzzling vibration between two different conceptions of the way in which he was manifested to his disciples.

Unfortunately the earliest of the Gospels, Mark, gives us no record of the resurrection. It assumes it, and seems about to begin the actual description of the event, after stating that the women at the tomb were assured by an angel that Jesus was risen. Then it breaks abruptly off. The fragment that has become attached to the end of Mark's Gospel is from some other hand, and therefore worthless beyond the fact that it agrees with the general tradition of the first group of witnesses.

In the other two synoptic Gospels we have, however, explicit testimony to a number of features regarding the resurrection of Jesus. These fall into two groups, bearing evidence of coming from different sources even where they are at times embodied in the same paragraph. On the one side we have what seems a definite and consistent story of the physical resurrection of Jesus, in the body which suffered on the Cross, although none of the records states in explicit terms that Jesus came forth from the tomb. But the implication is clear. The women at the tomb find the stone rolled away. They learn that Jesus has departed alive from the sepulchre, and that he is to meet his disciples in Galilee in the near future. This is in substance the testimony of the first Gospel.

In Luke other incidents of similar character are recorded. The stone has been rolled away and the body is gone. Two men in white announce that the Lord is risen. And Peter, hearing the strange news, runs to the tomb. Later on Jesus meets the disciples and shows them his hands and feet, insisting that he is not a spirit as they feared, but a veritable man. He eats before them, and later still is taken up bodily out of their sight. To the same effect is the story of the ascension as given in Acts.

All these facts speak of a physical resurrection, a bursting of the tomb, a baffling of the guards set by Pilate, and a return in full physical power to the life of the world.

But side by side with these details, and in some instances interwoven with them, without regard for the difficulties thus involved, there is a variety of phenomena which seems definitely suggestive of an immaterial, unearthly, mysterious manifestation of Jesus, in a manner so elusive and yet so convincing that the disciples were held in the grip of wonder and alarm, even while they could not doubt that their Master had conquered death.

In these narratives Jesus walks among the disciples without being known. The two friends on their way to Emmaus are joined by an apparent stranger, who is only revealed to them by his familiar gestures and words at the moment when they join in the evening meal; and at that moment he disappears from their eyes. To the ten disciples gathered in the upper room behind bolted doors Jesus suddenly appeared in a manner so unearthly that they hardly knew him, and were sure it must be a spirit.

But it is in the Fourth Gospel especially that this phase of the post-resurrection manifestation of Jesus is most prominent. Mary of Magdala, who perhaps had most cause to know and love the Lord, met him in the garden but did not recognize him. When at last he had made himself known to her, and she would have thrown herself at his feet, he charged her not to touch him, as if some mysterious element separated him entirely from those whom he had known and loved. To the disciples in the upper room Jesus was manifested in the same mysterious and unaccountable way; and once again when the questioning Thomas is present. On both these occasions Jesus enters in a manner beyond the comprehension of the disciples. And though to Thomas he offered the privilege of inspecting the sacrificial wounds, yet that disciple, over-awed by the mystery and majesty of Jesus, could only prostrate himself with the words, "My Lord and my God."

At the seaside Jesus again met some of the disciples after an interval of time. And thougn he stood upon the shore as the boat drew to land, they could not recognize him. But something in his bearing, or some familiarity in his words, made them whisper one to another in awed surprise, "It is the Lord!" Yet in this whole interview by the sea they seemed to be dealing with one who was both a friend and a stranger. His appearance and conduct were so mysterious that they could hardly believe it was really their Master. And yet the deeper evidence of his words, his commanding and assurred behavior toward them, and the spell he cast over their hearts, held their lips when they would have asked him "Who art thou?" for they knew it was the Lord.

Linked with these narratives are the appearances of Jesus to Stephen and to Paul, where no physical survival is credible, but such spiritual recognition as even men who had never seen him in the flesh, could enjoy.

These two sets of facts, so simply and advisedly set down upon the pages of the New Testament, seem to be the best of proofs that in the earliest circle of believers there was mingled the assured confidence that Jesus was alive from the dead, with a certain wavering of thought as to how his return had been accomplished. The fact was not obscure, but the manner of it was beyond precise statement. They knew that Jesus was alive, and alive for evermore. He had manifested himself to them so convincingly that their minds never doubted the great fact. But when the question arose as to the way in which this marvel of his triumph over death had been accomplished, there were various views, and a resulting hesitance of word.

In the development of Christian doctrine each of these sets of phenomena has received at times strong emphasis. There have been periods in which the church has united in urgent defense and explicit statement of the physical resurrection of Jesus. There have been other times when this side of the question fell into obscurity, and

The Conservation of Child Life

There was held at Clark University last July a conference of workers for the welfare of children. It was called under the initiative of Dr. G. Stanley Hall, the well known authority on child psychology and related matters. Most of the notable workers in the world of child life were there and it was decided to effect a cooperation for the good of the work. This cooperation will prevent duplication of effort, waste of resource, misunderstanding of aims, bring the strength that comes from unity and utilize all the power of public opinion that a firmly united group of workers can arouse. It will conduct research that its recommedations for help may be wise and the work of the various agencies most far reaching. It will be scientific in method and endued with the philanthropic spirit. The contribution of one dollar will make any one a member of the Conference and bring the proceedings to his table. Any larger contributions will be well used in promoting the work. The official address is The Child Conference for Research and Welfare, 936 Main St., Worcester, Mass. Dr. Henry S. Curtis is the secretary.

This Conference correlates the efforts of twenty-seven different organizations, all working for the common end of aiding children who need. It includes those who are interested in the child labor problem, the problem of the child offender, the school attendance problem, that of the orphan and the outcast, and the work of the Conference urged upon Congress the necessity of establishing bureaus of the government. Surely if it is wise for the government to conduct scientific departments for the study of agriculture and horticulture, to learn how to grow more wheat and better cattle, finer apples and more varieties of vegetables, it is wise also to conserve child life by governmental means.

The End of Lamaism

The Chinese have occupied Lhasa and reports received in England have it that they have looted the monastaries of their great treasures and even the Buddhist Holy of Holies of its idol, the most valuable in existence, made of heavy gold with the most costly of jewels for decoration. An effort seems to have been made to capture the Dalai Lama, the revered head of Thibetan Buddhism, but he escaped over the Indian border to Darjeeling in the Himalaian mountains. His person is sacred to the Thibetans and to millions of Buddhists and for political reasons the British Government in India will guard him closely and offer him a residence in Calcutta but will quarrel between him and the Chinese.

Thibet has for many centuries been regarded by China as a satrapy and has been required to send a caravan to pay tribute to Pekin every three years. China has not always been able to enforce this demand but of late years has done so and has partially ruled at Lhasa through a Chinese Resident. She guaranteed the treaties with England made by the Younghusband expedition and in other ways enlarged her authority within the past two or three years. In 1908 the Dalai Lama made an official journey to Pekin where he asked for a royal reception but was denied it and hustled out of the country. This was doubtless meant as an official intimation that he could no longer be looked upon as the civil overlord of Thibet. Now that he is out of the country, either the Chinese will have to assume arbitary rule, the Thibetan chiefs will have to change their creed to permit another ruler appointed before the death of the "Divine One," or there will be anarchy there on "The Roof of the World."

Thibet was one of the last countries to be opened to the outside world, if indeed it can properly be so considered yet. Travelers have journeyed through it at peril of their lives until of late years, and even then none have been allowed to come near the sacred city of Lhasa. Peter Rhijnhart lost his life while nearly two-hundred miles from the city. His wife escaped after terrible perils, afterward returning to take up the missionary vigil on the Chinese border. Miss Anna Taylor waited for years on the outpost, preparing for the entry that she knew must come some time. The Moravians have had sentinels at Darjeeling for thirty years and have gathered a few converts whom they are teaching for work when it is possible for them to cross over the border among their own folk. Sven Hedin has made the most extensive explorations ever made in the land, his last journeys being very successful, traversing the entire land. Colonel Younghusband's expedition forced its way to Lhasa to compel respect for trading rights, and opened the sacred city to the eye and camera of the white man. Our missionaries are now at Batang on the Chinese border holding thus one of the most remote stations in the world.

The effect of the Chinese occupation will doubtless hasten the day of missionary occupation though it need not necessarily be expected immediately. China will be more anxious about trade than missions and the prejudice of the Thibetans may delay any opening of missionary doors. One Thibetan lad out of every seven is said to be compelled to become a Lama or priest. If China breaks up the Lamasaries and puts thousands of them into the common life and introduces industry and trade and turns the people from their nomadic habits somewhat she may do them good. But China is more likely to rule with Pekin in view, and the benefit to the Thibetans may prove to be at a great cost of life and freedom. Like the wind they may tear the coat from the back in shreds. The missionary, like the sun, would take it from his back by the gentle arts of self help.

Despising the Toiler

J. E. Hurley, General Manager of the Sante Fe R. R. expressed some frank opinions in his testimony before the Illinois State Board of Arbitration in the Chicago hearings on the switchmen's strike. Frank is a demure, kindly word to use to describe this gentleman's candor in expressing his opinions. Brutally frank better benefits the description and the adverb better characterizes the description than does the adjective. He said "I think twelve or thirteen hours a day not too long for the men to work. It is just as good for their families." The great man evidently has in him the blood of tyrants. The sunshine of fortune's favor has not softened his nature much. His nature has been of the quality that is hardened by sunshine rather than made fertile for all good and heartfelt things. Mr. Hurley may have worked his way up. If so it would be good if he could work his way down again and earn a living at a few cents per hour by working more than one half all his working hours with overtime most of the time and then let the judgment be passed that he was so unfit for the liberties of a few hour's rest that his family needed protection from him, and a great charity was done his wife and little ones when he was kept away from home. It may be so of some switchmen just as it may be true that some General Managers would fittingly grace a felon's cell for their lordly disdain of the land's law. Mr. Hurley despises the lowly evidently. He thinks them made of mud while he is of finer clay. He takes himself and his good fortune as a special gift of God to his day and generation and does humanity a favor when he deprives the less fortunate in brain and opportunity of the spare hours wherein they might better their mental and moral selves and give their families some of that presence that fatherhood ought to imply. His judgment is an insult to every working man in the land. He judges them all by the worst he finds among them.

A Better Day in Madagascar

Madagascar was won by great tribulation. The intrepid men who crossed from the Zulu country of South Africa two generations ago met with determined opposition. Though a progressive King seemed anxious for news of the outside world he was jealous of his prestige and authority and would not allow any teaching of religion. What he would accept was taught and the way thus opened for the larger lessons. In time it was possible to teach them and in due course large numbers were won to Christianity.

A bitter persecution broke out under Queen Ranavolona. Thousands suffered death in the most barbarous manners. They were impaled on steaks, flung over a great cliff, boiled in oil, decapitated, sold into slavery, imprisoned, flogged, deprived of their homes and livelihood, and suffered every persecution a savage mind could ingeniously conjure for their affliction. Yet at the end of the quarter century of her presecution there were four times as many Christians as when she began. They wandered in the woods, lived in the caves, concealed their faith, held secret meetings in face of death for so doing, and both so lived and preached their secret faith that converts were won in the very household of the ruler. After her death a Christian queen was crowned and the cause prospered. The Hovas are a splendid people of the Malaisian rather than the negroid type. Their representatives visited this nation and Britian some years ago to protest against the subjugation of their country by the French. They were cultured, courteous gentlemen but they failed. For nations that themselves make subject peoples cannot well protest when their sisters desire to do so and the Malagasy cause was lost.

The French are generally favorable to Catholic missions in their dependencies but rarely do Protestant missions receive just protection. When they took over some of the South Sea groups from England the missions that had made the islands places of peace where there was once but unspeakable savagery, practically lost their heritage. In southern China the government of "Equality, Liberty, Fraternity" so favored the claims of Catholic prelates that the Chinese government was compelled to grant them civil powers and ranks in which a bishop was equal to a Viceroy. In Madagascar discriminations began with the coming of the French governor. The mission schools were arbitrarily closed in many places and the policy has been pursued until but 300 remain. M. Augagneur stated his determination to suppress these also. The churches have been closed under various pretexts. His madness has not been against Protestantism alone but against religion and the Catholics have been shown few favors under his administration.

He has recently been at home making a defense of his polisy but it resulted in his defeat. The London Missionary Society, the mother of missionary Madagascar, presented so strong a case to the new government in Paris and was so admirably backed by the British ministry that this modern Saul has been recalled and a fair minded administrator in the person of M. Cor appointed to take his place. This era of less savage, but nevertheless brutal, persecution of the native church finds a Christian community of 147,000 ready to urge their common faith with more zeal than ever. The deposed governor made no apologies for his work but boldly stated that "the work of disengaging the natives from their Protestant missionaries is almost finished" and is said to have declared he would destroy Christianity on the island. His zeal may yet make it a more completely Christian nation.

How Germany Makes Socialists

Berlin has been the scene of riots of late and through them Germany has been making more socialists. An American student landed in Leipsic one evening just at dusk and while hungrily awaiting his supper was stumbling as best he could through an evening daily. There he saw for the first time news of McKinley's assassination. He was horrified and engaged the proprietor in conversation about the matter, striving for more information, having been across country on his wheel for some days. Mine host told him little of the news but roundly anathematized our country, England and Switzerland for harboring anarchists and brought his wrath to climax by declaring we but received our deserts when they killed our presidents. The indignant student reminded him that all the anarchist assassins were made in Germany and other lands where the policy of repression was pursued and we were compelled to suffer for their sins.

So Germany is exceedingly mad against the socialists and in her imperious hate represses their rights of speech and suffrage and thus compels all who love liberty to turn to socialism as their only recourse. Dangerous political doctrines have short shrift where they are allowed to expose their subtleties and false theories. Suppression but prepares for an explosion, for the opinions of men, like volatile gases, are safest in the open. There are three and one-half million socialists in Germany. As suffrage is limited to men of twenty-five and over, it is safe to say that there are quite one-half the German people in full sympathy with the Social Democratic party. However, the representation to the Reichstag is so gerrymandered that they get but about one-third the representation an equal division would entitle them to, while the Centrists, the Roman-Catholic party get one-half more than it would entitle them to. This is done by giving the cities where the workers dwell, small representation as compared with the country where, as in Germany, Catholicism is strong.

In Prussia the qualifications for voting are the same i. e. all males of twenty-five or over, but there is a grouping system in use that discriminates even more severely against the industrial classes. Members of the legislature are elected by groups of electors, made up according to the amount of tax paid. One group is composed of the great tax payers and they elect one-third of all the legislators. Another group is composed of the middle class who elect another third while the workingmen, great in numbers but small in wealth, elect but one-third of their legislators. Thus while the third class make up the great majority they can elect but one-third the members of the Landtag. They are socialists and one of the reasons is that while the aristocratic powers keep them from a proportionate representation the social democrats contend for that proportionate representation. Thus the repressive measures of the aristocrats make socialists.

A bill for electoral reform has been before the Prussian legislature. It fails to abolish the three class representation and the social democrats have atempted to hold political meetings. It is difficult for us to understand how any political group that has a political program with members elected on it and represents one-half the people can be repressed to such measure that the police are ordered to even suppress attempts to hold a "walking meeting" i. e. an assemblage of the people with no set program but merely walking back and forth in peaceful manner, conversing and perhaps displaying banners that blazon their political creed of equal representation. Yet the police forbade these assemblages even and brought on riots and again the German government made numberless more socialists, for intelligent people tend to rebell against such methods. The government thinks it cannot allow equal representation because the socialists would be in a majority and so proceeds to repress and deny freedom and creates greater numbers of socialists.

Is It Dignified? and, Is It Christian?

To those who have long discerned the debasing influence of popular types of revivalism upon modern church life there is encouragement in even the most timid protest of leaders of our churches against its more obvious abuses.

The Christian Union, of Iowa, in a gingerly worded editorial takes exception to the undignified character of certain revival methods, particularly the so-called "personal work" that has come to be an indispensable factor in revival machinery.

In all the meetings we remember in the earlier days we never knew of any personal work done in the audience during the invitation song. That was too much like the denominations to suit the evangelists of only a generation ago. He who would unite with the church must go of his own accord. No one coaxed or begged or pulled at him to get him to the front. Personal work might be done before service, but not in the service. People must decide for themselves. The writer of these lines has never been in favor of pulling and coaxing people during the singing of the invitation song. To take advantage of a man in a company or before others brings the church into disrepute and lessens its power to reach the world. Some of these modern methods have crept into our own evangelistic effort. Of course we borrowed them from others and not from the fathers. We are neither condemning them wholesale nor finding fault with our evangelists who use such methods, but we say frankly that we do not like them a little bit. They are in our judgment lowering the standard of evangelism. They are going backwards rather than forwards. They do not appeal to the intelligence of the people. Any man ought to be allowed to go to any evangelistic meeting and stay until the close without being embarrassed. Often he has no confidence in those who coax him and this tends to disgust him. While a pastor we have longed to go to evangelistic meetings of other religious bodies and would have done so if we could have gone in and heard the sermon without having to be embarrassed by having to vote on a lot of questions and be misunderstood by refusing to go out in the audience and talk to people. Many a lawyer and doctor and business man longs to go to the evangelistic meeting but refuses to go because he is coaxed to go forward against his will.

We welcome such words as these. The reversion to the primitive in present day revivalism, the bad taste of its method, its breakdown of the finer habits and feelings which good society has by much pains established, is a sufficient condemnation of the enterprise. But the crucial criticism which such evangelism must face is not the aesthetic, but the ethical. The vital question is not, Is it dignified? but, Is it Christian? The building up of an artificial situation about the individual will, which, by the principle of social hypnotism, induces him to act without a clear perception of the significance of his act, is essentially an immoral enterprise, debasing to religion and an outrage upon personality. The editorial from which we quote above does well to point out that the prevalent revivalism of today would be repugant to our fathers. The truth is that it was essentially this type of revivalism against which they protested. Their protest was not alone against the Calvinistic preaching of the revivals of their day, but against hypnotic manipulations as represented in the "mourners' bench" and such phenomena as the "jerks." Our fathers were orderly and quiet in their appeal. Theirs was an evangelism through instruction. Our present method is a revival of the revivalism against which the fathers protested. It is alien to the historic spirit of the Disciples.

Palestine Travel Class

The Palestine Travel Study class of the University of Chicago, which has now become a biennial feature of the biblical department, will be conducted next winter by Professor T. G. Soares. The class of last year under the direction of Professor Ira M. Price made a highly successful visit to Egypt, Palestine and Asia Minor. The class of next year, profiting by the experience of all the previous groups, will undoubtedly surpass in interest the work of any previous company sent out by the University. These travel study groups combine the advantages of first class equipment and arrangements for definite and complete instruction on the history, geography, manners and customs and biblical interests of each of the places visited. The class is limited to twenty-five, and in this manner avoids the unpleasant features of a large company of people hurriedly taken from place to place, without competent instruction and with only brief time at each point of interest. Those who are desirous of receiving further information regarding the work of next year may correspond with Professor Soares at the University of Chicago.

Palestine Exploration Fund

Mr. R. A. Stewart Macalister, who has for some eleven years been connected with the Palestine Exploration Fund, and has rendered such notable service to the cause of biblical archaeology by his excavations at Gezer in southern Palestine, has resigned his position as field director of the work in Palestine to accept the position of Professor of Celtic Archaeology in the Irish National University at Dublin. Mr. Macalister's work has been of very great importance. The work of the Palestine Exploration Fund has been one of the most important contributions made by the English speaking world to the work of biblical exploration. Mr. Macalister worked with Petrie and Bliss in their researches further south, but is chiefly known for his remarkable finds at Gezer. Dr. Donald Mackenzie, another Scotchman, has been chosen to succeed Mr. Macalister as the field director of the work in Palestine. He comes to his task splendidly equipped. It is understood that the Fund has selected another site and will soon begin active operatoins. For obvious reasons the location is withheld until work is actually begun.

The Co-operative Council

The Co-operative Council of City Missions, an organization representing the different denominations, has been making a canvass in the suburbs of Chicago with reference to new churches needed. It is the plan of this organization to prevent as far as possible the overlapping of denominational interests and to suggest to the different religious bodies the places where each ought to make an effort to plant a church in order to care for neglected territory. Along the north shore all the way from Chicago to Waukegan there is a series of growing towns where church arrangements have been, for the most part, without order thus far. It is with special reference to just such opportunities and needs as this that the Co-operative Council makes its studies of the situation. If the Disciples had many times the small fund now at their disposal for the planting of new churches in very needy territory, it would be a most timely enterprise. The Presbyterians are putting $100,000 into Chicago city missions this year. The Congregationalists more than half that amount. The Methodists about $60,000, and the Baptists at least $10,000. The Disciples have much more to do than any of these denominations if they are to make for themselves the place in Chicago religious circles which they ought to occupy.

An Appeal

In the Christian Century of March 10th editorial mention was made of an important commission to which Dr. Errett Gates has been appointed by the trustees of the Disciples' Divinity House. His year of residence abroad during which he will visit all the scenes of interest in connection with the lives of the Campbells, and the leading figures in the religious movements that gave impulse to their work, will enable him to discover and come into possession of many literary materials of great importance for the adequate study of the origins of our religious reformation.

It has been felt by the trustees of the Divinity House that this opportunity should be utilized in securing as complete a collection as possible of the works which bear upon the history of Christian unity in the various countries where serious efforts were made looking to its realization. Every year increases the interest in this theme. And at the same time decreases the available literature bearing upon its beginnings.

The trustees have proposed the creation of a small fund of from five hundred to a thousand dollars to be devoted to the purchase of such materials. These, in addition to the spendid library of the Disciples' Divinity House which now contains most of the literary products of our own movement, would be of inestimable advantage in the own connection with it. No one has ever gone upon such a journey as Dr. Gates is undertaking. No one has ever been commissioned to gather the materials in which the Disciples are particularly interested. No one in the history of our work has been so admirably qualified by temper and training for this task.

It remains therefore to put at Dr. Gates' disposal the modest amount of money necessary for the collection and purchase of these volumes. The Divinity House has no library fund and cannot devote its general funds to this purpose. Those who are interested in the history of the Disciples are, therefore, invited to contribute to this fund in sums which they feel they can afford to devote to so important a plan. As all arrangements for Dr. Gates' journey are practically completed it is necessary that this matter also be arranged as quickly as possible. Will not those who wish to share in the creation of this fund send their contributions either to the treasurer of the Disciples' Divinity House, the University of Chicago, or to myself. And suitable acknowledgement will be made.

the spiritual manifestation of the Lord seemed more attractive and convincing. Strong arguments are made in our own day upon both sides of the question. To the advocates of the physical resurrection of Jesus the evidence seems clear and convincing, and the references to the perplexity of the disciples and the elusive nature of Jesus' personality are explained with confidence and some degree of adequacy.

On the other hand, there is a growing company of those who find satisfaction in the view that the physical resurrection of Jesus is neither capable of proof nor of special significance even could it be proved. But they hold with confidence and enthusiasm the faith that our Lord rose from the dead, manifested himself to the disciples in perfectly convincing ways, and gave to the church the deathless confirmation of his power as the Master of life. And it is the fact of the resurrection rather than its manner that the church must preach. What the Christian wants to know is that Jesus has conquered the powers of the grave; that the life he lived could not submit itself to subjugation by death; that one dowered with the fullness of life, as was he, has a survival value which the forces that make war upon the soul are powerless to defeat.

It was with that confidence that the early preachers of the Cross went forth to their glorious work. Jesus had lifted his friends from the nadir of despair to the summit of confidence. The miracle of the return of hope seen in that little company of bereaved and disheartened friends, who came back to the city that sad Friday night saying one to another, "We trusted that it had been he who should redeem Israel," is second only to the miracle of Jesus' conquest of death.

In that faith, that our Master is the Lord of life and death, and remains such forever, the church has won her victories. In that faith her saints have lived and her martyrs have died. And in that faith we go with unhesitant step to meet death when at last we round the curve in the road where the Shadow sits and waits for us.

It is that confidence that makes the Easter beautiful for us. It is no mere revival of a heathen festival, but the glorious arousal of human hearts at the thought of the return of the Firstborn from the Dead. And since death had no dominion over him, it is powerless to betray us into fear. In him we have learned the secret of the death of sin, the death of sorrow, and the death of Death. And he who was once among us as the Son of Man, of the seed of David according to the flesh, is now and forever declared to be the Son of God with power by the Resurrection from the Dead.

Beauty of achievement, whether in overcoming a hasty temper, a habit of exaggeration, in exploring a continent with Stanley, or guiding well the ship of state with Gladstone, is always fascinating, and, whether known in a circle large as the equator or only in the family circle at home, those who are in this fashion beautiful are never desolate, and someone always loves them.—Frances E. Willard.

The Wonderful Forty Days

During the trial of Jesus before the high priest, Peter "sat with the officers, to see the end." Unfortunately, he did not wait long enough but denied his Master before the conclusion of the trial. Not even did the decision of the judges fix the limits of the power and influence of Jesus. The man who appeared a few weeks after the death of Jesus to preach repentance and remission of sins understood some things that were not clear to him when he sat with the officers to see the end. He had learned that the end was not to be determined in courts of law but in human history, the tribunal of God.

The lesson of patience is difficult to learn but every successful man knows it. Man is often in a hurry when God is moving calmly to accomplish his purposes. More than once in the history of Christianity its enemies and many of its friends have thought they were witnessing its struggles of dissolution. But friend and foe have alike been many times shown to be false prophets. In the past the defeats of the church have increased the loyalty of her children. He is a cheap sort of Christian who demands immediate and spectacular success for all his efforts.

The worker waits, not the idler. The worker has something definite in view and he is moving toward his aim. He is therefore ready to size every opportunity. No opportunity comes to the loafer because he is incapable of seeing it when it is at hand. During the forty days the disciples were busy. They were together in prayer. They talked over the life of the Master. They took thought for the future. Their minds were alert. Words of Jesus which had hitherto been enigmatical began to have significance for them. They had a new sense of their obligation to use what they had received from their Master.

Our curiosity concerning the things of the kingdom spoken by Jesus during the forty days finds little in the record to gratify it. Our knowledge of what was communicated to the disciples must come from their conduct. Their despair was changed to confidence. Cowards became brave men. Discussions as to the honors of the kingdom gave place to the proclamation of the grace of God to sinful men. The ambition to serve succeeded the desire to exercise the authority of political and military rulers. The barbarian splendor of earthly courts lost its impressiveness for men who saw the glory of the spiritual kingdom.

The unity of these early disciples is of the kind the church needs today. They were united against common foes. They had sense enough to recognize the necessity of standing together. They had a common allegiance. They had facts and truth which they wished to give to the world. They felt the importance of their mission. The foes of our faith are today helping to unite the churches. The good sense of the Lord's disciples is coming more and more to be used in devising methods of destroying bad customs and institutions and of introducing right habits of thinking and acting, and there is increasing indignation at the conduct of those who think they serve God best who fight their Christian brethren most bitterly. We have as much of a fight before us as the first disciples had but we may be so busy with old sectarian controversies that we have no time to gain knowledge of the real war against sin this generation is making. Unity comes when Christians realize why they are in the world. The first disciples knew what they had before them.

The lessons Jesus had to teach were not fully learned during the forty days. Peter had to receive further instruction before he could go to the house of the Cornelius and say, "Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons; but in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is acceptable to him." The truth of religion cannot be communicated to the soul all at one time. Growth is the method of acquiring truth. Men understand a fact, a statement, when they are prepared to understand it and not before. "What I do thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter." God does not force religion upon men. He manifests himself to them and gives them a chance to understand him and love him. We are apt to think that telling a man something once is sufficient. We blame him for not acting immediately upon the information we have given. We ourselves may be to blame for our impatience and ignorance of human nature. God is a patient teacher. He allows time for his truth to come home to men.

Midweek Service, March 30. Acts 1:3-5.

Biblical Problems

By Professor Willett

How can such a horrible act as Samuel's "hewing of Agag in pieces before the Lord" be justified? (I. Samuel 15:33.)
Reader.

It is of course incapable of justification when viewed in the light of Christian ideas. It was merely the prophet's way of manifesting his intense hatred of a heathen king in an age when religious zeal was untempered by any quality of mercy. That Samuel believed himself to be performing God's will, both in sending Saul to accomplish the slaughter of the Amalekites and in his own ruthless cutting down of their king, we need not question. He was himself the child of a cruel age, and the divine Spirit ever striving with men had to teach them as their capacity for knowledge could accept new and higher truth. Such an act on the part of any of the great prophets of later days would have been inconceivable. But we cannot judge Samuel by any standards save those of his own time. Happily, later prophetic teaching, and especially the great ethical ideals of Jesus, have brought the world out of that lowland of superstition and savagery into the higher and broader spaces of brotherhood and kindness.

"Is there authority for the statement that baptism or immersion was practiced by the Jews before Christ's day? What are the sources for knowledge regarding this subject?"
Reader.

The necessary requirements for the admission of proselytes into the Jewish community were three: circumcision, baptism (that is, a bath with a view to a Levitical purification), and sacrifice (literally a gracious acceptance of blood). The following literature bears on the subject:

F. C. Porter, in his article on "Proselytes" in Hastings' Bible Dictionary, says: "If circumcision was the decisive step in the case of all male converts, there seems no longer room for serious question that a bath of purification must have followed. Baptism of converts is not mentioned by Philo or Josephus, but the Mishna presupposes it" (Vol. IV., p. 135).

W. H. Bennett, in the Encyclopediae Biblica, says: "One condition, therefore, of becoming a proselyte was that required by the priestly code, circumcision, to which the later Jewish usage adds lustration by immersion in water, and the presentation of a sacrifice" (Vol. III, col. 3905).

Graetz, the greatest Jewish historian, says: "Different opinions were held as to the admission of proselytes, by the severe Eliezer and the mild Joshua (the leaders of the conservative and progressive schools respectively); whilst the former held circumcision to be absolutely necessary to admission to Judaism, the latter considered baptism, that is, the bathing in the presence of qualified witnesses, to be sufficient" (Vol. II., p. 384).

The greatest authority on Jewish customs in the times of Christ is Scheurer. Regarding the three required forms already mentioned, he says, "In the Mishna all three are presupposed as being already of long standing. Nay, for rabbinical Judaism they are so much matters of course that even apart from any explicit testimony we should have had to assume that they were already current practice in the time of Christ. Strange to say, with regard to one of the things herein questioned, namely, the baptism or washing with water, the view has prevailed among Christian scholars since the beginning of the eighteenth century that it was not observed as yet in our Lord's time. Originally it was for dogmatic reasons that this was maintained, while in modern times nothing but an imperfect acquaintance with the facts of the case can account for the way in which the once dominant prejudice has been allowed to linger on." Then after discussing the derivation of the rite from the Levitical law for the sacred community, and still the greater necessity for baptism in the case of the unclean Gentile, he adds: "It is an unmistakable fact that in the Mishna the taking of the bath by the proselyte is already presupposed as an established and authoritative practice."

The passages on circumcision and baptism in the Mishna are the following: Pesachim 8:8; Edujoth 5:2; also, Sibylline oracles 4:164; and Arrian, Dis. Epict. 2:9; these are too long to quote, save the last, which is as follows:

"But if any one adopts the mode of life required of one who has been baptized and elected (received into religious fellowship), then is he really a Jew and entitled to be called such."

Essentials In Church Architecture

Practical Counsel in Building a Churchly Church

By Rev. William E. Barton

He who visits many churches experiences many joys, and not a few disappointments. To his sorrow he must confess that many church buildings are badly constructed. Though it be but the exception that proves the rule, yet the exception is sufficiently prominent to make the judicious grieve. And the worst thing about it is that some of the worst examples in church architecture are among the most recent. If the old church buildings were blunderingly uncouth, they had at least the simple dignity of uncompromising utilitarianism and availability. But not a few of the new ones in departing from the severe lines of the old are of the cheap and gaudy, and have gained a superficial and spurious beauty at the cost of much that is essential to dignity and reverence.

Utility in Church Architecture.

The fundamental need of church buildings is that which demands the use of any other buildings for the requirements of men and women, the comfort and shelter of our physical bodies during frequent and somewhat prolonged spaces of time in which we are likely to be gathered for the purpose for which the building is constructed. It must provide shelter from wind, rain, and oppressive heat; must resist the weight of winter snows and the force of summer storms; must be commodious, strong, light, well ventilated, and capable of being made reasonably warm in winter and cool in summer. The exterior, therefore, should be strong, and should look strong; its roof and walls should be adequate, and appear adequate to their respective uses. The danger of fire should be considered, and the building, if not fire proof, as few buildings are, should be of slow burning construction, and as nearly impervious to fire as economy of material will permit. The exterior of the building should be a visible declaration that these considerations have not been overlooked.

Within, the first requisite is a room within which the people may assemble for the purpose of united worship. There should be approximately eight square feet of floor to each seat. The aisles should be laid as nearly in right lines as may be, making entrance convenient, and exit safe. The seats should be comfortable, and should look comfortable. And there should be a convenient and elevated space, for organ and choir, and a platform with a desk sufficiently elevated to permit all the people to see, and thereby the better to hear and interpret the message of the minister.

There should be provision, and preferably in other rooms, for the social and teaching functions of the church. While many churches must conduct all their activities under one roof, it is better for many reasons if there may be a parish house, or chapel, or Sunday-school room, adjacent, and conveniently entered, either by wide vestibule or by provision for the rolling up or depression of movable partitions. The provision of parlors, kitchen, library, and class rooms is not only legitimate but in every way desirable, and it is better for many reasons if the church can provide these in a separate but connected structure, on the same floor level with the auditorium. In cities where land is high, it will often be necessary to provide for these auxiliaries in rooms underneath the auditorium, but this is not the ideal method where land can be obtained for the separate roofing of the parish building.

All the foregoing has respect to the mere utility of the church building. It contemplates the erection of a weather-proof structure, well lighted and heated, and economical of repair, constructed with reference to the physical well-being of the various groups of people whose activities combine to make up the work and worship of the modern church. And thus considered, the architectural essentials are to be found in the necessities of the modern church, and in the forms of its work and worship, and not necessarily in any traditions derived from the work and worship of the church or any of its branches in former times.

But utility is not the sole requisite, and so we come to Beauty in Church Architecture.

Here I cross swords at the very outset, and that willingly, with those good people who say or seem to say that in doing the Lord's work, and spending the Lord's money, every dollar must purchase its utmost in brick, mortar, boards and nails. God may be worshiped acceptably in a sod or log building when it is the best the people can do, but people who live in comfortable and ornamental homes, have no moral right to build stingy churches. Read the story of the tabernacle and temple, and consider whether it is well to worship God in dingy, shabby houses. Read how He reproved the people who dwelt in ceiled houses, and permitted the temple to be neglected.

The church should be the most beautiful building in town. There should be no meaningless display, no ostentatious or vulgar use of money, no lavish waste, but a simple, dignified beauty of exterior and interior, appealing to the soul through the eye and ear. Its organ and its bell or chime should be not the cheapest that can be made to work, but the best that can be afforded. And in every detail there should be a consideration both of stability and beauty.

Spiritual Significance.

The outside of every building should express its purpose. I once heard a minister boast of having erected "a church which no one would suspect of being a church." I should be sorry to make that confession. He thought that such a building, erected as a sort of spiritual club house, would appeal to his heterogeneous constituency in a down-town distict. I doubt if he was right. The very exterior of the building should preach a sermon.

The lines of a church building, however broadly their bases parallel the horizon, should catch the eye, and carry the vision upward. If there be a spire or tower, the height of it should be not only proportioned to the height of the building, but suited to its environment. In a down-town district, surrounded by office buildings, it may be worse than folly to have a spire at all; a spire is to look up to, not to look down upon. The solid Norman tower, or the colonaded Greek front may become more significant in a hemmed-in building than any possible spire. But who has not seen, as he drove from town to town, a little village in the distance with its white spire rising above the tree tops, and felt in his heart the influence of that upward-pointing finger, admonishing him who passes, even a mile away, to look up and think of God?

Should Be Restful.

The auditorium should be restful, worshipful, sufficiently light, and easy to speak in. There are some beautiful church buildings of which you can say everything good except these few things: You cannot see in them; you cannot hear in them; you cannot sing in them; you cannot preach in them. Though you speak with the tongues of men and angels, you are as sounding brass, because some fool committee or crank architect was permitted to sacrifice the real uses of the auditorium to some theory or whim.

If one were building a ritualistic church, he would wish to make the communion table the center, and put the pulpit into any odd corner that might remain, or stick it like a wasp's nest on a beam but if he wants a church for the preaching of the Gospel, the communion table, which ought not by any means to be hid, or used for secular purposes, should not usurp the pulpit's place. A solid, substantial pulpit, not easily removable, should stand with the large open Bible upon it. And the minister should use this Bible, and not his own limp-backed portable book. The Bible and the desk it rests upon should be a part of the permanent furniture of the church, not for convenience only, but for its spiritual value.

The auditorium should be treated with reverence, and not commonly used for secular purposes. The theatrical plan of construction is hard to combine with churchly ideals; the sloping floor is not an aid to reverence; the pitch of the seats makes it difficult to bow in prayer. It is better to elevate the pulpit than to slope the floor; though a gentle slope at the extreme rear may sometimes be a help.

In planning the parish house, or Sunday-school rooms, it is well to make a sufficiently radical departure from the severe lines of the auditorium to emphasize the social uses of these adjunct rooms. The color scheme , too, can be more bright and warm. The rooms that are dedicated to the work of the women's societies, and to evening classes and innocent pleasures may be and should be as truly dedicated to God as those that are dedicated to public worship.

In a church building, the room for worship will be kept all the more sacredly if there are other rooms for other legitimate purposes. There should be a well planned kitchen; there should be light and well ventilated toilet rooms, easily found, yet not obtrusively located. There should be a place where children may romp without losing reverence for the house of God, and where the social life of the parish may center.

Semi-Gothic Well Suited.

The pure Gothic church, with its obstructing pillars and its bad acoustics, is not suited to the purposes of congregational worship. But a semi-gothic church is well suited, and it is possible to preserve some real suggestions of cruciform structure and inspiring Gothic elevation without sacrifice of practical convenience.

There can be symbolism in number. Do not have six windows on a side, or eight; if you are so near to the number seven, have seven. And do not have eleven or fourteen petals in your rose-window; have twelve. And while the decorators are at work, they may just as well cut stencils that weave in the Cross, or other Christian emblems, as to put on merely conventional ornamentation. This need not, should not, be obtrusive, but it may be and ought to be intelligible and appropriate.

How numerous in Scripture are the references to building, and how beautifully significant they are! How easy it is, when a church edifice is to be erected, to include their essential lesson, all the way from the cornerstone to the sacred emblem that gilds the spire.

Even the humblest, and poorest church may make its modest building a little more beautiful if it will learn how; for many of these things cost nothing extra, and are the free gift of God to those who seek His message in beauty and grace as well as in utility.

Every church building, then, should express three things, and these both outside and inside; utility, beauty, and spiritual significance. There should be strength, sincerity, and sacrifice, with dignity and aspiration.

Two Competent Instructors

By Hilda Richmond

"Thank goodness! They couldn't spoil our little girl, could they, Maggie?" said Mr. Cutler as the door closed after Emily, and they saw her flying down the snowy walk to greet a party of friends arriving in a big sled. "I feel that I ought to beg the child's pardon for being so suspicious. I just expected she'd come home with a lot of foolish town notions in her head, and everything would be uncomfortable."

"I was a little worried myself," said Mrs. Cutler, smiling at the scene at the side gate. "Not that Emily is foolish or easily led, but a young girl is apt to have her head turned a little by fashion, no matter how carefully she had been brought up. Richard's folks are not exactly leaders in society, but they put on quite a bit of style and live in a modern house, so I didn't know what might happen. But the minute I saw her put her arms around Sadie I knew everything was all right. Sadie has been worried I could see, but she is as happy as can be now. Lucy keeps two maids, she calls them, and they wear caps and white aprons, so Sadie probably felt that Emily might want something of the sort at home."

The evening passed very pleasantly, and when the guests departed Emily urged them all to come back soon. "Cousin Margaret from New York is coming after Christmas for a few days before I go back to town, and I want you all to meet her. She is an accomplished musician and I am sure we will all enjoy hearing her play."

"I suppose we ought to have a little party of some sort for Margaret," said Mrs. Cutler as they sat around the fire later. "I am sorry she will be here such a short time."

"Yes, I suppose so," said Emily. "I imagine one of our country frolics would be a great treat to her, as she knows nothing but city customs. I'll be so glad to get back to one of the dear old parties, mamma, I won't know what to do. I've been to a few in the city, but they are no fun. Everything is so stilted and formal to me, and so different. They are such dress up affairs that I feel out of place, after our little informal picnics and parties. I went a few times, but after that I stayed at home. At first Helen and Georgia argued the case with me, but after a while they let me alone."

"Why, dear, if you needed a new dress for parties, you could have had it," said Mrs. Cutler.

"I didn't want it," said Emily. "My white serge was plenty good enough. You have no idea, mamma, how many foolish notions they have about things. The two maids eat in the kitchen after the family get through and I didn't like that. O yes, they have plenty of warm food, but it looks as if Aunt Lucy and the family thought themselves too good for the maids, as they call them. I often was late to meals on purpose and ate with Jennie and Julia just to show them how I felt on the subject. At first I was all worn out with the little petty restrictions, but in time I declared my independence, and now everything is all right. They like to get up late and go to bed late, but I never could stand that, so I just go down and have breakfast with the maids, and do as I please. I don't bother them and I don't allow them to bother me."

The Christmas festivities passed all too soon, and two days later Miss Margaret Cutler arrived at the farm house. She was a tall, beautiful girl with the unmistakable city stamp on her garments, but the Cutlers welcomed warmly and installed her with her two trunks and array of hand baggage in the big guest chamber that glowed with cleanliness.

"If you aren't tired, come right down to the sitting room," urged Emily when the guest wanted to change her dress. "What difference does the dress make in the country? You have such a short time to stay that we can not spare you a minute."

"Dinner is ready," called Mrs. Cutler from the lower hall. "Come, girls."

"Is that some relative of yours?" asked Margaret as Sadie was introduced and then hurried out to the kitchen to bring in the dinner.

"No, that's our Sadie," said Emily. "She's been with us since before I was born. We couldn't keep house without her."

"She doesn't eat with you, does she?" said Margaret, noting the number of plates.

"Certainly, why not?"

"I wont' eat with a servant," said the young lady, firmly. "You may tell her I have a headache, which is the truth, but I won't eat at the same table she does. I think it's absurd."

Emily fairly gasped with astonishment, but Sadie was coming in at that moment, and nothing could be done. "Mamma, Cousin Margaret doesn't feel very well," she stammered, "and she thinks she'll lie down a little while." She gave her mother an appealing look, but that lady did not heed.

"The rest of you go right on with your dinner," she said, "and I'll make some tea for the poor child. No, don't wait."

The "poor child" recovered sufficiently to come down half an hour later with Mrs. Cutler, and made a substantial meal of the good food Sadie had prepared. This good woman, all unconscious of the cause of the delayed meal, was all solicitation for the sufferer, and insisted on making a mustard plaster for the back of her neck, an attention which Margaret declined coldly.

"Mamma, what in this world am I to do?" said Emily that afternoon as the guest went upstairs to write letters, and they were left alone in the sitting room. "I've asked the young folks to come, and something dreadful will happen. Why in the world can't she have a little sense? I don't see how we are to contrive the meals to keep from offending Sadie. I believe in conforming to customs and not making extra work when one is away from home."

The party came off and, as Emily predicted, it was a miserable affair. Margaret came downstairs in a low necked, silk frock, perfectly proper for a city function, but sadly out of place in a farm house. The rooms had to be kept extremely hot to prevent her catching cold, and the other young girls in their sensible light wool gowns nearly roasted. The city girl characterized the games as silly and absolutely refused to play because the piano was out of tune. A sort of panic seized the guests, and they were not free to chatter or sing or play games as usual. Emily was profoundly thankful when they trudged off at an early hour down the road in perfect silence, instead of with the usual merry laughter.

"Is it possible that there is no chaperone with them?" said Margaret when Emily came back from seing the tongue-tied young folks depart. "I never heard of such an astonishing thing."

"What in the world would they want of a chaperone?" said Emily rather sharply. "They are all brothers and sisters and cousins and neighbors so a chaperone would be the height of silliness." She had about reached the limit of patience, and if her mother had not given her a warning look, there is no telling what Miss Margaret would have heard.

"Well, I think it is extremely common to fly in the face of established custom," said the young lady. "If that is the way you are planning to go to the party to-morrow night, you may send my regrets, or I will if you will tell me the name of the hostess. They all call each other by their first names, and I can't remember who she was."

By careful contriving and getting the relatives in to meet Margaret, the question of meals was solved, for Emily proposed very often that she and Sadie wait on the table, and eat together afterward. Mrs. Cutler was beginning to hope that nothing would hurt Sadie's feelings, because Emily managed very cleverly to keep her away from the city girl, but in spite of all precautions the fatal moment came.

"That's an awful pretty apron you've got on, Margaret," observed Sadie complacently, as Margaret came into the kitchen the last day of her visit with a chafing dish affair of crisp lawn and fine laces over her smart frock. "Did you make it yourself?"

"Sadie, I think it my duty to tell you that you are altogether too familiar for a servant," said Margaret calmly. "I can't imagine what Aunt Margaret is thinking of to stand such ways." Then she turned and went out of the kitchen, leaving a broken-hearted woman to scorch a hole in her best white petticoat while the tears had their way behind the checked gingham apron.

"Don't pay any attention to what she says, Sadie," said Emily, trying to soothe the poor soul. "She hasn't any gumption!"

There was no necessity to contrive at dinner that day, for Sadie with her face all out of shape from weeping would not venture near the dining room. Margaret wore the virtuous air of the one who has freed her mind and done her duty, and the rest of the family nervously tried to act as if nothing had happened. Everyone was relieved when the trunks and the hand baggage were loaded up and Margaret departed, and even hospitable Mrs. Cutler said she hoped it would be a long time before she returned.

The next week Emily returned to the little city where she was taking special work in music and the languages, and her relatives wanted to know at once how she enjoyed her cousin's stay.

"Helen, it's a dreadful thing to talk about one's guests, and mamma would feel disgraced if she knew I whispered a word, but Margaret is the limit. Yes, there isn't another word to express it." She laughingly related some of the happenings of the week before, and wound up with: "I can laugh about it all now, but it wasn't funny then. Why, Aunt Lucy, we had to plan and contrive the meals with about as much strategy as a general does a campaign in order to keep peace in the family, but Margaret couldn't see it that way. She is inordinately selfish, but she thinks her ways and her opinions the only ones worth considering."

There was a queer light in Aunt Lucy's eyes, but she bent over her sewing to hide it, as the story went on. Helen opened her mouth at one point to say something, but she closed it again, and Georgia seemed to have a great deal of trouble with her throat, judging from the coughing she was forced to do. "You'll see when she comes here, as she intends to do next month," warned Emily, rising to go to the kitchen for a drink. "You'll think I haven't make it half strong enough."

When she reached the kitchen she was astonished to find Jennie vigorously packing her garments in a small trunk, while Julia looked on sorrowfully. "Are you going to leave, Jennie?" she asked in surprise. "What is the matter?"

"You are the matter!" burst out the angry girl. "I just can't stand it another minute."

"I!" cried Emily, allowing the glass to fall into the sink with a great crash. "What on earth have I done?"

"I should think you wouldn't have to ask that question," retorted Jennie. "Always late to meals and always bothering Julia and me to death. It's little enough time we have to ourselves, but you've got to come out when we could enjoy ourselves and listen to everything we say. And you won't stay in your room in the mornings and give us a chance to clean things up, but have to come poking down about daylight and sit where we want to sweep. I've stood it just as long as I could, and if I hadn't felt sorry for Mrs. Hopper I could have gone long ago. She's just lovely, but I can't put up with everything."

"Go on!" said Emily faintly. "I want to hear it all."

Jennie flushed deeply, but she continued her tale of woe. "No young man likes to go to see a girl and have some person running to the kitchen every few minutes," she went on indignantly. "I don't mind it once in a while, but when it comes to every night in the week, there's no sense in it." Emily remembered how many times she had tried to cheer up the lonely maids in the kitchen by carrying down books and fancy work and stopping to chat with them evenings, and she leaned against the sink for support. "When a girl has only the kitchen and dining room downstairs to have for her own occasionally, she don't like to have somebody mixing in all the time. Miss Helen and Miss Georgia are just lovely, and I did think all along you'd take pattern by them. Since I'm going to leave, I'll say my say right out. Maybe it'll do you some good."

"It certainly will," said the listener with energy. "Is there anything more?"

"Not on my account," said Jennie, "but I guess Mrs. Hooper could say some things if she wanted to, only she's too nice to hint such a thing. I think if you'd dress up and act like other girls, and not keep her explaining about you all the time, she'd like it better."

"Jennie, forgive me," said Emily, impetuously. "I'll do better in the future if you'll only stay! I truly will! And—and I thank you for telling me this today." She vanished hastily, and Jennie, having vented her indignation, sat down to cool off and consider the advisability of unpacking.

Mrs. Hooper and her daughters never knew certainly what caused the transformation in the household, but they never doubted for a moment that things had been transformed. As if by magic the old tribulations vanished, and all was peace and serenity in the hospitable home. The only clue they ever had came one day when a letter arrived saying that Cousin Margaret Cutler had been suddenly called home, and would have to postpone her visit to her relatives till another time.

"Hurrah! Cousin Margaret can't come!" cried Georgia, waving the letter above her head. "We can all breathe naturally again."

"I am sorry," said Emily with real regret in her voice. She was standing for the dressmaker to fit a lovely girlish muslin frock that was to make its first appearance at a party two days later, and her cousins were admiring the effect.

"Emily, you look stunning in that dress," said Helen, coming closer to take a more critical look. "You were the belle of the ball last night at the entertainment, and when you wear this beautiful dress I don't know what will happen."

"Why are you sorry Cousin Margaret can't come?" asked her aunt, who had been listening to the conversation. "I thought you had so much trouble when she visited you."

"I did," said Emily, turning scarlet, "but she did me a lot of good, anyway. And another thing, I hoped she might come under Jennie's influence a little while. I don't know whether Jennie could help Margaret, but she did me."

"I don't know who transformed you," said Georgia with a squeeze that threatened destruction to the new dress, "but I know the very day it happened, and since then you have been a thousand times nicer than before. You don't need to look at me like that, mamma! It's true!"

"I hope it is," said Emily, "and that it will last."

Making Chicago God's City

By George A. Campbell

Man has become a "communal being." More and more he is finding his life in the vast cities of his own rearing. Half the population of the United States is now found in cities and towns of no mean size. Nearly 80 per cent of the people of Massachusetts and nearly 70 per cent of the population of New York live in cities of over 8,000 inhabitants. Even in our Prairie state of Illinois over half our people have left the quiet of the country. Is the church awake to this momentous change? Have the Disciples any conscience with regard to the modern city? We have a foreign missionary conscience; we have a doctrinal conscience. But certainly our conscience with regard to our woeful indifference of the real cities of our land is not loudly accusing. The need must first be felt. But surely the need of the city is apparent, though not yet felt. Its continuous growth is assured. Its industrial importance is pre-eminent.

That the modern city is to determine the weal or woe of modern civilization is generally believed. The problems of the city are the problems of the age. America is to be born anew out of its cities. They are the melting pots into which is cast every race of God. A new humanity is to be produced. All the worst and all the best meet in the American metropolis of our day. To them come the brave and fair from the rural homes of every state. The kingdom of God is going to be realized in the Chicagos and New Yorks. The Brotherhood which Jesus taught is to become a fact in our centers of teeming population. Here all are to live for the good of all. Everyone is to be dependent on everyone. Individualism could never bring the kingdom of God. The city compels a tremendous interdependency. In it every man will finally serve his brother. The world's best will be brought to the door of every man and child. The artist will bring his painting and statues to the altar of brotherhood, the musician his song, the architect his temple, the farmer his grain, the clothier his garment, the doctor his skill and balm, the author his book, the dramatist his story of love and the minister his ministry. The city will thus become a holy city. New Jerusalem is already descending from heaven—a thousand agencies and more devoted souls have ascended to bring it down. It is descending as fast as the present developed state of our Christianity will allow it to come. It is much to believe in the ideal; and everywhere men are today believing in a large portion of heaven on earth. Chicago is a city of ideals. Chicago's socialist is preaching them. Chicago's single taxer is crying them. The church is being baptized anew, and coming to have a social consciousness. The social settlement is believing in the man we used to call bad. He had not had a fair chance. The city itself is alert to prevent disease ravaging its people. It is raising the question as to its slums, districts of vice, saloons, etc. The schools demand for every child opportunity to be taught. The great charity and philanthropic organizations reveal the responsive heart of this great city. Our small park system gives the children of Chicago an opportunity to play as that of no other city does. The policy of the public library to have community libraries is carrying the best within easy reach of all. The open halls of art are beautifully fruitful in deepening life as well as giving recreation and pleasure, and the alertness of the health commissioner guards well the life of the people from contagion and from impurities in food and water. Chicago is a city of over 2,000,000 people, trying to establish Christian relationship among themselves. It is awake to ideals. It is trying, awkwardly perhaps, but surely trying to weave its ideals into the warp and woof of its common life.

Do the Disciples know Chicago? They know it as being on the map. They know the board of trade and the stockyards. They know of Chicago University. They know the big stores. They could mention a few names of brother Disciples living here. They know of its graft and dirty streets. But these are not Chicago. Chicago is spirit. It is hope and determination. Chicago to be known must be known in its heart life, in its vision. Chicago is faith in the future. It looks up and believes. It looks out and loves. It looks down and repents. Chicago is life, wild, riotous life at times, but life in the main that promises to be a city of God. Does the brotherhood of Disciples with their liliputian missions know Chicago in its unconfined bigness? The imagination of Chicago cannot be captured with a store-room Gospel. Chicago believes in the skies and stars. It has in its heart something of eternity, and demands the suggestion of the same in its temples.

The human throb is here, Chicago does not stand for disputatious theology. It stands for usable religion. It has no time nor disposition for academic hair-splitting. It believes in that which comforts, strengthens and binds man to God and to his brother man. It believes in the church that serves and in the God that loves. It likes the enthusiasm that brings things to pass. It believes in the united church because it believes in brotherhood. Its schools, its water system, its streets, its parks, its street cars and its libraries are all of common brotherhood interest. It is only a step to ask why not the churches as well. God is more universal than the sun. He is an inclusive God. It is natural to ask, why not his church? Chicago does not stress creed, but life. If only the Disciples, in spirit much like Chicago, only knew Chicago, they might capture and be captured by this great city of God.

To make Chicago of today a city of God is the task. To aid the spirit of his purging to sweep through the slums, the vice districts, the political graft rings, and the hearts of the indifferent should be one of the chief missions of the Disciples.

The political situation continues to absorb the main interests of the public, and no one can tell two days in advance what will happen. The leaders of the parties that hold the balance of power are enjoying themselves, if no one else is. Mr. Redmond particularly is having a good time. One moment he is deeply grateful to the Liberal party for all they have done in the interest of true democracy, and the next he is full of threats as to what the Irish party will do if certain tactics are not adopted. There is no doubt but he holds the situation in the palm of his hand, except that for the time being he cannot, if he wanted to, defeat the Government; for strange to say, the Conservatives even do not want them defeated. In fact no one wants another general election at once. The party treasuries are all empty. Besides there is too much money required at once to make it a desirable task for any party to find it at a moment's notice.

The policy of the government has been changed in-so-far as that they will now deal with the question of the veto before passing the budget. This is what the Irish want. They believe in doing away with the lords' veto power, for the sake of Home Rule, but they do not believe strongly in the budget, for the sake of their whisky. The veto resolutions which the government propose laying before the commons after Easter will probably pass and be sent up to the house of lords some time in May; these they will without much doubt reject. Then, if the King does not give consent to create sufficient new lords to pass the bill, an appeal will immediately be made to the country on the single issue of the veto. On this one issue the Liberals, and their supporters, will win. On this issue Ireland, Scotland and Wales will vote almost solidly. When the veto is settled the promise of Mr. Asquith is that the matter will be taken up of making the house of lords an elected body instead of hereditary.

The second annual dinner of Hornsey clergy and ministers recently took place. This is a pleasant feature in this North London suburb. The first was held last year at the invitation of the clergy of the established church, and this year's gathering was arranged by a committee appointed at the first dinner. The object is the cultivation of good fellowship and the sole topic discussed on both occasions was Christian union, the most passionate appeals for which came on both occasions from Church of England clergymen. For the most part our Freechurch representatives uttered platitudes. The Rev. Robert Linklater, Prebendary of St. Paul's, and rector of one of the Hornsey churches, whose guest we were last year and who was ours this year, grew quite passionate in his appeal for union. "Brethren," he exclaimed, "we really must see if we cannot manage it, the need of the world is so great." In the light of such exclamations one would become quite hopeful were it not that at once a hundred difficulties arise connected with the "conditions" of union. Not until we come to believe that the necessity for union is greater than any or all of the conditions and difficulties, will union be accomplished. The difficulties in the way of the evangelism of the world a hundred years ago seemed unsurmountable, and perhaps they seem even more so now that the real magnitude of the task is apparent, but this did and does not deter the enthusiast for missions doing what he can. When once we realize the world's need and the magnitude of the task set the Christian religion, our petty differences will sink into nothingness. We will then be willing to make Christ and a "Christian God" our "common denominator" and our chief point of "conscience" will be to make Him known to a sinning and sorrowing world!

Does the position of a large per cent of the Baptist denomination in this country throw any light on the solution of the Baptism question as related to Christian union? It is doubtless a position fairly well known to your readers. They refuse to make baptism a church ordinance. It is looked upon as an individual matter to be settled between the candidate and his Lord. The baptism of the candidate for church membership is optional. He is received into church membership without it. He is baptized, if at all, because he is already a Christian, and not to make him one. If this is a right position, the inconsistency of the Baptists would seem to be in the fact that they require the minister in every case to be an immersed believer, and again in the fact that it is immersion or nothing for the individual member. It is evident from this that the one step that has been taken is an attempt at compromise. It would be interesting to have exact figures as to the effect of this, but they are not at hand. I can only say that in conversation with various Baptist ministers I have been told that the great majority of their members choose immersion; being left free they do not abuse their freedom, but use it rather for the attainment of additional grace by their voluntary surrender. However, many of their leading members do not choose to be baptized, Dr. Clifford telling me several years ago that some of his deacons had not been.

Is it not a matter of grave concern that after nineteen hundred years of Christianity we should still be debating the question as to the relative importance of an ordinance, and its particular form, in the face of the urgent need of our helping to answer the prayer of our Master "that we may all be one." Whether it be the friends of the enemies of immersion that erect this into a barrier to Christian union, they will have something to answer for.

It must be admitted, however, that it is easy to write thus, but that it is most difficult to act. The freest of us are bound,—bound by the chains of our own forging, no doubt as by those of others; this makes the chains all the stronger. I sometimes envy my son and the atmosphere which I hope he will be permitted to breathe in future years. To have some small part in the creation of this atmosphere is his father's chief prayer.

To Live in a Book

By Annie L. Hannah.

I wish that I lived in a book,
  Where everything's cheerful and nice!
Had I but Aladdin's old lamp,
  I would put myself there in a trice!

The fire's bright—in a book;
  The milk's never watery and thin;
The ice on the pond is just right;
  In a ball game your side's sure to win.

Such aunts as you have—in a book!
  Such uncles, and grandfathers, too!
They think that in all the wide world
  There is not such a fellow as you!

And then the adventures you have!
  You'd hardly believe they could be
Unless you had read for yourself
  Of those exploits by land and by sea!

Yes, it must be fine in a book!
  I wish I could go there to stay!
Where everything's cozy and nice,
  And there's never one commonplace day!

The Glory of a Stainless Life

An Arabian princess was once presented by her teacher with an ivory casket, not to be opened until a year had passed. The time, impatiently waited for, came at last, and with trembling haste she unlocked the treasure, and, lo! on the satin linings lay a shroud of rust; the form of something beautiful, but the beauty gone. A slip of parchment contained these words: "Dear, pupil, learn a lesson in your life. This trinket, when enclosed, had upon it a spot of rust; by neglect it has become the useless thing you now behold, only a blot on its pure surroundings. So a little stain on your character will, by inattention and neglect, mar a bright and useful life, and in time leave only the dark shadow of what might have been. Place herein a jewel of gold, and after many years you will find it still as sparkling as ever. So with yourself; treasure up only the pure, the good, and you will be an ornament to society, and a source of true pleasure to yourself and your friends."—Selected.

A STORY OF THE TRUSTS

CHAPTER XXI (Continued)

At that moment Susan, who had been unconsciously listening for it through the speech-making, heard the click of the gate, followed by Alonzo's heavy step on the walk—more lagging that usual; for to the ear and eye of such a wife, every footfall, every changing expression, is fraught with meaning which she alone can interpret.

As Alonzo entered the kitchen he looked at her strangely—a fixed melancholy gaze that was full of tragic significance.

"Why, what's the matter, Lon? You're not sick, I hope?" she said, going to him and helping him off with his overcoat.

"No; I'm all right," he said wearily.

"Where's Teddy?"

"He's comin' with Mary; she stayed late this evening. He says he don't want any supper."

"What's the matter? Something's happened I know—something dreadful; you act so strange." And she stood regarding him anxiously, waiting for him to speak. He said nothing, but went to the sink and washed his face and hands.

Eldora was in the sitting-room, neatly copying the next day's arithmetic lesson; but she overheard her parents' conversation, and, sharing her mother's apprehensions, she came to the kitchen door.

"Don't let's bother about things now," said Alonzo. "Let's have supper. I'll have time enough to talk, God knows!——Give me something to eat."

Susan's keen intuition informed her of impending trouble. She quietly complied with Alonzo's request and called the family to supper.

She prepared Alonzo's coffee as she knew he liked it, and passed it to him steaming hot. He sat gazing down into his plate and Susan noticed how worn he was, how colorless his face has grown, how parched his lips, his forehead seamed with deepening lines.

She made only a pretext of eating, and Ned, taking advantage of her inattention, was feeding Jody from his spoon, the cat standing on his hind legs beside his chair, now and then tapping the child's arm with a supplicating paw.

When she found him out, Susan gave him an impatient little shake, and said sharply:

"Haven't I told you a dozen times, Ned, that you musn't feed Jody at the table? I'll put him out if you don't stop it."

"Oh, Susan, don't scold!" said Alonzo, petulantly. "Do let's have a little peace!"

This from Alonzo! Whatever he did he never interfered with the management of the children. She gave him one reproachful look, then put her apron over her eyes, burst into tears, and abruptly left the table.

Alonzo made no remonstrance, but finished his coffee with an effort. Eldora had never seen her mother give way to such a burst of feeling and she was shocked and frightened.

"Now you see what you've done, being a bad boy!" she said to Ned, who, bewildered by his mother's tears, began to whimper, pushed his chair back, and climbed down to go to her.

"Let him be, Eldory, and 'tend to your own business!" said Alonzo sternly. "And you, Ned, come back and finish your supper, or I'll send you off to bed without any."

A lump rose in Eldora's throat and tears came into her eyes, but she winked them away. To be scolded by her father was always terrifying; and tonight—when everyone was out of sorts and something dreadful had happened that was making them all unhappy—his reproof had added emphasis. It was a miserable meal for them all. After a little while Alonzo arose and went into the sitting-room. He told the children to stay where they were, closing the door behind him.

Susan sat on the lounge wiping her eyes. He stood before her and said: "Oh, Susan, my girl, forgive me! I didn't mean to speak to you like that! But I'm beat—I'm clean beat! And I don't know where to turn!"

Distressed less by his asperity than the unspoken trouble which she knew was torturing him, she rose instantly and threw her arms around his neck and kissed him, as she would have kissed Ned had he come asking pardon for some childish offence.

At this Alonzo broke into stifled sobs; his irritation—that of a man suffering helplessly—had passed, and the tears which were wrung from him, like drops of blood, ran slowly down his face. Susan wiped them away with pitiful tenderness, which was the sympathy of a mother for her child, rather than that of a wife for a husband. When he could speak, Alonzo said brokenly:

"The works—the Trust has bought the works, they'll shut it down in a month, and I don't know what to do!"

"Why, Lon! Is that all? Why, I thought something awful had happened."

She spoke bravely and cheerfully, but it was well for her poor dispirited husband that he could not know what a tremor seized her—with what a pang at heart she learned the calamity that had befallen them.

The children must be fed and clothed, and kept in school; the rent must be paid, and the payments on the lot met. It would be a steady outgo with no certain income, and the fact that Alonzo had had regular employment for twelve years, made him only the more helpless when his habits of work were suddenly broken up, and he should be forced to look about for another place.

To Alonzo it was as if the house that had sheltered him so long had been swept away, and he had found himself, with wife and children, bewildered and lost, exposed to the fury of the elements.

Susan went on talking cheerfully and hopefully, and Alonzo gradually absorbed something of her optimistic spirit.

"It ain't like you to give up this way, Lon," she said, not conscious that the opinion was a figment of her own fine loyalty. "The world ain't come to an end yet! The Works ain't the only place in this country, and though Dick Randall's been a mighty good friend to us, there are other good men in the world besides him! You've got some money in the bank, and the rent's paid for three months. You'll get a job before long, and, likely as not, a heap better than that'n at the Works. Everybody knows what a fine engineer you are and they'll all be wantin' you!"

She thoroughly believed that Alonzo's fame was wide-spread and far-reaching, and did not doubt that he would be immediately overwhelmed with offers; that, indeed, he might almost dictate his own terms when it was known he was free to accept another position.

"And if the very worst should come," she went on dauntlessly, "I could support the children—and you, into the bargain—sewin'."

"I don't want my wife supportin' me, or my children, either!" said Alonzo, with sudden decision.

"Well, 'tain't likely I'll have to," said Susan quickly, "but I just wanted to show you that we ain't in no danger of goin' to the poor-house—at least not just yet!"

Alonzo said nothing, but he held the faithful hand in a tighter grasp,—the hand which had ministered to all his needs with cheerful devotion, and that he knew would serve him to the last,—strong, tender, unwearying.

"You scared me nearly to death!" Susan said in her old, brisk, decided tones. "And I'm sure I don't know what the poor children'll think." She kissed Alonzo again and hurried to them.

Ned had only partly obeyed her as to Jody, who had retired to a warm place under the stove, but he had now recovered his spirits and was pretending to feed with crumbs a circle of gorgeous birds which adorned the rim of his plate. Eldora was waiting patiently until the closed door should open.

Susan said quietly: "Pile up the dishes and clear off the table, Eldory, Teddy isn't comin'."

She did not rebuke Ned "for messing with his victuals," as she might have done at another time, but lifted him from his chair and said gently: "You must make ready for bed now. It's long past your bed-time. You musn't fuss and make a noise; poor pa's got a headache, be a good boy and go upstairs as quiet as you can." For once he obeyed willingly, tired with the strange excitement that had so stirred the ordinarily quiet household.

Before Susan and Eldora had finished washing the dishes, Teddy came and Mary Benson with him. It is strange how men in the humble walks of life naturally gravitate to the kitchen; it is there that domestic crises are discussed—the place first sought when there is news to be told, good or ill. Teddy and Mary came straight through the house to where Susan stood over the dish-pan, washing dishes that Eldora neatly wiped. Alonzo, too, summoned heart enough to follow them.

Teddy was not apparently cast down. He was smiling and confident, but Mary's eyes were red and tear-stained.

"Well, Susan, I see you're not all broke up over it!" was his greeting, and Susan tossed her head.

"I guess not!—Lon felt pretty bad at first, but it was on account of me and the children. Now that he's really found out that he's got a wife that ain't likely to set down and cry over 'spilt milk,' he's feelin' a heap better, too!"

And Alonzo, thus rallied, smiled faintly.

"You're a brick, Susan! You're the right sort!" cried Teddy. "I wish Mary was more like you."

But Mary's sore heart could endure no more, and this slight rebuke, though spoken in jest, was too much, and she wept again.

"Now Mary," said Susan, "You just stop that! It's no way to act!"

"I—I don't care! You're already married, Susan, and—and you've got your home, and—Teddy—and ——" The sense of her misfortune could not be uttered, and Alonzo looked at the girl mournfully; their deep discouragement was a common bond between them.

"She's borrowin' trouble, and I've tried to make her see it. The wedding may have to be put off a little while; but nobody's going to pick up the house and carry it away bodily," said Teddy sturdily, patting Mary's shoulder gently. "And if they should—I hope it ain't the only house in the world!"

"Of course not!" said Susan cheerily. "That house'll stand there sometime yet, accordin' to my way of thinkin'!" She rolled down her sleeves and said, "Come, let's go into the other room!" and led the way.

Eldora now understood the situation; she had her mother's intelligence, with somewhat of her father's impassiveness, and no one could have dreamed from her collected manner the poignant heart-ache she kept to herself.

Our Readers' Opinions

Pres. Mullins on Baptism, and His Critics

Professor B. C. Deweese, of the College of the Bible, Lexington, Ky., recently quoted in The Christian Century a statement of Pres. Mullins of the Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, in which he says:

"Baptism has no spiritual efficacy whatever. Our Baptist position, as of course you well know, is that the ordinance of baptism has no spiritual efficacy."

The Christian Evangelist, referring to the quotation writes as follows:

This position was clearly brought out in the able paper which President Mullins read before our Congress a few years ago on the subject of baptism. It is clear that he conceives of baptism as wholly an outward act, and so regarding it he could not hold otherwise than that it is purely ceremonial, and without "spiritual efficacy." Our writers do not so conceive baptism. They think of it as an act of faith; the outward expression of the soul's confidence in Christ, and its glad surrender to him. Is it any wonder that while the two bodies hold these two differing conceptions of what baptism is, they should differ somewhat as to its design or spiritual significance? Here, then, is the point, so far as we and the Baptists are concerned, which needs to be settled. Is a simple immersion in water, baptism in the New Testament meaning of the word, or must there be back of that immersion, and suffusing it, faith in Jesus Christ, penitence for sin, and the spirit of obedience, in order that it measure up to the baptism which Christ commands?

There is evidently some confusion of thought here—some misunderstanding. Or is it a fact that when a Baptist takes the position of a Disciple, the Disciple becomes doubtful of his own position and retreats from it or seeks to modify it?

Pres. Mullins says: "Baptism has no spiritual efficacy whatever." Had Prof. Deweese or the editor of the Christian Evangelist written that sentence I do not believe it would have ever been objected to by any Disciple. Did Pres. Mullins mean to insinuate that the Disciples hold that there is spiritual efficacy in baptism? If so, he misrepresents them. We have often been charged with that, and have spent much time in repudiating the charge.

Dr. Mullins does not say that baptism has no efficacy. He knows and we all know it is physically efficacious to the extent of wetting the body and sometimes making it very uncomfortable. Baptism, Dr. Mullins will agree, is also ecclesiastically efficacious. It is the initiatory ordinance by which a penitent believer passes into the church of Christ, the kingdom of God on earth.

What Dr. Mullins affirms is that baptism has no spiritual efficacy. Repentance has spiritual efficacy. It affects a man's psychological and ethical nature, changes his thoughts, his feelings, his character, his life, his relation to God. Does baptism do anything of this sort? If these things do not precede, there can be no spiritual baptism.

The editor of the Christian Evangelist says: "Is a simple immersion in water, baptism in the New Testament meaning of the word, or must there be back of that immersion and suffusing it, faith in Jesus Christ, penitence for sin, and the spirit of obedience, in order that it measure up to the baptism which Christ commands?" The Baptists hold that there must be "faith in Jesus Christ, penitence for sin, and the spirit of obedience," in order to a scriptural baptism, just as tenaciously as do the Disciples.

The Disciples do not repudiate the idea that "a simple immersion in water is New Testament baptism" any more indignantly than do the Baptists. And when the editor of the Christian Evangelist, referring to Pres. Mullins, says, "It is clear tnat he conceives of baptism as wholly an outward act," he does Dr. Mullins an injustice, as I see it.

Again the editor says, "This position of Pres. Mullins was clearly brought out in the able paper which he read before our Congress a few years ago on the subject of baptism."

I read that address of Dr. Mullins with a great deal of satisfaction. On this point he took precisely the position which Alexander Campbell took in his debate with McCalla, and which he reaffirmed in his debate with Mr. Rice, and on many other occasions. The only difference was Mr. Campbell in speaking of the relation between baptism and the remission of sins, used the word "formal remission," and Pres. Mullins used the term "ceremonial remission."

Prof. Deweese, in criticising Pres. Mullins' position, that "there is no spiritual efficacy in baptism" says: "Of course, we all know that this baptism which the Lord commanded is just as spiritual as uttered prayer, or confessing Christ, or giving money, or performing any other religious act whatever we perform in loyal obdience to the Lord."

This is very true, nor would Pres. Mullins deny this. But when Pres. Mullins says there is no spiritual efficacy in baptism he is not considering the reflex but the direct influence of baptism on the spiritual nature.

That there should be a religious frame of mind accompanying every religious act all will agree.

In stating the relations of baptism to psychological conditions Pres. Mullins is right, Prof. Deweese is right, the editor of the Christian Evangelist is right, we are all right.

Let us all try to understand each other, and strive to reduce our differences to a minimum rather than magnify them. Has baptism any spiritual efficacy—does it, like repentance, create a spiritual condition in the mind? No, is the universal answer.

Another Parable on Baptism

Some one went into the home of a Hyde Park professor, took the picture of the professor's mother from the mantel, and left another in its place inscribed: "This will answer just as well; it is the picture of another respected person, and every respected personage has fruitage in memory and love."

"Buried with Him in baptism, wherein ye were also raised with Him through faith in the working of God who raised Him from the dead."

"Else what shall they do that are baptized for the dead. If the dead are not raised at all, then why are they baptized for them?"

Christian baptism pictures the resurrection from the dead. Removal of that picture and substitution of another disturbs the peace of the owner and perverts the aim of the artist.

The professor's parable, on page 10 of the Century of March 17, is incomplete to his inference: His farmer on his theory would have said: "Planting is not essential; I will therefore moisten the roots and fasten the plant to a trellis—bother this law of planting—I'll show you a specimen without it of up-to-date fruit!"

A set of directions from any good modern nursery will save the doctor and his patients from any such parabolic dilemmas in the future, for the burial of the roots of his parabled tree was essential to the risen life of its fruitage. The inevitable conclusion of his own parable is immersion.

Where the Bible Speaks

Concerning the old war cry, "Where the Bible speaks we speak and where the Bible is silent we are silent," it is time to call a halt in our talk and consider that Christ did not authorize the writing of these books called Scriptures, true though they may be, and they were not received as Scripture till more than a century after his resurrection.

Christ did not tell his apostles to write books, and only one of our gospels was certainly written by an apostle, and he, the only one who was commanded to write anything, and the only book he was commanded to write was the one which he said that God the Father had given to him to show unto his servants and that he sent his messenger to signify to his servant John. This is the only Christian scripture that expressly and directly claims to have come from heaven and it is the only one which is not considered scripture, but was rejected by Martin Luther and never incorporated in any religious system, certainly not accepted at its own appraisements, and yet it is Christ's own self-revelation and expressly commanded to be written in a book and sent to the churches. What Christ here said is quite outside all our systems and as it must have been received upon the spot upon its own claims and the personal testimony, it was the earliest Christian scripture properly authenticated and from the bosom disciple John. Now this undoubted Scripture closes with a curse upon him, "who shall add to or take away from its words of prophecy" and yet these other books were afterward gathered up and one by one added to it, contrary to its warning and these books came gradually to be regarded as "Holy Scripture," and later still with the Reformation, we began to evolve our religious systems out of these other books and dropped not a part of The Revelation of Jesus Christ, but the whole of it bodily, so that when we say the whole Bible, or the whole New Testament, we leave out the one book which was itself alone the written New Testament of the early church for a long time. The Singing Heart

I spoke a traveler on the road
Who smiled beneath his leaden load,
"How play you such a blithesome part?"
"Comrade, I bear a singing heart!"

I questioned one whose path with pain
In the grim shadows long had lain,
"How face you this life's thorny smart?"
"Comrade, I bear a singing heart!"

I cried to one whom adversity
Could not make bend the hardy knee,
"How such brave seems! Tell the art!"
"Comrade, I bear a singing heart!"

Friend, blest be thou, if thou canst say
Upon the inevitable way,
Whereon we fare, sans guide or chart—
"Comrade, I bear a singing heart!"

"Father"

By Katharine Norton.

My father's just the queerest man!
Why he can't do things Mother can.
He's twice as big an' brave an' strong,
An' yet he always does 'em wrong.
They say my mother's gone away;
It's been so lonesome all the day!
The house was awful strange and still;
I kept real quiet, waiting till
My daddy came. You see, he said
He'd put his little boy to bed,
Himself, tonight. I thought he'd know
How Mother tucks me in just so,
An' smooths my pillow, soft an' white,
An' kisses me, an' says good night.
But he forgot an' shut the door;
My nightie's on hind side before.
I wanted both my Teddy bears,
An' oh, I should have said my prayers!
But Father wouldn't laugh an' play;
He told me Mother'd gone away.
An' said he'd try to kiss me just
The way she does. I think he must Have cried, too, 'cause my pillow's wet.
Oh, hasn't Mother come back yet?

—St. Nicholas.

The Mocking Bird's House-Raising

By C. E. Jenny.

I was present at a house-raising last month that interested me very much. Sunday afternoon I was lying in the hammock under my apricot trees, the warmth of the day fast carrying me toward slumber-land, when the active motions of a mocking bird caught and diverted my attention. She was dancing about the crinum bed, picking up and dropping dry twigs. Evidently she was looking for one of a particular size and I soon understood that she was carefully selecting the timbers of a home, just as you and I might, were we capable of building our own house, select seasoned timbers for its underpinning. Whenever she got one that suited her she flew up into the nectarine tree, where the site was, and where I could indistinctly see her through the leaves, arranging the laying of the cornerstone and the building of the base of the structure.

Often, in the early stages of the nest, the stick she seemed to require and which she essayed to carry to its proper place, was too large for her strength. Sometimes a twig, half as big around as a lead pencil and longer would over-balance her in mid-air and after a vain flutter she would have to drop it and select a lighter one. Most of the larger twigs that formed the base of the nest were carried direct to the crotch of limbs where the nest was placed, and carefully adjusted. Some of the lighter material, which she carried in large bunches, she flew above the tree and dropped down, so that it would catch in the foliage and later be picked up.

Very careful was the assorting of material and its selection. For the fixing of the very first sticks, the gum that stews out of most trees of the peach family and which was quite plenty on the nectarine tree, was used for gluing. Perhaps it was this as much as the foresight in having the ripe fruit close at hand that led her to select the nectarine tree for building. She did not work too steadily, but after three or four loads had been carried, she flew off to the tip-top of a neighboring wind-mill and there sang rollicking snatches, interspersed with perfect imitations of the call of the valley partridge, "Shoot right here, shoot right here" as the old settlers so well interpret it.

Then after drinking at a tub where the water hyacinth is growing, she is back at work again. Gradually on the second and third days, the material became of a lighter finishing kind. Dried grass and thin strips of grape-vine bark was the finish she chose. Yet she never seemed in a hurry for its completion and stopped work always by five o'clock, to get supper and sing a while before dark. Later, in the night, when the moon came up, she would often awaken me by the glorious trills and bursts of song.

During the building of the nest, the male kept oversight like a sentry, from a neighboring tree, following her around so as always to overlook where she was at work, often sending some remark to her and at times voicing a warning when a stray cat, with quivering mouth, crept too near, or if a curious biped wandered too near the location of the nest.

A few days after the completion of the nest, four handsome eggs, reddish-brown on a greenish background, filled the hollow, and the mother bird spent most of her time in covering them. Then one morning a noisy buzzing or low chattering announced four insistently hungry newcomers, which had to be fed constantly in the day with bugs, worms and other nutritious delicacies that mocking-bird hygiene prescribed for baby mockers. Later, not wholly through the arguments of vegetarians but principally through the plentifulness and convenience of the diet, they will feast on ripe nectarines, apricots and peaches, but this will be after they are able to feed themselves. I shall not begrudge them their hearty appetites, for the songs lighten the days for me as well as for them. Even now, with the cares of providing for the nestful, the parents stop to sing and give praise for the glorious sunshine and the exceeding bounty of all good things. Accustomed as we are to their antics and their mocking imitations of other birds, often when they break into their own inimitable warblings, we say to each other "Listen to that mocker sing," for it is no mocking now, but pure, overflowing happiness.

The Little Legend of the Mignonette

Once upon a time there lived a king and queen who had a daughter who was the most beautiful princess ever seen. But she was so amiable and good that people forgot how beautiful she was and only spoke of her goodness. She had long golden curls; but, when the maid combed them and got the fine hair tangled, the princess never cried or got cross. At the table she never spilled her soup, and used her napkin and knife and fork properly. When the king and queen had to go on long trips, the princess did not cry or pout to go with them. She was so lovely and good that the queen of the fairies heard of her and determined to reward her. So she went to the palace and entered the presence of the princess.

"I have come to tell you," said the fairy, "that I have heard of your beauty and kindness and have come to reward you. Here are three wishes. Choose which one you want, and it is yours, always. First, you may be a bird, to go from one end of the earth to the other with no one to say nay or interfere. Second, you may be a butterfly, with no care in the world, only to be gay and happy and beautiful and to charm those who want to be happy during a summer day. Third, you may be a flower whose sweet perfume will cheer those who are unhappy, soothe them when they are sick, and will be a cheerful companion always."

Then the princess said: "If I were a bird, I might fly too far from my home and friends and forget to return, so I will not be a bird. If I were a butterfly I might think more of my pleasure and ease than of my duty, and my beauty might cause me to be vain. So I will be the flower, to help and comfort those who may be in need."

Then the fairy queen waved her wand, the the princess became the flower Mignonette.—Selected.

Open Our Eyes

There are to be found today men and women to whom Christo is as real as though they held his fleshly hand and looked into his sweet human face. They are as sure that heaven is around them as that their heart beats within them. They know that God loves them, as certainly as if he awoke them each morning with a kiss. . . . Some time ago I met with a picture representing two women in great sorrow. Standing behind the chairs on which they were sitting there appeared the figure of Christ stretching out his hand over them. They could not see him, because their eyes were dim, but he was none the less present with them. He was near in all his effulgent brightness, with all his sympathetic consolation, and with all his helpful power. At the foot of the picture this verse was written:

"Unheard, because our ears are dull,
Unseen, because our eyes are dim.
He walks on earth—the Wonderful—
And all great deeds are done for him."

What we need is the power to see—to see the chariots and horses on the mountains; to see God all about us; to see the strong, right arm of the Almighty stretched out to help us; to see that the darkest clouds and most threatening surroundings are under the all-controlling power of the Everlasting Father. And seeing this, we shall have the prophet's hope and the prophet's faith, and the prophet's trust that they who are with us are more than they who are against us. The prayer, then, that befits our lips day and night continually is, "Lord, we pray thee, open our eyes, that we may see."—Walter Jubb.

Woman's Lot

This, O this, is woman's lot,
To be a friend when others fail;
To look on death and fear it not,
To smile when other cheeks grow pale;
To trust in danger and in care,
To love when love seems almost dead;
To hope when other hearts despair,
And pray when love and hope are dead.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, MARCH 27 (Easter Sunday)

Theme for the Day.—The Resurrection of Christ.

Scripture.—And the angel answered and said unto the women, Fear not ye, for I know that ye seek Jesus whom they crucified. He is not here for he is risen from the dead. Matt. 28:5, 6.

The day of Resurrection, Earth, tell it out abroad,
The Passover of Gladness, the Passover of God.
From death to life eternal, from this world to the sky,
Our Christ hath brought us over, with hymns of victory.
—John of Damascus ("Resurrection").

Prayer.—Father of life, Thou giver of every good, we rejoice in the holy memories of this day. Thou hast shown us the empty tomb, and our hearts are glad with the knowledge that in Christ death has no dominion over us. Bestow upon us the joy of those whose lives are hid with Christ in God. Help us to live in the glory and strength of that eternal life, which already we begin to possess, and whose secret is that we may know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom Thou hast sent. Lighten all our days with the clear shining of Thy presence, and may we find the evening time bright with the radiance of the endless day. Amen.

MONDAY, MARCH 28

Theme for the Day.—The trumpet call.

Scripture.—Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men; be strong. I Cor. 16:13.

O, for a trumpet call to stir the throng
Of doubtful fighting men whose eyes and ears
Watch till a banner in the east appears
And the skies ring that have been still so long!
—F. W. H. Meyers ("A Child of the Age").

Prayer.—Gracious God, Thou hast summoned us to a great campaign against the powers of darkness in the world. Too often we grow weary or discouraged, and lose the ground we ought to hold. Save us, our Father, from the shame and sin of defeat, and may we find such assurance in Thy help, and such return of valor in Thy call to duty, that we shall win the fight. The grace of God be with us. Amen.

TUESDAY, MARCH 29

Theme for the Day.—The great refusal.

Scripture.—And Jesus looking upon him loved him, and said unto him, One thing thou lackest; go, sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come, follow me. But his countenance fell at the saying, and he went away sorrowful: for he was one that had great possession. Mark 10:21, 22.

After I had recognized some amongst them,
I saw and knew the shadow of him
Who from cowardice made the great refusal.
—Dante ("Inferno," III. 58).

Prayer.—Father of Mercies, the gifts of Thy hand have made us rich. We are amazed at Thy goodness to us. Save us, we beseech Thee, from the tragedy of making the blessings Thou hast given us the means of our own undoing. Keep us from selfishness, from cowardice, and from the ungenerous heart. Deliver us from hesitence in the presence of opportunity, and from slackness in Thy service. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30.

Theme for the Day.—Back from the grave.

Scripture.—The common people therefore of the Jews learned that he was there: and they came not for Jesus' sake only but that they might see Lazarus also whom he had raised from the dead. John 12:11.

Behold a man raised up by Christ!
The rest remaineth unreveal'd;
He told it not or something seal'd
The lips of that Evangelist.
—Tennyson ("In Memoriam").

Prayer.—Heavenly Father, Thou art the giver of life, and its sustainer. Thine is the power that brings us into the world, and Thine are the cords that hold us back from death. Deliver us, we pray Thee, from the fear of evil and of death. And may we follow our Lord, who called back from the grave the friend he loved; for he can save us too, not from the tomb alone, but from the death that cannot die. May we ever trust in him. Amen.

THURSDAY, MARCH 31

Theme for the Day.—Israel's deliverance at the sea.

Scripture.—Pharoah's chariots and his hosts hath he cast into the sea, and his chosen captains are sunk in the Red Sea. But the children of Israel walketh on dry land in the midst of the sea, Exodus 15:4, 19.

The Red Sea Coast, whose waves o'erthrew
Busiris and his Memphian chivalry,
While with perfidious hatred they pursued
The sojourners of Goshen who beheld
From the safe shore their floating carcasses
And broken chariot wheels.
John Milton ("Paradise Lost," I).

Prayer.—God of our life, Thy mercies have been over Thy people through all the past. Thou leddest Israel through the Sea, and didst guide them like a flock in the wilderness. We too need Thy sheperding and protection. Go with us as the pillar of cloud and fire. Set all the stations of our journey, and may our sorrow be turned ever into joy as we near the land of heart's desire, where we shall find our eternal rest. Amen.

FRIDAY, APRIL 1

Theme for the Day.—The comfort of Nature.

Scripture.—The trees of Jehovah are filled with moisture; The cedars of Lebanon, which he heath planted; Where the birds make their nests:

O Jehovah, how manifold are thy works! In wisdom hast thou made them all; The earth is full of thy riches. Psa. 104:16,17; 24:2.

If thou art worn and hard beset
With sorrows, that thou wouldst forget,
If thou wouldst read a lesson that will keep
Thy heart from fainting and thy soul from sleep,
Go to the woods and hills. No tears
Dim the sweet looks that Nature wears.
—Longfellow ("Sunrise on the Hill").

Prayer.—Loving Father, we thank Thee for this fair world in which we live. Thou hast made it very beautiful for us, and the springtime makes us glad with a new joy in all the works of Thy hands. Help us to find the satisfaction that Nature can give us. From the struggle of the day, and the turmoil of the world may we take time to leave the secret of quietness and peace that Thou canst teach us in the calm solitudes of hill and forest and field, where also our Savior loved to be. Amen.

SATURDAY, APRIL 2

Theme for the Day.—The light that shines.

Scripture.—Neither do men light a candle, and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick, and it giveth light unto all that are in the house. Let your light to shine before men. Matt. 5:15, 16.

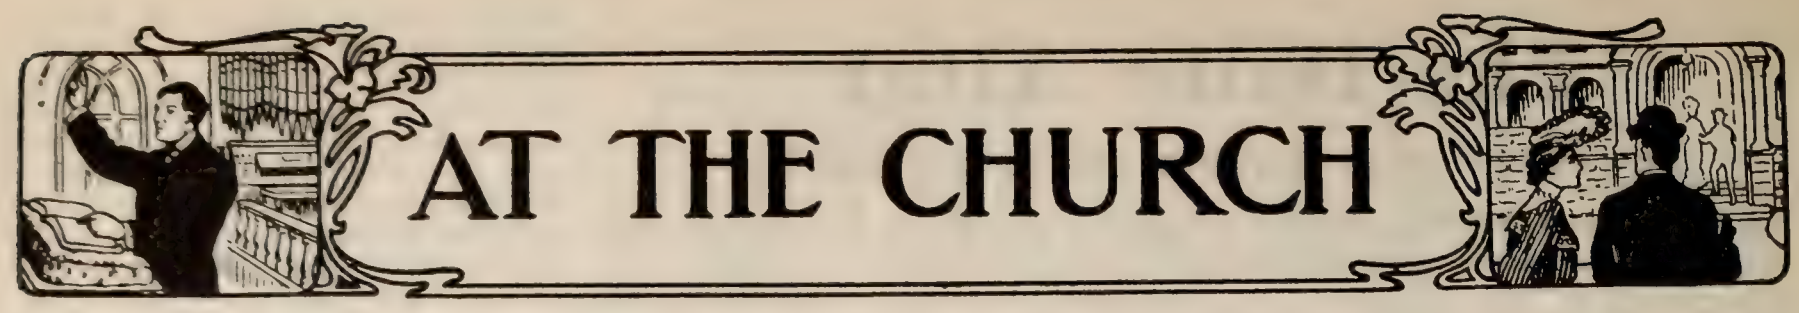
Heaven doth with us as we with torches do,
Not light them for themselves: for if our virtues
Did not go forth of us, 't were all alike as if we had them not.
—Shakespeare (Meas. for Meas. 1:1).

Prayer.—Good Father, we thank Thee for the light Thou hast sent us in the open day and in the gospel of our Lord. May we also learn the secret of the light that lighteth ever man. Deliver us from darkness and the love of things that lurk in darkened ways. May our light, however feeble, shine forth as Thou wouldst have it. And may the true Light, that never was on sea or land, lead us safely home. Amen.

"Pray for Us"

The weary ones had rest, the sad had joy
That day, and wondered how!
A ploughman, singing at his work, had prayed,
"Lord, help them now!"

Away in foreign lands they wondered how
Their simple word had power!
At home the Christian, two or three, had met
To pray an hour!



Yes, we are always wondering, wondering how,
Because we do not see
Some one, unknown perhaps, and far away,
On bended knee.
—Miss F. M. Nesbit, in Awake.

The Great Guest Comes In

By Edwin Markham.

While the cobbler mused there passed his pane
A beggar drenched by the driving rain.
He called him in from the stormy street,
And gave him shoes for his bruised feet.
The beggar went and there came a crone,
Her face with wrinkles of sorrow sown.
A bundle of faggots bowed her back,
And she was spent with the wrench and rack.
He gave her his loaf and steadied her load
As she took her way on the weary road.
Then to his door came a little child,
Lost and afraid in the world so wild,
In the big dark world. Catching it up,
He gave it milk in the waiting cup,
And led it home to mother's arms,
Out of reach of the world's alarms.

The day went down in the crimson west,
And with it the hope of the blessed Guest,
And Conrad sighed as the world turned gray;
"Why is it, Lord, that your feet delay?
Did you forget that this was the day?"
Then soft in the silence a voice he heard:
"Lift up your heart, for I kept my word:
Three times I came to your friendly door;
Three times my shadow was on your floor;
I was the beggar with bruised feet;
I was the woman you gave to eat:
I was the child on the homeless street."

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

Four Works of Power*

It is not without significance that the Gospel records contain so large an element of the miraculous in the life of Jesus. This is precisely what we should expect. Those who first walked with him must have been earliest impressed by the greatness of his work and life. But that greatness did not at first manifest itself in the region of character and teaching so much as in those activities which seemed astonishing to the beholders. The earlier Gospels, Mark and Matthew, deal more largely with miraculous events than those that came later in the life of the early Christian community.

This fact proves two things: first, that the narratives of miracle did not grow up in a later period of the life of the church, but were the record of events that actually took place in the ministry of Jesus. Before the days of the higher criticism it was freely asserted that Jesus never wrought these works of power, but that the second generation invented them in its effort to create a more vivid impression of the life of Jesus and to extend his influence in the world. But the severe criticism to which the early documents of our faith have been subjected has disproved this theory, and shown that they actually come from the very generation that knew Jesus personally.

But there is a second element equally impressive in this early record of miracle, and that is the fact that though at first the friends of Jesus were greatly impressed by his works of healing and were aided in their faith in him by these means, later on it was rather to his character and his teachings, his redemptive purpose and his world-wide program of righteousness, that their attention was directed. Therefore the miracles appear in greater abundance in connection with the early ministry of Jesus, and are more abundantly recorded in the first of the Christian documents. They were not fictitious, but real. They were not the product of later religious imagination, but were actually observed events. Yet their value was not at all comparable with the teaching and self-revelation of Jesus in the larger events of his life. They were valuable as an appeal to a lower order of reflection in reference to him. But when men came to know his character and to respond to the higher call of his life, miracle ceased to have signnficance to them, just as it has ceased to be of special value to us.

In this lesson there are recorded four events of this kind. All of them are of deep interest to the student who is anxious to learn the kind of life Jesus lived, and to know something of the sources of his power. They include the healing of the invalid woman, the raising of the daughter of Jairus from her bed of death, the healing of two blind men, and the restoration of speech to a dumb man. It was in this kind of work that Jesus found one of the great satisfactions of his life. It was a joy to him to bring health and soundness to those who were in distress. Yet it must always be borne in mind that he healed far fewer than he had opportunity to heal. There were circumstances in which he felt himself incapable of responding to the appeal of the sick, not from lack of those powers of will and of sympathy with which he was so richly endowed, but rather because he chose to reserve all acts of this character for use in behalf of men who could really be aided by his power, and in an atmosphere of faith in him. He had no mind to gratify the mere curiosity of the passers-by, nor was he anxious to respond to the appeals of men who only wanted physical aid. He wished rather to make his work effective in behalf of character, and this may account for both the significant nature of the healing work that Jesus really did, and for the comparatively few cases in which that power was actually displayed, in spite of what seems at first glance the crowded nature of the New Testament pages. In reality Jesus healed only a limited number of people.

The Infirm Woman.

The first of the incidents in this study is the healing of the infirm woman. For twelve years she had been the victim of a disease that was perhaps as much due to the foolish and superstitious medical practices of the time as to actual malady. The parallel narrative gives the information that she had done all she could to relieve her distress by consulting physicians, but was in no manner helped. She stole up behind Jesus as he passed, feeling sure that the mere touch of his garments would be effective in bringing her relief. She had seen him lay his hands on the sick, with that mysterious touch which seemed to impart blessing and health. And without the courage to ask of him the actual favor of his power, she was still intent upon securing, even unknown to him, the aid which he could render.

Something in her action attracted Jesus' attention to her. The curious expression is used in the parallel narrative, "he felt that strength had gone out of him." In this account we are merely told that he turned and saw the woman. But interested in her confidence in him, and pleased that she had been willing to run even the risk of his displeasure if she could touch his garment, he said to her kindly, "Daughter, be comforted. Your faith has availed to cure you." Perhaps Jesus meant by this far more than the mere colorless meaning which is often attached to the word. Did he have only in mind the fact that her faith had led her to touch him in order that she might be healed? Or did he really mean that her faith in him had really worked the cure and restored her to health? To elicit such faith from human life is itself an act of healing and uplift. If Jesus imparted to the woman some subtle power that restored her to health, he did much for her. If, on the other hand, he aroused in her a faith which was itself sufficient to react upon her weak body with the force of reorganization and revival of health, that was a still greater blessing. It is evermore the work of our Lord to deal with human life at the point where he finds it, and to bring out its own latent and unused powers of health and happiness. Where these are insufficient, he is ready to supply greater. But his first and most important work is to summon human life to such activities as are themselves redemptive and restorative.

The Ruler's Daughter.

Enclosing this incident of the woman who was healed is the narrative of the revival of Jairus' daughter. In the editorial columns of The Christian Century a week ago reference was made to this event, and it need not be treated at length here. It seems not to be a case of the recall to life of one who was dead, but the revival of one whom the attendants and family believed to have died. Jesus' words, "The damsel is not dead but sleepeth," seem conclusive on this point, and there is no need of giving them a forced or symbolic meaning. The significant fact in connection with this episode in the Life of Jesus is his tender solicitude for the grieving parents, his indignant thrusting forth of the professional mourners, who were only desecrating the sanctities of the home by their shrieks and simulated sorrows, and the calm majesty with which he summoned back the spirit of the child, hovering on the borderland of death, to animation and health. No wonder events of this kind caused the fame of Jesus to spread through all that region.

The Blind Men.

The third incident relates to two blind men who followed Jesus and his company, and implored him, with the title of Son of David, to take pity upon them. Jesus gave them no immediate response, perhaps the more fully to elicit their faith. If they had given up their effort, of course no help would have come to them. It was their confidence and their persistence in their request that brought to them the blessing they were seeking.

When they reached the house where Jesus was staying in the town, they pressed through the throng to his presence. In a country where diseases of the eyes are so common Jesus must have encountered thousands of blind men. Some few of these he healed when he saw that good could be done beyond the mere physical advantage. He said to these two men, "Do you believe that I can do this?" and when they confidently answered that he could, he seemed rejoiced at their faith, and putting his hands upon their eyes in his accustomed way he said, "Then, in accordance with your faith, it shall be done."

The Injunction to Silence.

The injunction of Jesus to these blind men that they should not tell what had occurred was no doubt due to the fact that the first value of his miracles, the attraction of the multitude to listen to his words, had long since been more than realized. In the multitude of hearers and witnesses that thronged his ministry he preferred to create a faith that did not rest on marvels but rather on his preaching of the kingdom of God. So, as far as he was able, he silenced his friends and the people he helped, so that they might not increase the morbid curiosity of the crowd concerning him. But we cannot marvel that such blessings made themselves known, and we can hardly blame the men for their course in proclaiming widely the story of Jesus' help to them. It was only the natural result of their gratitude to him.

The last event of the lesson relates to a man bereft of speech, and classed by the popular superstition with those believed to be possessed with demons. Jesus healed the man, which was the casting out of the demon as the witnesses interpreted his action. And when the afflicted man spoke, the people wondered at the event. No such leader had appeared before in their history. And the troubled Pharisees, seeing how little the work of Jesus fell to the credit of their order, tried to diminish its significance by insisting that Jesus was in league with the prince of demons, the lord of misrule, by whose power he was enabled to work these signs. Such charges were frequent in the speech of the rulers, but Jesus for the most part passed them by as the angry words of spiteful men.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

Topic, April 3, Christ Our Teacher (Consecration Meeting). John 12:44-50.

Jesus is our teacher as to the will of God, and the manner in which we are to make our lives conform to it. He is God's representative on earth, exemplifying the Father's will and he calls men to a little task. This is the sense in which he is our teacher. He tells us repeatedly that the Father sent him, and in our lesson says, "He that believeth on me, believeth not on me, but on him that sent me." It is as if Jesus were saying, "Look on me, here is a sample life of how the Father wants men and women to live. You are in a dark world. You do not know God. I am in your presence making God known to you. To you I am a light in this world dispelling its darkness. Even the words that I speak are not my words, they are the Father's. If, therefore, you reject them you are not rejecting my words but His, and I know that he who accepts and follows them lives the life eternal."

But we cannot be too careful as to how we are to maintain our discipleship. Certainly it does not consist of a literal legalistic interpretation of his words. "The letter killeth." He who learns aright will seek to emulate Christ's fidelity to his moral and spiritual ideas, however trying the circumstances. His willingness to serve at heavy personal cost in time and labor; his broad sympathies so great that they were touched by all classes; his spirit of fairness in all his dealings with men and women however unjustly they may have treated him; and the moral courage with which he faced every crisis, however great the odds, should always be the objects of study from our great teacher. He has learned Jesus best who has caught the spirit with which Jesus faced life's problems and who tries to do a similar thing in his own life. That is why Paul says, "the spirit giveth life." The question which we as Christian disciples raise, is not what did Jesus do, but what would he do if he were confronted with the problem or problems which now face us?

The importance of this question appears when we begin to apply it to the routine of our daily lives. Christian Endeavorers should endeavor to be Christian—Christ-like. To do so is to reproduce Christ's fidelity to his moral ideal in their own lives. Now let each of us apply it to his own life. Are you a student in the grades, the high school, the college, or the university? Are you courteous and kind to your instructors, and your fellow students? Are you conscious in the faithful preparation of your lessons from day to day? Are you true always to your own conscience on examination days? Are you in business, as a clerk, a proprietor, or the director in a stock company? Do you resist the temptation of the cash drawer? Does the yard of calico contain thirty-six inches? Is the sugar free from sand? Is the suit all wool or is it just so labeled? As director did you vote for just and equitable working conditions for those in your employ or for the largest dividends merely? Do you labor in a shop, on the street, or in the ditch? Does the work you do not only pass inspection but does it stand the test of usage?

Roosevelt, Okla.: Enclosed please find our February report. It would be necessary for you to be on the ground to appreciate the great work being accomplished here. Cooperton is a fine inland town in a fine farming country—a railroad is soon to run through the town. We knew nobody there when we began, had a few members and a small house, though the weather was fierce we have not lost a day—went to streams daily—broke ice to baptize the people. There were eighty-five additions; fifty-eight baptisms; forty-two heads of families; twenty-one united families; twenty-eight land-owners—most of them own fine farms. Bankers, merchants, clerks, ranchmen, barbers, teachers, ex-saloon and ex-pool hall men were among additions. Notwithstanding the meeting was growing in interest daily, the demand for a meeting at this place caused us to close at Cooperton and came here. Have no church here, but some outsiders attended Cooperton meeting and said we must come here. All church houses were refused us, but another non-church member and non-church goer came up and said he had the largest house in Roosevelt and we should have it, so we began there. The large folding doors in each end of the house have been thrown open and seats put back and front of house but still we cannot take care of the people. A baptistry is to be put into the house today. We expect a glorious meeting here. Denominationalism is strong here, but the masses are tired of it and want the simple gospel we bring. Pray for us. This is a hard field, but opportunities are numerous for the preachers who know nothing save Jesus and His word.

Elkins, W. Va.: I enclose report covering February. I am still at Elkins with Brother Lord with 129 additions to date. We are looking up a lot and a preacher, and will have this work self-supporting I hope. Will be here until the 20th at least. Among the number are numbered twenty-seven husbands and wives. Less than twenty former members. You will see by this report that the greater number have come during March. Have baptized thirty so far in March. With regards, Yours, ORILAS G. WHITE.

Items from American Missions

By Grant K. Lewis, Secretary.

There is enough news in the following two reports of missionaries of The American Christian Missionary Society to make the entire budget for this week. Besides this these reports are characteristic of the kind of evangelism the American Christian Missionary Society does. It is the only Society which gathers funds from the states where we are strong and distributes them in the states where we are weak. There are multitudes of churches capable of becoming living links and raising from from $3000 to $500 wherewith to support missionary evangelists North, East, South and West.

The Benevolent Association

Our great Foreign Missionary offering for this year has been taken. From present indications this offering has been such as to awaken thanksgiving in the heart of every true disciple of Christ. The next thing demanding our attention is the care of the widow and the orphan in our midst. We feel sure that God is pleased with our growing interest in world-wide evangelism. We are equally confident that he will not excuse us if we neglect to answer the cry of the orphan and the appeal of the helpless, homeless veterans of the cross. The world will not excuse us if we neglect the poor in our midst.

The Association has just received $400 from the estate of a good sister who remembered the poor even in her death. During life she sought to bear the burdens of the weak and so fulfil the law of Christ. In death she recognized Christ as her guide by providing for some of the "least of these" His brethren.

A gift of $125 was recently received from a good woman in memory of her sister. The sister had been a devoted friend of the Gospel of the Helping Hand through life, and the surviving sister in sending in her gift said, "I desire to continue my sister's good work in behalf of the poor." She could erect no more beautiful and lasting memorial.

One of the important features of the work of the Benevolent Association is to find Christian homes for orphan children. Not long since a good man and his wife, substantial farmers, devout members of the church, came to one of our homes and decided to take a pair of twin boys to rear them as their own.

If the churches and Bible-schools can not observe Easter in the interest of the orphan and the widow, they should observe some other day. It is not so much a question of times and seasons, but a question of doing the will of the Lord in a Christlike ministry. Money sent at any other time is as good as money sent at Easter, but Easter is the day set apart for making our offering. JAMES H. MOHORTER.

Notes from the Foreign Society

Our offering will be at least $100, maybe a trifle more.—W. B. Hendershot, Martinsville, Va.

The church at Liberty, Mo., enters the living link rank. Graham Frank is the minister.

Dr. E. A. Layton, late missionary of the Foreign Society, who now resides in Seattle, Wash., is organizing a Bible class among the Chinese at the University. He is building up a good practice in that city.

The total receipts of the year of the Foreign Society to March 15 amounted to $53,822, a gain over the corresponding time last year of $10,081.

Since the first of October last the Foreign Society has received $22,550 on the Annuity Plan, a gain over the corresponding time last year of $10,,080.

The church at Hiram, Ohio, and the students at Hiram College, are hoping to be able to raise enough to support their own living link on the foreign field.

The church at Paducah, Ky., W. A. Fito, minister, enters the living link rank in the Foreign Society. This is a great victory.

Our offering is all in and reaches $800. It was a very free and joyous offering.—W. H. Smith, minister, Harrodsburg, Ky.

The church at Langdon, Kans., is not large, but it will average from $3.50 to $4 per member for missions.—Frank A. Jalagess, minister.

I like your new plan of having One Day Churches. That's fine. Will be one of them soon.—J. E. Davis, Beatrice, Neb.

This congregation passed all previous records in missionary giving.—O. D. Maple, Cameron, Ill.

A little daughter gladdens the home of M. B. Madden and wife. They are sojourning at Topeka, Kans. They are our missionaries at Sondai, Japan.

The Ashland church makes the biggest foreign Missionary offering in its history, despite the fact that we are building a new church.—W. D. Ryan, Ashland, Ky.

The friends and churches are requested to to help secure the school property in Shanghai, China.

The friends and church are requested to forward their March Offering for foreign Missions promptly to the office of the Foreign Society.

Eighteen new living link churches have been heard from and a number more are expected.

A Great Missionary Congress

The men's National Missionary Congress will be held in Chicago in the Auditorium, May 3-6. This will be one of the most significant meetings the world has ever seen. Only a few can attend the world's missionary conference in Edinburgh, Scotland, next June, but here is a conference, in many ways as signficant, right at our doors. It marks the calmination of the campaign which has awakened the Christian men of a hundred cities to their responsibility in the evangelization of the world. Five thousand leading men of the American churches will meet in Chicago, May third, to formulate a national missionary policy—the first in the history of the United States. The 135 delegates apportioned to the Christian church will represent our people in the deliberations of the congress. It is hoped that the busiest man will feel the importance of making the sacrifice of time. This is the King's business. We should have our full quoto there. The importance of this congress cannot be estimated. The proportionate representation should be sixty preachers and seventy-five "laymen." If you can go, send your application to the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, Cincinnati, Ohio.

A Merger of Near Kin

In a certain square mile in Chicago are more than thirty struggling Protestant organizations, no one of them adequately equipped for large service to the community, and two Catholic churches with cathedral-like buildings and overflowing congregations at every service. A way to local union through independency causes as great evils as it attempts to cure. The undenominational church, lacking relation to missionary agencies, almost inevitably induces parochial selfishness. But an interdenominational form of church union is possible which both attains larger local efficiency and conserves denominational loyalty. An example of this type of union is Memorial Church of Christ, Chicago.

Nearly two years ago Memorial Baptist Church was pastorless. It possessed a well-appointed building but in a shifting population which made the problem of filling it exceedingly difficult. A neighboring church had one of the most popular preachers of the city, Dr. H. L. Willett of the Disciples' Divinity School, and its growing congregation was in need of a new building. The Baptists' and Disciples' leaders took advantage of this combination of circumstances to effect a union, advantageous to both parties, the Memorial Church of Christ. Dr. Willett became pastor in the building erected by the Baptists and Dr. R. N. Van Doren, an editor of the Standard, associate pastor. With supplementary gifts they have administered the affairs of the united churches in harmony and efficiency. Strength has come with union, and problems exceedingly difficult to the separate congregations have found easy and happy solution.

In purely parochial matters the two churches act as one. In extra-parochial undertakings they remain loyal to their respective denominations. It broadens and enriches the life of both pastors and people to be in touch with two denominations, instead of one, and to feel responsibility for an enlarged circle of missionary agencies. The plan for missionary offerings provides for a regular presentation of the vaious causes with an equitable apportionment to the Board of the two denominations. As both parties to the union are immersionists, no provision for differing forms of baptism is necessary. In deference to the custom of the Disciples, the communion is celebrated every Lord's Day; but it is an open communion.

Perhaps the greatest gain is limitation of the denominational shibboleths. It is too much to claim that all who are parties to the union never look back and desire to return to the former status of unmarried independence. There are occasional murmurings like the lustings of the manna-fed children of Israel for the "leeks and onions of Egypt"; but, for the most part, the members of this church of Christian union, Baptists and Disciples, realize that they are pilgrims to a better country and rejoice that they are counted worthy to blaze a way in which others may follow.—J. H. C., in The Congregationalist (Boston).

Though Teddy talked with much confidence, he felt the impending loss of his place far more than he would acknowledge; but he was young, strong and sanguine. He had never come into actual, desperate conflict with want, and he could not dread an evil of which he had no personal knowledge. He had always had a good-natured contempt for men who "lost their job," and could not readily find another; in the arrogance of his own buoyant youth and splendid strength, he thought and said that "it must be their own fault."

"I wouldn't feel so bad," said Mary, "but I've spent so much on my clothes and in buying things for the house; and Teddy's spent a good deal more than he could afford, too!"

"I think I'll be able to keep from beggin' a few weeks longer!" cried Teddy, jestingly.

Notwithstanding the bold front that he had assumed, no one but himself knew how ruinously he had drawn upon his carefully accumulated savings. He had, in fact, just one hundred dollars, and no more. It would not have worried him were the Works kept running—his salary going on—for Mary had determined to be as thorough and frugal a house-keeper as Susan and both would exercise the most careful economy.

"As I've told her, we may have to wait a little while till I get a job, but it won't be for long—a few weeks maybe, at most," said Teddy encouragingly. "Plenty of other folks have had to do the same thing and have come out all right. Come, Mary, be sensible!"

"I'm sure she will!" cried Susan, heartily. "She's got too much good feeling to tease you with fretting and worrying!"

"I hope I have!" sighed Mary, but it was toward Alonzo that she looked.

They talked until late into the night, the four poor creatures whose present circumstances and whose immediate future had been suddenly overcast, as a summer day is darkened by the rising cloud which has lain hidden below the horizon, biding its time. They were like castaways, who, thankful for any salvation, with supplies still sufficient for their immediate wants—faced none the less, starvation and unimagined perils.

It was almost midnight when they separated, but they had all reached that state of composure where they were able, as Susan said, "to look things in the face." They were resigned, if not confident, but none realized that it was to the indomitable Susan Johnson that they owed their sudden access of courage. Such a spirit not only endures its own tribulations, but lightens the load of others, sending them on their way with renewed faith.

ALL CORRECT.

The professional point of view is rarely that of the humanitarian. A passenger on a London omnibus calls out to the conductor:

"All right," responds the conductor, cheerfully, "E's paid his fare!—London Sketch.

CORRECTED.

At a dedication festival service at a country church the following announcement was made by the vicar: "The collections today will be devoted to the arch-fund, and not, as erroneously printed on the service papers, to the arch-fiend."—London Daily News.

Church Life

Easter should be made significant for the deepening of the spiritual life of the church.

The inexhaustible theme of the deathless life will occupy the attention of our churches next Sunday.

The months from Easter till summer may be made the most successful in the entire calendar of the church year.

"Our Readers' Opinions" is always a refreshing page, giving as it does the point of view of many minds.

The First Church, Bloomington, Ind., sends out a cordial welcome to the brotherhood to attend the meetings of the congress to be held in that city, March 29-31.

The Easter offering for the Benevolent Association is worthy of the attention of all our churches at this season. Little children and aged saints wait upon this offering for the supply of their daily needs.

The church at Princeton, Neb., is planning for a new building to cost about $12,000.

Evangelist T. L. Gray is leading in an evangelistic meeting at Winfield, Kans.

The Tabernacle Christian Church, Columbus, Ohio, has invited the State Convention to meet with them next year.

There are frequent additions to the church at Orlando, Fla., under the ministry of A. M. Chisholm, pastor.

John Young, pastor of the church at Hallister has accepted a call to the pastorate of the church at Bethany, Mo.

The church at Red Bluff, Cal., is said to be "quite taken" with its new minister, L. O. Ferguson.

The Virginia State Sunday-school convention will be held at Norfolk, April 11-14. Meeting in the Epworth M. E. Church.

Thomas H. Popplewell, Arkansas City, Kansas, reports five accessions at regular services of the church March 13.

An organized class of Dallas, Texas, on one Sunday gave $427 for missions; another gave $200 at the same time for the same cause.

The Bible-schools of Oklahoma report 8,240 additions to the church from their membership. This shows us the value of the school.

Announcement is made of the birth of a daughter to Mr. and Mrs. Royal J. Dye. Mrs. Dye is in a Chicago hospital and may be addressed at 6827 Perry avenue.

The church at Healdsburg, Cal., has extended a call to N. S. Johnson to become their pastor. Mr. Johnson has been serving the church at Lakeport, Cal.

Otto B. Irelan, who recently resigned his work with the South Berkeley church, has been called to the pastorate of the Santa Clara, Calif., church.

James R. McIntyre, pastor of the church at Santa Monica, Cal., is pushing the work with vigor and there are frequent additions to the church.

Kansas and Nebraska are in a contest for the largest number of organized adult classes. Kansas started with 309 classes. Nebraska with 254.

J. A. Lytle has resigned as pastor of the church at Catlin, Ill., where he has been a little more than a year. The congregation had extended him a call to remain another year.

Randolf Cook, editor of the Christian Advance, Wichita, Kansas, is announced as a candidate for Congress on the Democratic ticket.

Good audiences are greeting B. H. Hayden, London, Ontario, at every service. Sunday, March 4, four good young men made the confession of their faith.

F. M. Rogers, pastor, assisted by Princess Long, leader of song, closed a meeting with the church at Long Beach, Cal., February 6. There were sixty accessions.

The church at Dublin, Texas, has called R. H. Simmons to become their pastor, and he will accept. Mr. Simmons is an alumnus of Texas Christian University.

Hugh McClellan, of Richmond, Ky., it is announced, has accepted a call to the Central Church, San Antonio, Texas, and will begin work about the first of May.

I. N. McCash, secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society, preached at the Second Church, Milwaukee, and in the First Church the evening of March 13.

L. O. Herrald has resigned the pastorate at Jasper, Okla., and is visiting the parental home at Grass Creek, Ind. W. T. Wells takes the work at Jasper.

W. B. Clemmer is now at work as pastor of the church at Rockford, Ill. Sunday evening, March 6, the chorus choir of thirty-five voices rendered "The Ten Virgins," by Gaul.

O. C. Bolman has served as pastor of the church at Havana, Ill., for two years and has accepted a call for four months more of service. He is available for meetings during August and September.

The Baptist, Methodist and Presbyterian churches of Healdsburg, Cal., adjourned their services to unite in a farewell tribute to George W. Brewster who resigned to accept a call to the church at San Jose.

C. M. Watson, pastor of the church, Connersville, Pa., is holding a series of meetings in his church the evenings of passion week. Easter will be observed as decision day by the Sunday school of this church.

State Evangelist J. S. Raum has closed a successful meeting at Deer Lodge, Mont., where G. H. Kemp ministers. There were twelve additions. The work in general was built up.

The church at Jacksonville, Ill., is preparing to erect a parsonage, and the pastor, R. F. Thrapp expresses the belief that this will be the greatest year in the history of the church.

The church at Liberty, Mo., has honored itself and A. B. Jones by electing him pastor emeritus as a recognition of his long and efficient service in the ministry and in the local church.

C. H. Hilton, Milton, Ore., has for three weeks been assisting Pastor S. G. Fisher and the church at Walla Walla, Wash., in a meeting. There were twenty-five accessions to the church.

The church at Ames, Iowa, has in the last two months raised a sufficient amount in cash and pledges to pay off the last indebtedness on the church, amounting to $2,200. John T. Houser, minister.

Le Roy M. Anderson will begin work at Ada, Okla., April 1, and will introduce the Bethany Graded Lessons as early as possible. Mr. Anderson is very hopeful of a fruitful ministry in Ada.

The annual district convention of the Indiana Christian Missionary Society will be held with the church at Tipton, March 31 and April 1. Guy Israel Hoover is pastor of the church at Tipton and is doing a fine work.

Guy I. Hoover, pastor of the church at Tipton, Ind., read a paper on "The Movement for Church Unity in American Christianity," before the meeting of the Central Indiana Ministerial Association at Indianapolis, March 14.

J. M. Lowe, evangelist, is in a meeting at Kensington, Kansas, where Nelson Gardner is pastor. Mr. Lowe has just closed a meeting with the Central Church, Topeka, in which there were forty-three accessions to the church.

President Braden held a ten days' meeting at Keuka College during February, at which there were thirteen confessions, all students. Mr. Braden also assisted C. R. Stauffer, Syracuse, for ten days, with thirty-four accessions to the church.

At the Howett St. Chapel, Peoria, Ill., a Sunday school rally was held Sunday, March 13, with an attendance of 307. In the evening there was a good company of people to hear the sermon by the pastor, William Price, and six additions to the church.

We were misinformed badly about the sort of a house the church at Norman, Okla., is projecting. Instead of a $2,200 building they are planning to spend $25,000 and erect a church home adequate to their important city. H. F. Reed is the able pastor there.

J. Frank Green has located at Cadillac, Mich., under instructions from the state board to plant a church there. Several of the more important centers of that state are being considered by the board for this same purpose.

The Sunday-school of the Central Church, Des Moines, recently had an attendance of 831 and they immediately went to work to secure 900 the following Sunday. Peter Ainslie of Baltimore, is now in a meeting with this church.

The Men's clubs of Spokane, Wash., have recently formed a federation with the hope of bringing all the men of the churches frequently together in a social way and to interest them in the task of city evangelization.

The faculty of Cotner University have presented us with a copy of resolutions adopted upon the death of Prof. Ellen B. Atwater, former student and teacher at Cotner, whose life and genuine Christian spirit are remembered as a benediction.

The Highland Park Church, Los Angeles, Cal., has become self-sustaining, thus releasing $20 per month which they have been receiving from the C. W. B. M. The church has made rapid advancement in the last few months under the leadership of C. L. Green, minister.

Walter S. Rounds, pastor of the church of the Disciples, Dorchester road and East Fifteenth street, New York, has announced the following themes for sermons during passion week: "The Sifting of Simon," "Impulse and Duty," "The Supreme Rejection," "The Ready Excuse," "The Voice From the Cross."

The Indiana Avenue Church, South Bend, Ind., will begin the erection of a new building about the middle of April. This church, organized under the ministry of P. J. Rice, in 1902, then pastor of the First Church of that city, has made great growth under leadership of C. C. Buckner who has been there fifteen months.

F. W. Emerson, pastor at Redlands, recently closed a fine meeting with the University Church of Los Angeles, J. W. Maddux, pastor. This is one of the newer churches in the city and has been meeting its problems with worthy zeal and determination. It has one of the best possibilities before it to be found in the city.

Mr. Clark Oberlies, state Bible-school superintendent, spent Sunday, March 13, with the church at Beatrice, Neb. Mr. Oberlies spoke at the morning service and here at a conference with the teachers during the afternoon.

The Winfred Ferrall Bible Class of the Jefferson Street Sunday-school, Buffalo, N. Y., gave a St. Patrick Social March 17. When it is remembered that the pastor of the church is named Ferrall (B. S.) it will be seen in what esteem his family is held in the church.

The kindly feeling between the Baptists and Disciples of Athena, Ore., was manifest recently by a union communion service. Many in each congregation are praying that this shall become a usual practice in the future between these two, and also many other congregations.

John G. Slayter, formerly pastor of the East End Christian Church, has entered upon his ministry with the Portland Avenue Church, Minneapolis, and is directing the work with vigor. March 20 a "reunion" service was held with special effort to secure the attendance of all Disciples of the city.

The Central Church at Portland, Ore., is making good progress toward erecting their new stone building. The spirit of this congregation seems to be strictly evangelistic. Their minister, J. F. Ghormley, never loses an opportunity to preach the gospel to neighboring communities.

The First Church of Los Angeles is attracting the largest audiences in the twenty years' ministry of A. C. Smither. At a recent business meeting of the church it was found that all current bills were paid and more than a hundred dollars remained. A great work remains to be done by this mighty force, for the problems of the "down-town" church are met only by heroic effort which reaches afar.

In the two years O. C. Bolman has served the church at Havana, Ill., there have been 270 additions to the church, as result of regular services and two revival meetings. The attendance of the Christian Endeavor Society has been quadrupled, and a Junior society of forty-three members organized, also a Men's Brotherhood, Loyal Sons and Loyal Chorus Choir.

Dr. L. C. Moore, the youngest son of Dr. W. T. Moore, official chemist and food inspector of Dallas, Texas, is superintendent of the Sunday school of the Central Church of that city. Mr. Moore is leading in the preparation for a large Sunday school parade in which all denominations will participate. The meeting will be held at the time of the Texas state convention, May 9-12.

C. L. Morrison, pastor of the First Christian Church, Wellsville, Ohio, gave an address in his church Sunday evening, March 13, on "The Brotherhood Principle," before a number of the fraternal orders of the city. The address as well as the music furnished by the choir under the leadership of Minnie F. Duck, were favorably commended by the local press.

A. M. Growden, whose ministry in Ohio and Pennsylvania is widely known, has begun his work with the Santa Barbara church. This church has the problem of a vast pleasure resort, frequented for many months of each year by people of wealth and leisure. The faithful band who have "held the fort" there with splendid fidelity are bound to reap the reward of faithful labor. Pastor Growden is a splendid leader.

The fourth district convention of the Indiana Christian Missionary Society will be held at Tipton, Thursday and Friday, March 31 and April 1. This district includes the churches at Logansport, Delphi, Peru, Rochester, Tipton, Kokomo and outlying churches. A strong program has been prepared. The Tipton church will entertain both for meals and lodging those who may come. The churches of the district are most cordially invited.

T. L. Noblitt has been pushing the work with vigor at Guthrie, Okla. In the twenty-six months of his pastorate there have been 260 accessions to the church. The property has been freed from debt, and improvements made at the cost of $350 during the past sixty days. As a result the church declined to accept Mr. Noblitt's resignation which he recently presented and instead of complying with his request in this, voted him a five hundred dollar increase in salary.

Miss Una Dell Berry has been secured by the church at Bloomington, Indiana, to lead the music during the sessions of the congress to be held there March 29-31. The church is planning a big men's meeting on Monday night before the congress with P. C. Macfarlane present. All who intend to attend the congress and desire lodging and breakfast to be provided by the church at Bloomington should send their names today to Joseph C. Todd, Bloomington, Indiana.

John T. Brown closed a meeting last week at Eugene, Ore., with 275 persons added to the church. Eugene is the site of the State University and the Disciples' Bible College. J. S. McCallum is pastor of the church which now has about 1,500 members. A result of the meeting was the launching of a new building enterprise with $25,000 raised toward a $500,000 structure. The new converts pledged $700 to current expenses of the church. Mr. Brown is now in a meeting in Scranton, Pa., assisted by Leroy St. John, as singer.

Sumner T. Martin, has been preaching for several days at Colexico, Cal., and has gathered together a band of thirty-four disciples who will organize a church and Sunday-school. Mr. Martin will soon engage in a similar work at Brawley, and then hopes to be able to get these two fields to unite in the support of a pastor. Under Mr. Martin's ministry at Holtville there were fifty-three accessions since he began there last December. A Christian Endeavor Society of fifty members has been organized, also a C. W. B. M. and Young Ladies' Mission Circle.

J. N. Johnson, pastor of the churches of Trumbull, and East Thompson, Ohio, recently led his church in a union meeting with the M. E. Church of Trumbull, which resulted in twenty confessions of faith, eleven of these becoming members of the Christian Church. Mr. Johnston says the meeting was thoroughly enjoyed by each church, and helped to a closer sympathy between the two organizations. Mr. Johnston has just resigned his pastorate of these churches that he may remove to some place where he can secure better school privileges for his children.

Mr. T. Kawai, pastor of the new Japanese church, Los Angeles, is thirty-eight years old. His mother was a Christian woman and gave him a Christian education. He was baptized in 1885 and studied for four years in Doshisha, a Christian school established by Joseph Hardy, and then at Waseda University, Tokyo, graduating in 1893. Since 1894 he has spent three years in Drake University. He has been engaged in Christian work and editor of a paper since 1896. He came to America in 1909 and is now serving the Los Angeles church under the C. W. B. M.

The congregation at Fort Smith, Arkansas, is jubilant over raising, Sunday, March 13, $8,000 to pay off a debt upon the church property, which has been a great burden to the church since the new church was built seven years ago. Four thousand of this was a loan from the Church Extension Board. This happy result was made possible by an offer from one family in the church to pay one-half of the indebtedness provided the congregation would give the remainder. The offer was quickly accepted and now with the large increase of membership from the Brooks meeting the church feels that it will enter upon a new era of accomplishment. Edward B. Bagby is the energetic pastor.

The annual report of the First Church, Seattle, has just come to hand. Joseph L. Garvin is pastor. This church has 383 active members, thirty-three "out-of-town members," 267 inactive members, or who can

Follow the International Lesson Committee

Every informed Sunday-school worker desires to have the graded system introduced into his school. But it seems like too big an undertaking to grade the school all at once. Hence nothing at all is done, and the school goes on in the same old absurd way of teaching the children the lessons provided for grown-up people

The International S. S. Committee has made it possible to bring the graded system in, like the Kingdom of God comes, "without observation." You can have your school graded without any agony—almost without knowing it, except in its beneficent results. Begin at the bottom now—with the elementary grades, the pupils under twelve years old. Provide teachers and pupils with the Bethany Graded Lessons, based on the outlines already authorized by the International Committee. Later on—perhaps in nine month or a year from now—when the Committee authorizes an outline of lessons for the Intermediate grades you will be ready to adopt them and the Bethany Series will be ready with the helps for you. And so on, through the Senior and Advanced grades, follow the International Committee and as fast as they provide the lessons you will be ready to adopt them.

Our advice to all schools, then, is: FOLLOW THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE. No independent course yet devised is better than that provided by the International Committee, if indeed there is one so good in all respects. Besides, there is advantage in the whole Sunday-school world studying together when our leaders really lead—as the International Committee is now doing.

The Bethany Graded Lessons may be commenced at any time. Purchase the main bulk of your supplies wherever you wish, but let us furnish you these fascinating lessons for your pupils under twelve. THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO., 700 East Fortieth Street, Chicago.

not be located, making a total of 683 members. There were eighty-eight accessions last year and fifty-nine removals leaving a net gain of twenty-nine. Financially the church made a fine showing. It gave to home missions $259.01, foreign missions, $608.27; church extension, $74.55; current expenses, $3,992.15; Italian relief, $42.25; other benevolences, $1,230.52, making a total of $6,366.06 raised during the year. The average attendance at Christian Endeavor meetings, was forty-nine; Ladies' Aid Society, membership, sixty-eight; C. W. B. M. membership, ninety-eight; Junior C. E. membership, forty-one; Men's Association, ninety members; average attendance at Sunday-school, 165; average attendance at morning church service, 211, evening, 122. Money raised by auxiliaries of the church was: Sunday-school, $461.87; Ladies' Aid, $213.04; C. W. B. M., $271.75; C. E., $196.15; Junior C. E., $47.16; Men's Association, $106.60; Business Women's Association, $13.55. Total receipts, $7,675.88.

The Central Illinois Convention of the Laymen's Missionary Movement will be held in Peoria, April 7-10. This convention will be one of seventy-five now being held throughout the United States, in a national campaign to arouse interest in this great laymen's missionary effort. The opening session will be a banquet the evening of April seventh, at the auditorium. It is expected that 1,400 will be seated at this banquet. The motto of this great movement is: "The Evangelization of the World in this Generation." Tre great crowds of men who have attended these conventions in other cities have universally gone home with a new vision of the meaning and significance of foreign missions. All churches within a radius of sixty or seventy miles of Peoria are entitled to send to this convention its pastor and the largest possible number of laymen. Men of expert knowledge on the subject of missions will speak. Speakers whose presence is assured are, George Sherwood Eddy of India, Dr. M. B. Eubank of China, Bishop Lewis of China, S. Earl Taylor of New York, and Bishop W. F. McDowell of Chicago. The registration fee for the convention is one dollar, and those who attend the opening dinner will be expected to pay one dollar also for that. No collections or subscriptions will be taken at any time during the convention.

W. H. Allen, pastor at Muncie, Ind., has been compelled to relinquish his work at the Jackson Street Church for a few months that he may regain his broken health in a Flotida sojourn. Mr. Allen has been most active in his church work and especially prominent in the Anti-Saloon movement in his state.

Nelsonville, Ohio, Meeting

We have just closed a splendid four weeks' meeting in which Chas. Darsie, of Uhrichsville, Ohio, did the preaching and singing. It was a quiet, helpful and strong meeting. Mr. Mr. Darsie's sermons were logical and convincing. He preaches his convictions and convinces his audiences. There were eighty-two accessions. Fifty-six baptisms, forty-eight were heads of families, sixty over twenty years of age, and one third of them men. The church is left much stronger to carry on its great work. The Bible-school reached its highest attendance during the meeting, having March 13, 906 present, of whom over 400 were men. The school averages over 600. In the four years of the present pastorate, the school has grown from an average of 200 and there have been more than 350 additions to the church.

Central Illinois Ministers, Attention

The Central Illinois Ministerial Association will be held in Peoria, instead of Clinton as heretofore announced, on Wednesday and Thursday April 6 and 7. This change of time and place is made on account of the desire of many to attend the Laymen's Missionary Meeting at Peoria April 7-10 and is rendered possible by the courtesy of the Peoria church. The full program will be published later.

The Brooks-Lewis Revival at Newark, Ohio

It is no light task to attempt to describe a series of evangelistic meetings. The most important features of a revival can not be tabulated; they defy description. No writer could adequately set forth the benefits and power resulting from the series of meetings recently held in Central Church of Christ of this city by W. T. Brooks, evangelist, and Samuel Lewis, singer. The meetings began February 5 and lasted four weeks, lacking two days. The writer had been on the ground as minister just a month before the evangelists came. There was but little oportunity for the usual, systematic, preparatory work. There was much uncertainty in the minds of the members as to the wisdom of attempting such an enterprise at the beginning of a pastorate, although the contract had been signed for nearly a year. But one of the chief benefits of the meetings was the unifying and reviving of the church membership. The invitation to accept Christ was not urged until the second Sunday. The first week was spent entirely in the attempt to enlist and reconsecrate those who were already members. It is the profound conviction of the writer that every revival should be begun that way. On the first Sunday of invitation, or the second Sunday of the meetings, ninety persons were added to the Lord. The church was refreshed and ready for the victory when it came, and prepared to press on to larger conquests. One of the features of the revival was the splendid hearing obtained by the evangelists. The church building seats easily seven hundred people. The house was full at almost every service, and on Sunday nights the crowds could not be adequately accommodated. Two hundred and nineteen persons responded to the gospel invitation, which with seven who united with the church before the meetings began and five since they closed, makes a total of 231 since the present ministry began, January 9. W. T. Brooks is a strong, fearless, effective preacher of the gospel; and best of all, he is a pure-minded, consecrated man of God. His influence for righteousness in Newark will long be felt. As a sweet singer, as a chorus director, and as a personal worker, certainly Samuel Lewis has no superiors, and few equals, among us. Aside from his unquestionable musical ability, his chief power lies in his quiet, cheerful, Christlike life. We thank God for the coming of these men into our midst. We face the future with courage and hope.

Most fraternally,

W. D. Ward, Minister.

Keuka College

It will be of interest to all the friends of Keuka college to learn that the Ball Brothers have offered the school $5,000, next year conditional upon a like sum being raised from the Disciples of Christ. This constitutes a challenge to our great brotherhood. It will be remembered that our people are conducting this college in coöperation with the Free Baptists. The provisions of the union are that the Disciples of Christ shall have the Bible department, one-half of the board of trustees and one-half of the executive committee. The president is also one of our men. Surely no terms could be more liberal than these. In fact they constitute a test of our stand on Christian union. This challenge of Ball Brothers ought to be met immediately. Our deplorable weakness in the East demands that we shall have a center of influence from which we may carry on our work. This we believe is to be found in such a Christian college as is Keuka.

Some Illinois Items

D. E. Hughes, pastor at Monmouth for twelve years, is doing a fine work for the church in this historically difficult field. He has a large Sunday school—perhaps the largest in the city—which compels them to spend $6,000 to provide more room. There are regular additions and never were the prospects better for a great work. The Biederwolf union revival is a great gain to the Christian church as many are placing their membership.

J. A. Barnett, the genial Galesburg pastor, is a general in another hard field; nevertheless he is "doing things"; his church becomes a Living Link in the Foreign Society; they are preparing for a great meeting in the fall and expect to erect a new house of worship soon. Galesburg has 25,000 and no saloons. She's not dead yet.

The Cameron, Ill., church is entering her eightieth year (organized April 30, 1831) yet is as young as ever and is not going down the valley. The congregation gives more for missions than ever before in her history, raising her "raised" apportionment.

O. D. MAPLE, Pastor.

Texas State Convention

The Texas Christian Missionary Convention assembles this year in Dallas, Texas, May 9-12. This has been a season of great gatherings in Dallas. The Baptists marshalled 2,500 delegates at their state convocation, the Methodist laymen brought 2,000 men, and the Interdenominational Sunday School Association is on the eve of gathering 2,000 more workers. Realizing that an ordinary gathering of our state forces after all this would be ridiculous, especial effort has been made to bring not less than one thousand Disciples to Dallas in May. J. O. Shelburne reports prospects for six hundred men at the brotherhood session and banquet on Tuesday, May 10. It is believed by leaders that an equal number of women will assemble in the C. W. B. M. sessions. F. M. Rains, P. C. Macfarlane, G. W. Muckley and Mrs. M. E. Harlan are expected from "abroad."

Railroad rates will be published within a few days. Delegates notifying the local committee in advance will receive lodging and breakfast. Names should be sent at once to Charles Chasteen, Station A, Dallas Texas.

A Missionary Pentecost

A Pastor's Own Story of His Call for Missionary Volunteers and the Response He Received.

By H. O. Pritchard, Bethany (Lincoln), Neb.

I have been getting ready for the March Offering which we expect to take next Lord's Day. A week ago I preached on "Modern World Progress and the Church." I tried to show that God is laying the world at the very door of the church and challenging the church to come out of itself and take possession of the world, making of it the kingdom of God and of His Christ. Yesterday morning I preached on "The Call of the Macedonias." At the close of the sermon I quietly but earnestly gave an invitation for volunteers to answer the call of the Macedonias of the earth. And in answer to that invitation, thirty-three strong, noble young men and women walked from their places in the audience and took their stand in the pulpit, and said "we are willing to go, even unto the uttermost parts of the earth, if God wills it."

What a meeting it was! I have never been in any meeting, in my life, which displayed more of the presence and power of the Spirit of God. It was like another Pentecost. There was nothing of excitement, but with bowed heads and with deepest reverence they came, one after another. The spirit of consecration was wonderful. Many of the best students of Cotner University came (and all of them were either students or graduates of this worthy institution), some were juniors, some were seniors, and some were post-graduates. Mothers and fathers were trembling with self-surrender as their sons and daughters came—no one knew whose child would be next to come. Old people exclaimed that they wished they might roll back the years in order that they might go. Every eye of the great audience was dimmed with tears—the tears of spiritual joy. The influence of that hour upon this church, upon Cotner University, and for the Kingdom of God can not now be measured.

May I say that this occasion was not the result of one hour's worship, but rather was it the climax of the influence of years. Cotner has ever been characterized by her deep and genuine religious spirit. Many of those who came yesterday had previously decided to do so, and each one who came had been seriously considering the proposition for days and even months, in some cases. It was the legitimate result of the impress of a great school, having a consecrated faculty, and deeply spiritual Chancellor. Then again, the influence of Mrs. Royal J. Dye, the living link of this church, is inestimable. Several of those who came have been studying her "Bolenge." The former pastor of this church, Brother J. W. Hilton, is genuinely missionary, and under his ministry the church became a living link. It was a fusion and culmination of all these influences that brought to this church the great joy, untold blessing and spiritual uplift of yesterday.

There are many others to whom I have spoken who are on the border line of decision, to consecrate their lives to world-wide evangelism. And by the pleadings and leadings of the Spirit, we hope to have fifty student volunteers from this church before many months have passed. Reader, will you not pray that it may be so?

University Church, March 14, 1910.

J. W. Kilborn, Mt. Carmel, has been assisting G. W. Wise, DuQuoin, in a very successful meeting.

J. H. Gilliland, Bloomington, is in a meeting at Palmyra.

Andrew Scott, Sixth District evangelist, held a meeting at Bement, with thirty-three conversions and six additions otherwise.

A. Martin, Davenport, Iowa, held a meeting for the Kewanee church and he will probably locate there.

FROM "CLANG" TO "CHIME."

A pleasant recreation for spare moments is to change words from one to another by altering one letter at a time. If you have never tried it you will be surprised to see how interesting and, often, how difficult this is. Making "clang" into "chime" is not easy by any means; but more wonderful still is the change effected by transforming the "clang" of steel into the sweet "chime" of bells.

For almost as many years as bells have been made they consisted of an alloy of tin and copper, and this combination has become known as "bell metal." The advancing cost of these metals to a point where they are now spoken of as "semi-precious" meant increased prices until bells, except for rich churches, were almost out of the question.

Right when such a condition seemed certain, American ingenuity made a discovery—that steel, made into an alloy with certain metals, formed a perfect "bell metal." How this combination of metals is made is a trade secret; but the joyous fact is sufficient that church bells of unexpected tone may now be had at reasonable cost. These bells are now made in peals and singles, and are adapted to all uses. Perhaps the day will come when we will be using steel in the same proportions for church bells as we are now making it into cannons.

The story of this new bell metal discovery is told in a beautiful book issued by the Cincinnati Bell Foundry Co., manufacturers of the historic Blymyer church bells, Cincinnati, O. A request will bring you a copy.

In order to meet the great demand for Sample Copies of the Bethany Graded Lessons the publishers have decided to send out Returnable samples of the complete line of supplies—Beginners', Primary and Junior—(excepting the large Beginners' pictures). Accompanying the samples a bill will be sent for $1.09, the regular price of the set. The recipient may do one of three things: (1) He may return the samples uninjured after examination. (2) He may remit $1.09 and keep the samples. Or (3) he may return the bill with his Sunday school's order for supplies and the publishers will mark it "paid." In writing for sample copies please say "Returnable."

The Lexington Church, J. P. Givens, is to have a new parsonage.

J. D. Williams, third district evangelist, held meetings at Plymouth, Adrian, Camden and Oak Grove.

F. L. Maltman, Saybrook, will serve the church at Rushville.

L. D. Crandall, Niantic, has resigned and he is now open for engagement.

M. W. Yocum, Taylorville, proposes to deliver a choice series of four sermons to churches within reach of him. Kindly write him about them.

Joel T. Brown, evangelist, would like to work for two or more churches through the summer months. Address him at Perry, Ill.

Jesse H. Story recently closed a meeting at Mulberry Grove with about seventy additions to the church.

Central Illinois Campaign—Laymen's Missionary Movement

Arrangements are actively under way for the big Central Illinois Convention of the Laymen's Missionary Movement to be held in Peoria, Ill., April 7 to 9. It is probable that 2,000 men, representing practically all the Protestant churches in the central counties of Illinois, will be in attendance at the convention, which is one of the series of seventy-five being held throughout the United States as a part of the National Campaign of the Movement.

I. J. Spencer in Des Moines

Just recently the University Place Church of Christ, Des Moines, Iowa, conducted a three weeks' meeting in which the writer assisted the minister, C. S. Medbury. Inasmuch as 1,000 persons had been added to the membership within the fourteen months just preceding our meeting it seemed best not to preach the usual revival sermons but to set forth in a series of discourses the simple, vital and confirmatory doctrine essential to beginners in the Christian life, fulfilling the latter part of the commission by teaching them to observe all things commanded and authorized of Christ. Hence the sermons were nearly all on such themes as: The One Authority; The One Authorized Name; The One Great Spirit; Two Phases of the One Faith; The One Authorized Confession of Faith; The One Baptism In Its Fourfold Aspect; The Essential Regeneration and Its Essential Instrument; The Great Universal Commission; The Birthday of the Kingdom and The New Covenant; The One Scriptural Church; Model Conversions; The One Thing Essential; The One Hope of Heaven; The One Personal Basis of Christian Union; What the Disciples of Christ Should Teach, and Christ is All and in All. A goodly number were added and hundreds gave testimony that they had received a new and clearer vision of Christ and His gospel and had determined with new purpose of heart to live for His glory and service. The singing, under the direction of Dean Cowper and Prof. McRae was exceptionally inspirational and edifying. The minister, Brother Medbury, is a man full of the Holy Spirit, and greatly beloved. The church is well-organized, the Bible school is growing, the church is full of Christian inspiration and good hope. It was a joy to assist in the meetings and to have daily fellowship with the devoted disciples of our Lord who have made famous the city of Des Moines. All the congregations had fellowship in the meeting. Brother Finis Idleman is now in a meeting in the Central Church, ably assisted by Brother Peter Ainslie of Baltimore.

The Centennial Testimonial to W. R. Warren

As custodian of the Centennial Testimonial Purse for W. R. Warren, I wish to make the following report:

Of more than $650 pledged, $516.60 was paid into my hand. This I have paid over to Mr. Warren.

I feel this to be but a slight token of the real large esteem and gratitude our brethren feel for him.

He was insistent that I refund this money to the several donors, when it became evident that his new relation to The Christian Evangelist would require his giving up the trip with the Moninger Tour. I refused flatly to do this, for the following reasons: First of all, the money was given without any "strings" to it. It was a testimonial of our love for him and of our appreciation of his sacrificial and efficient services.

I incidentally mentioned that he might go with us on the Moninger Tour and take the rest I knew he sorely needed; but that was mere selfishness on my part; for I wanted him with me.

In the second place no one has asked that his money be refunded, and I do not believe anyone has thought of such a thing.

Third, to refund it would be impossible. Many gave their money and not their names. Others gave their names with the money, but gave no postoffice address; and others definitely stated when they sent the money that it was a straight gift and was to be turned over to Mr. Warren to be used ad libitum.

I did not care to make any statement at all to this point, and was perfectly willing to personally assume all responsibility for the course I pursued in the matter; but his extreme modesty has led him to underestimate the value of the services he rendered us, and it was this same modesty that caused him to hesitate when I turned the money over to him.

No one could be more keenly appreciative of this token of our esteem than is he. I wish it were an even $1,000.

The part I have had in this gift has been a source of sweetest pleasure to me; and on Mr. Warren's behalf and on my own, I thank you for your part. WALLACE THARP.

The Bethany Graded Sunday-School Lessons

Will the new Graded lessons make their way into the Sunday-schools and become the standard lessons of the Sunday-schools of the world as the Uniform lessons have done? There are many signs indicating that this is precisely what will happen.

1. All the authorities in religious pedagogy have been a long time agreed that it is better to suit the lesson to the learner than to compel the learner to adapt himself to the lesson, regardless of his stage of mental development.

2. The International Committee which has for thirty-five years selected the Uniform lessons has now begun the issue of an additional series called the International Graded Course, consisting, not of one Scripture lesson for the entire school, but of a separate series of lessons for each year or grade, chosen with direct reference to the age and ability of the pupils.

3. These lessons are being adopted by the best schools of all denominations. The Presbyterians report that about two thousand of their schools adopted the International Graded courses for children under twelve years, last quarter. This is phenomenal. The Methodists and Congregationalists had to go to press the second and third time to supply the unexpected demand for the graded lessons.

The New Christian Century Co. is supplying these lessons to the Disciples' schools. There is no single achievement in which the publishers of this paper take greater satisfaction than in connecting our schools with this most significant Sunday-school advance of the last fifty years.

The editors of The Christian Century, Mr. Morrison and Professor Willett, both regard the Graded principle as essential to the highest efficiency in religious instruction, and both believe that the Bethany Series is the truest, simplest and most artistic set of supplies for the elementary grades that has ever been put out.

Our pleasure in offering the Bethany Graded Lessons to the brotherhood is enhanced by the fact that our orders for supplies for the winter quarter have been much beyond our expectations. Many other schools have assured us of their purpose to adopt The Bethany Lessons at once. This series may be begun at any time. See full description on another page.

Wisconsin

During the two months that I have been corresponding secretary of our work in Wisconsin I have come in personal contact with most of our churches and ministers. I find most of our work possessing great promise. I have not visited a field which did not appear to me to be ripe for a harvest. What a wonderful opportunity we have in this great state! But it will require men and money.

I do not hesitate to say that our plea would receive hearty response in scores of places in Wisconsin, and that in a short time it would be given adequate support. The pure, simple gospel of Jesus Christ is surely needed. People are becoming tired of mere form and speculation; they want the life and love of Jesus Christ. I never have seen more unrest, more uncertainty in religious circles. We are under obligation to do our part in satisfying the intense longings of these souls which are virtually adrift on the sea of doubt. There is surely a new era dawning for our work in this long neglected section of our country.

On March 27 we begin a meeting at Chippewa Falls, hoping to locate a capable man at the end of the meeting, and to make the work self-supporting.

The Road To Yesterday

Has Church Federation Lost an Erstwhile Leader?

The progress of the Disciples of Christ toward the realization of Christian unity has been so steady and purposeful in recent years that any tendency toward the backward way surprises and disquiets those who are taking seriously our great enterprise. For the most part the voices that have called us to the completion of our historic work have been inspiring and consistent in their summons. We know that there are utterances of another sort within our ranks, and these not a few. But with the passing of time such words become less significant as we learn our duty and press forward to its fulfilment.

It is for this reason that any faltering on the part of those who have led in this high adventure brings surprise and regret to the rest of us. We had supposed that the Christian Evangelist, our amiable and usually progressive neighbor at St. Louis was beyond the likelihood of looking back with regretful eyes upon the way to Egypt. But a recent utterance makes us wonder if with the change of the journal from a private to a brotherhood organ it has changed its program of Christian unity; or if the curious and inconsistent message of two weeks since, is to be accounted for by the fact that the senior editor is in the south on a journey of rest and recuperation.

In an editorial under the heading, "What he should do," there is an astonishing departure from the accustomed message of Dr. Garrison, though it is given in a tone which appears to assume even more than his authority. An inquirer presents a situation that has arisen in a town of Oklahoma, and requests advice as to whether the Disciples in the circumstances ought to enter the place and organize a church. The circumstances as stated in the editorial are somewhat as follows:

An evangelist is conducting a meeting in a town where the Disciples have no church. He has been induced to undertake the effort by the fact that two individuals, not connected with any church, attended a meeting of his in a near-by place, and urged him to come to their town for a similar effort. There were a few Disciples in the place, some of whom had united with other churches, and some were still unattached. The ministers of the place, learning of the proposed meeting, canvassed the town against the proposal to start a new church, and it was unanimously decided by the leaders of the churches already working there that the Disciples ought not to make such an effort.

In this situation the evangelist writes to ask advice of the Christian Evangelist, but the fact that the advice is asked after the meeting has been begun leads one to wonder whether the evangelist really wishes advice or commendation for the course on which he has already entered.

In this emergency the Christian Evangelist editorially urges the inquirer to "go ahead and preach the old gospel for which the people are hungering." He is to gather in the members who are there, to baptize those who are willing to accept the message, and not to mind the protest of the other Christian people in the place, because without reference to any plans of federation, comity or union, the Disciples have the perfect right to go in and win.

We have no doubt that such advice from the Christian Evangelist to the preacher who wrote the letter met his hearty approval, and encouraged him in his campaign. But we are wondering what will be the impression it makes upon the minds of that large constituency which the Christian Evangelist has for years been training to a more generous appreciation of our Christian faith, and to some recognition of the claims of brotherhood upon us.

We can conceive of circumstances which would have made it not only permissible, but even urgent that the Disciples should enter the field thus described. If the place were unprovided with sufficient Christian agencies to afford opportunities for worship to a considerable part of its population, or if there had been a large group of Disciples in the place with the desire to organize a church, or if the churches of the town were so inactive that Christian interests were suffering in their hands, there might be excellent reason for our entrance into the field.

But not one of these conditions is named as the justification for the meeting already begun by the evangelist in question, or the unhappy advice offered by the Christian Evangelist. If these conditions were known to exist, then they should have been stated frankly. As the matter stands we have from a journal in whose judgment we have long trusted, and whose transformation into something like a brotherhood organ we have hailed with pleasure, a piece of counsel which is a distinct repudiation of the very cause of unity for which it has so long pleaded, to say nothing of that courtesy which is due from any Christian body to other followers of Christ.

What we wish to point out, however, is the fact that quite apart from all concern for the work which church federation is accomplishing in promoting the cause of Christian unity, there is a higher principle involved, one to which the Disciples of Christ should be most sensitive. That principle is the cause of Christianity itself, the desire to bring the kingdom of God to its true effectiveness in every community. In comparison with this ideal, questions of denominational prestige and success disappear.

There was a time when our brethren were largely persuaded that the interests of the kingdom of God in any community depended largely upon our representation in that locality. Indeed, one still hears such belated statements as that a given district or county has "not a single New Testament church in it," meaning of course, no church of the Disciples. But we are glad to believe that the number of our brethren holding such sectarian views diminishes rapidly. Such representation of New Testament Christianity as could be afforded by that type of exclusiveness would totally misrepresent both the New Testament and the ideals of our brotherhood. The men who are seeking for "the road to yesterday" are still to be found among us, but their influence wanes, and their message belongs to the past. Wherever we fail to interpret in its true sense the New Testament and its spirit, there we only intrude to hinder the triumph of righteousness.

According to the conditions described, the ministers of the churches already at work in the city referred to felt that there was no adequate reason for the organization of another church. It is very easy to attribute this attitude to alarm, narrowness, fear of the truth, or sectarian jealousy. But this is an interpretation which the Disciples cannot afford to put upon such a situation. What will be the effect of a campaign on our part in that place? Will it promote the cause of Christian unity? Will it even promote the cause of New Testament Christianity, beyond a certain insistence upon immersion, which in the minds of too many of our people is the very essence of "the old Jerusalem gospel?"

The crying sin of our generation is the planting of unnecessary churches in communities where there are already enough to supply Christian leadership and employment for the people. Especially is this true in face of the appalling need of the gospel in hundreds of unevangelized portions of America, to say nothing of the lands beyond. While whole sections of our larger cities and of the country rapidly filling with new populations are unfurnished with any sufficient agencies for worship and social service, it is a pathetic spectacle that a people pleading for the union of all Christians should force themselves in where there is no need of their presence, where their testimony will be divisive and not unifying, where their emphasis on New Testament truth will be overshadowed by their example of disregard of the New Testament spirit, and where the Christian forces of the place have already raised vigorous and persistent protest against their advent.

In the face of these facts it seems very clear to us that such advice as the Christian Evangelist gives to its inquirer is in the direction of those very antagonisms from which we are happily emerging into a larger work. No man of vision wants to take again "The road to yesterday."

One Thing Baptism Certainly is Not

The extent to which the fiction-making faculty can go under stress of argument in magnifying so simple and natural an ordinance as Christian baptism has had many illustrations in recent issues of Disciple newspapers.

The advocates of immersion are in danger of harming their cause by absurd overstatement. Indeed, it is a serious question whether the exaggeration of the importance of baptism by certain dogmatists is not the chief bar to a settlement of the controversy. Certainly so long as wild and unreal claims are made for immersion, there is no likelihood that we can so much as gain the ear of those who practice other forms.

The Christian Century believes, and has many times declared, that there is a reasonable, undogmatic, good-tempered plea that can be made for the practice of immersion only. Such a plea, if it were made by such a body of Christians as the Disciples of Christ, would command the thoughtful attention of the religious world and would, we believe, bring about uniformity of practice in this initiatory rite of the church.

In our own pages of late there have appeared a considerable number of statements on the baptism question. These contributions of our readers have expressed all manner of opinions. Here is the good brother who professes seriously to believe that none but immersed people are Christians. He writes of the qualifications for church membership, and concedes that we have no right to refuse church membership to any one who is a Christian. "I refuse church membership to one who has not been baptized [immersed], not because he has not been baptized, but because he has not become, and is not, a Christian." This course, he says, is consistent, and we quite agree with him, more consistent, as he intimates, than it is to deny fellowship in the church to any who are conceded to be Christ's disciples. But this conception of immersion-baptism as essential to salvation is bound to be treated by other Christian people with pity, if not contempt. Certainly whatever connection immersion has with salvation it is not an essential condition of salvation.

But there is a view of baptism more repugnant to enlightened Christian intelligence than even this. It is expressed in the statement that baptism is a sheer test of faith.

With not a few preachers of the immersion dogma this is a favorite way of putting it. Baptism, it is conceded, is an enigma. We can see no reason why one form rather than another should be insisted upon. But God arbitrarily insists upon immersion as a test of our faith and trust in Christ. This view was brought out with such brash frankness by a featured article in the Christian Standard, recently, that we can do no better than to copy the author's exact words:

> A man may think that he believes, but his faith may not be strong enough to stand the test to which it will constantly be put in the Christian life; so, by the simple act of Christian baptism, his faith is tested in the very beginning. Man says, "I believe." God says, "Well, we will see if you do: be baptized." Man may say that he believes, but that is in his own heart; and the world can not see it. Let him adequately express, embody, his faith before the world, let him illustrate his creed, by being baptized.

By certain preachers of this crass ethics the point is illustrated thus: If God had said, "Believe, repent and give a loaf of bread to that hungry child and you shall be saved," there would be no virtue in the bestowment of the loaf, because you would be able to see some reason in such an act. But when God says, "Believe, repent, and be baptized," there is virtue in baptism, because, not being able to see any meaning in it at all, or any reason for it, it is a sheer test of our submission to the will of God!

Most of our readers, no doubt, who have been through the baptism debates are familiar with this argument. It was common in the older days. The story of Naaman's final submission to the prophet's arbitrary command to wash in Jordan seven times, and that of King Saul's rebuke at the hands of Samuel for disobedience to the letter of his instructions, furnished the texts for many a sermon on exact obedience to God's un-understood command of immersion.

But in most enlightened communities the unethical character this mode of reasoning imputes to God has long since become apparent. That this sort of logic should, therefore, reappear in our time only shows to what lengths men will go who are obsessed with the baptismal dogma.

One of our readers in expressing his opinion on our page especially devoted to free discussion, gave this conception as the one that satisfied his soul. He said:

> Of course no one can see any vital or philosophical connection between water and salvation. Perhaps there is none. But might it not be that the Christ foresaw that it would be the best test of our faith and of our love that He could give. He saw how the "smart set" or worldly wise rejected John's baptism, and He knew that worldly pride and wisdom, being much the same in all ages, would reject His baptism. So He inserted it into His plan as a part of the sifting process. He knew that the man of simple faith and true love would ask but one question, "Did Christ command it?" If so, his faith and love would prompt him to gladly do it, whether he saw any sense in it or not. This may be one reason why Jesus chose baptism and placed it at the very threshold of His kingdom. Just as in the case of Naaman. The spirit of unquestioning obedience must be in the heart or there is no salvation. What a wise and gracious God will do with the "pious un-immersed" who really desire to do His will is another question. "The Judge of all the Earth" will do right. But the spirit of obedience must be in the heart, and it looks from the evidence in the case as though the command of Christ to be baptized was chosen to both test and to help perfect the spirit of obedience in our hearts.

It is with difficulty that we exercise due patience with this sort of teaching. To our mind just this is the one thing that baptism certainly is not.

Our God does not devise arbitrary tests of our faith. The faith he desires of us is so intimately and vitally connected with the real life we are living that it finds its true test in the concrete tasks of that life and nowhere else.

Obedience to an arbitrary command of God would have absolutely no significance for the life men really live. And perhaps the very fact that men have conceived of the tests of faith as consisting of certain specially devised ordinances to be submitted to, or dogmas to be subscribed to, or works of merit to be performed is the explanation of the wide chasm that has so long existed between religion and life.

A Nation Responsible for Missions

May and June of this year will witness two of the most significant and far-reaching missionary gatherings of modern times. The later month will bring together representatives of all the missionary societies of the Protestant world in Edinburgh, Scotland, to consider the strategic problems of missionary method and aim. This World Conference will be constituted of 1,100 delegates, of which number the Disciples of Christ are entitled to fourteen. The indications encourage the belief that a considerable company of American Disciples, besides those regularly appointed as delegates, will attend this meeting.

Nearer home, however, but hardly less important, is the Men's National Missionary Congress to be held in Chicago, May 3-6. This gathering, coming as the climax of the unprecedented campaign of missionary evangelism, which has been sweeping across our land since the beginning of February, will set a new mark for missionary enthusiasm and raise a new standard of missionary method.

In seventy cities in all parts of the nation the Laymen's Missionary Movement has been arousing the manhood of the churches. Business men, by whom missions were conceived as, perhaps, a proper enough sentiment for the women and children to foster, have come away from these mighty conventions with their hearts burning with a great new vision of their masculine responsibility to carry the gospel to the ends of the earth. They see the enterprise now as the essential task of Christian civilization. It is a man's job.

From all these cities representatives will come to Chicago for the National Congress in May. The great Auditorium has been secured for the sessions. It will seat 5,000 people, and the delegations will therefore be limited to that number. It will be a strictly delegate gathering. But each delegate may be self-appointed. By application to the Foreign Missionary Society of his church any man may register as a delegate until that church's quota is complete. The Disciples of Christ are allotted 135 delegates. Mr. S. J. Corey, Cincinnati, is allowed two weeks more in which to complete the registration of that many Disciple names. After that date if there are any of our seats not taken they will be assigned to the waiting list of other denominations.

Disciple men will not permit one seat in their section to be vacant. Men could afford to come from the farthest boundaries of the land to have a part in this great gathering. Its significance for the Disciples' plea for union is greater than any convention held in modern times. The question asked in these laymen's gatherings is not, What can Presbyterians do for the spread of the gospel? or, What can Methodists do? or, What can the Disciples do? But, What can America do? What is our national responsibility? What is America's share of this white man's privilege of carrying the gospel to the unevangelized? It is an unsectarian question. It assumes a common denominator of Christian consciousness underlying all our artificial differences. It assumes Christian union, and by assuming it, does more to promote it than a decade of doctrinal argument could accomplish. We shall give our readers a glimpse of the program as soon as it is issued. Meantime let our men prepare their hearts and adjust their business interests so they can attend.

The Liquor Traffic and Missions

A missionary in Africa says: "I would rather face heathenism in any other form than the liquor traffic in Africa." In the Century Magazine, April, 1905, an African prince writes: "I can prove from my own knowledge that all the wars that have been fought by my tribe since the advent of civilization have been brought on by rash action on the part of drinking men. If we have not advanced higher in the scale of civilization, neither had we (I speak again for my own people), until this fatal liquor was forced upon us, fallen so low as many. . . . If the present policy continues, we cannot fight as men should fight against the wrong. The poison is fast doing its deadly work, and in a few years there will be none of us left to resist the oppressors."

The vices of civilization destroy the primitive peoples. As we protect children against habits whose ruinous consequences they cannot forsee, so ought Christian nations to protect the child races from evils that so easily follow the contact of a superior race with an inferior. There is drunkenness among savage and barbarous peoples that have not learned the bad customs of civilized nations, but they have not the means of making intoxicating drinks in sufficient quantity and of sufficient strength to produce the results which are charged against the liquor traffic. It may be doubted whether any uncivilized tribe on the face of the earth can, unaided, save itself from destruction if it has control of natural resources which the liquor traffic can convert into gold.

Much of the misrepresentation of the work of missions can be traced to the liquor traffic. The missionary is teaching men to be sober, to find their enjoyment in the activities of a well balanced life. He is the foe of the liquor traffic. He warns men against the dangers of drink. He tells the governments of the world what the liquor traffic is doing for the weaker races. He insists that these races be protected and be granted the privilege of acquiring the virtues rather than the vices of civilized nations. The missionary, therefore, is interfering with the plans of the man who sells rum to savages and barbarians. The rum seller looks to his profits. He is not in the business of teaching religion and morals. His standard of judging is different from that of the missionary. His language is that of Demetrius to the craftsmen of Ephesus: "Sirs, ye know that by this business we have our wealth." He raises the cry against the missionary, as Demetrius did when Paul interfered with his business, and the crowd he gathers knows as much of the real issue as the mob in Ephesus knew of Paul's preaching. He is much concerned for the prosperity of his business. The missionary is interested in the welfare of the non-Christian peoples.

It is not by accident, therefore, that there is a feeling of hostility between those who manage the liquor traffic and those who are engaged in preaching the gospel to those that have never heard it. There is a conflict of ideals. Peace is impossible. The success of one side must come at the cost of the other. The only danger that threatens the church is that the ideals that are behind the liquor traffic will be too much respected by members of the church. Uninformed persons lend willing ears to slanders against the missionary. They listen with eagerness to the most absurd stories of what is happening on the foreign field. They do not stop to examine the reports with respect to their credibility. Evidently they are glad to believe the bad news. But what is to be said of their faith in Jesus if such evil reports are pleasing to their ears? Have they moral enthusiasm? Or have they the cynicism of the liquor traffic?

Enlightened Christians can dispose of the falsehoods uttered against their representatives. They do not become frightened if they discover that mistakes have been made by missionary societies and by missionaries. They know that mistakes characterize all human undertakings. They are willing to give a Christian teacher and preacher a chance to correct mistakes. The criticism of mission work that comes from men who live by the ruin of others is evidence to the intelligent disciple that the missionary is attending to the Master's business. The ministers in America are not popular with saloon keepers, and they ought not to be. The saloon keeper may be possessed of many good qualities, but he would not be human if he liked the men who fight his business. The effort to evangelize the home field and the foreign field must be combined with the struggle against the drink evil.

Chicago's Drink Bill

Chicago spends $64,000,000 per year for intoxicating drink. Halstead street is the longest single city thoroughfare in the world. It could be covered from end to end of its twenty-one miles with 64,000,000 dollar bills. Put in silver dollars the sum would stack up a pile 101 miles high. It would require two goodly freight trains to carry them at one time.

The "wets" reminded the voters that their "Industry (?)" was "worth" $150,000,000 per annum to the city. That means that an average of $341.00 goes from each family income in the city to support the drink traffic. Business men are learning that it means just that much taken from the channels of legitimate business and that the saloon is the worst enemy of legitimate business.

Replacing the License Money

The stock scare kept before Chicago citizens by the brewers has been that the city would become bankrupt without the $7,200,000 license money paid into the city treasury by the grog shops. Note that one dollar out of every nine spent for liquor goes into the city's treasury. The Mayor pleads the cause of the saloons in guise of a plea for the city's revenues. The Corporation Counsel joins him in the ignominy. Charles Merriam of the famous Merriam mission says his commission has shown how it could be saved by eliminating graft and waste. The tax list shows that the saloons pay a little over three dollars apiece in taxes each year. They also show that the breweries are assessed on less than half their value. Two of the big coal companies pay taxes on $25,000 and dividends on $4,475,000. The nine largest banks in the city have deposits amounting to $559,000,000, yet all the personal property in Chicago, including these nine banks and forty-three others, is but $548,333,265. If every dollar paid its share saloon revenue could be replaced many times over.

What Another Labor Journal Says

The "Teamster," official journal of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, joins the temperance hosts in a way that is indicated in the following excerpts:

"We believe liquor to be the greatest injury that can be imagined to our people and to all working people."

"A man may take a drink or two and continue to be a man, but if he can do without it he is a much better man and he is not so liable to meet with accidents during the hours of work."

"If you can see the way to cut out the beer, do so for your own sake, the sake of your family and the sake of your employer."

"The workingman cannot afford to spend even ten cents a week out of his wages that he may fatten the brewer or the saloonkeeper."

Liquor and Union Labor

Mr. Nathan A. Cole, the hired advocate of the brewery interests in the Chicago Local Option campaign, operates under the name of an association supposed to represent manufacutrers. It is nominally an association of those who manufacture saloon furniture, etc., but is of course really the brewers and distillers slinking to their business under a title whose respectability they expect to help them. Mr. Cole ordered tens of thousands of buttons with the flag and "liberty" printed on them and now it is found they were not union made. Yet he boasts of their loyalty to union labor. It is also a fact that every case and barrel of liquor handled in Chicago is handled by a non-union man. The 1400 brewery wagon drivers are not affiliated with the Chicago Federation of Labor. True, they have a union of their own but they are alone. They have no Federation recognition.

Alcohol and the Ability to Think

Interesting experiments have been made to discover the effects of alcohol on the ability to work—in other words, the effect of alcohol on muscular powers. One experiment made the measurements on twelve consecutive days at the same hour of the day, under identical circumstances. It showed a decreasing power where the alcohol was taken though the abilities were slightly increased at first. At the end of the twelve days the test with no food had much the better of that with alcohol, which showed decreasing powers the longer the experiment was continued. Another test was that of taking alcohol with food in the one case and the food alone in the other. The latter showed the larger powers in every case. The taking of a single glass of wine at the meal showed a loss of 8 per cent in muscular powers during the twelve days' period.

Alcohol and the Ability to Think

Like experiments have been made to test the effect of taking a dram on the mental processes. The test showed that when no alcohol was taken the ability to add numbers increased steadily through a twenty-seven days' test. From the beginning the tetotaler had the better of the man who took the dram while at the end of the time there was a difference of over 15 per cent in their abilities. It was proven that alcohol does not stimulate a person in intellectual activity but that moderate daily drinking reduces the powers of habitual mental association. The test in ability to write showed a loss of 8 per cent after eight days and of 27 per cent after thirteen days. Thus it was shown that the free association of ideas was more markedly affected than the simple habitual associations. The third experiment had to do with memorizing. Where no alcohol was taken the power to memorize increased steadily through the daily experience, while taking the alcohol even moderately showed a decreased power amounting to 6 per cent. It is ruinous to thinking.

Alcohol in the Laboratory

A statement signed by the medical experts who were delegates at the World's Alcoholic Congress in London last July said, "Exact laboratory research has demonstrated that alcohol is a protoplasmic poison, hence its use as a beverage is destructive and degenerating to the human organism. Its effect on the tissues and cells is depressing and narcotic."

Sir Frederick Treves, physician to King Edward, declares that "alcohol is an insidious poison and should be subject to the same restrictions as opium, morphine and strychnine."

Dr. S. S. Thorn, an army surgeon of wide surgical practice says "Beer drinkers are absolutely the most dangerous class of subjects that surgeons can operate upon."

Professor Kraeplin of Hiedelberg, Germany, made over 2,000 experiments, using instruments of greatest precision, in order to determine the exact effects of alcohol on the five senses. Here are the results summed up:

Sight.—Man with normal vision, who could read letters thirty feet away, after taking one ounce of alcohol or two and one-half ounces of whiskey will have to move ten feet nearer to see the letters.

Hearing.—When a watch could be heard tick at a distance of forty inches the drinker had to move ten inches nearer to hear it after taking the above amount.

Taste.—A bitter, salt, or acid taste that could be easily detected had to be increased from one-third to one-half after drinking the liquor.

Smell.—Disturbed the power likewise to discriminate between odors.

Touch.—More markedly diminished than the senses of taste or smell.

The great thing determined is that alcohol is a positive poison. As arsenic affects the stomach, mercury the salivation, strychnine the spinal chord, manganese the liver, and lead the muscles of the wrist, so alcohol affects the brain.

Temperance Notes

Judge Ben Lindsey points out how the so-called loyalty to party threatened his efforts and in many cases defeated them. So partizanship defeats all good measures after the party becomes of more moment than principle. The Anti-Saloon League occupies the strategic position by holding aloof from all parties but using all for the sake of its moral issue.

Abraham Lincoln said: The legalized liquor traffic, as carried on in the saloons and grogshops, is the tragedy of civilization. The saloon has proved itself to be the greater foe, the most blighting curse of our modern civilization."

The United Mine Workers of America overwhelmingly adopted an amendment to their constitution providing for the dismissal of any union officer or delegate who appears for duty in an intoxicated condition. It is said that the debate sounded like an Anti-Saloon League meeting.

Such railroad companies as the Sante Fe, Rock Island, Illinois Central, and the Erie, print magazines for their employes and solicit advertising to make them pay their own way. Of course the saloonists apply for large space and would pay good prices for it. But none of the magazines will accept a line of their stuff at any price.

Thomas Edison says: "Society will have to stop this whiskey business—it is like throwing sand on the bearings of an engine."

Jas. J. Hill says: "Do not employ drinking men. If men under you drink, tell them they must stop or make way for men who do not."

Theodore Roosevelt says: "No man should take a public office unless he is willing to obey his oath and enforce the law. If the poor man has a right to break the law on Sunday to get beer he has a right to break it every day to get bread.

Germany, the home of lager, is conspicuous for the loss in use of that amber fluid. There was a decrease of more than 60,000,000 gallons last year.

The Supreme Court of Ohio joins that of Mississippi in ruling that "near-beer" is prohibited by the temperance laws. "Near-Beer" is nothing but real beer of low alcoholic percentage and generally of very doubtful ingredients.

In Great Britain sixty-five out of every 100 committed to jail are sent there on account of being full of whiskey or some other intoxicant.

Outside of the postoffice receipts our Uncle Sam's income in 1909 was $603,589,490. Of this total $246,109,554 came from internal revenue licenses. Thus 40 percent of the U. S. expense account is met by a tax on men's appetites. It is in the name of law enforcement to be sure but that which was first enacted for the sake of law enforcement has through that very power become a law defier.

It looks as if both houses in the Massachusetts' legislature would be favorable to the Anti-Saloon League's program.

Montana has the Initiative and the Anti-Saloon League will try to get laws through the use of it. Missouri's petition has been filed. The quickest way to temperance legislation and all other good laws is through the Initiative and Referendum.

Wm. Jennings Bryan will return to Nebraska from his South American trip to ask the democratic party in that state to espouse local option with the county as the unit. He is also considering speaking in every county in the state on behalf of county option. He argues that the local option principle i. e., the right of the majority to rule on the saloon question is fundamental democracy.

The True Mission of the Church

The business of the church is not to pity men. The business of the church is not to rescue them from their suffering by the mere means of material relief, or even by the means of spiritual reassurance. The church cannot afford to pity men, because it knows that men, if they would take it, have the richest and completest inheritance that is possible to conceive, and that rather than being deserving of pity, they are to be challenged to assert in themselves those things which will make them independent of pity. No man who has recovered the integrity of his soul is any longer the object of pity, and it is to enable him to recover that lost integrity that the Christian church is organized. To my thinking, the Christian church stands at the center not only of philanthropy, but at the center of education, at the center of science, at the center of philosophy, at the center of politics; in short, at the center of sentient and thinking life. And the business of the Christian church, of the Christian minister, is to show the spiritual relations of men to the greater world processes, whether they be physical or spiritual. It is nothing less than to show the plan of life and men's relation to the plan of life.—President Woodrow Wilson.

The Mirror of Life

From rustic bridge o'er the woodland pool
I leaned and I saw the drifting leaves—
Swept by the current's wandering flow,
Blown by a breeze from the skirting trees;
And I said, "So shallow the little pond
That the brook must dry in the wood beyond."

The child looked down from the arching span,
And rapt with peace was her dreamy face;
She said, "I can see where fairies live
Away under there in the water space,
Where the trees grow down and their leaves wave high
The pool is as deep as the far-off sky."

The High-Priestess of the New Hinduism

Marvelous Leadership of Annie Besant in India

By Austen K. de Blois

SHE IS THE most wonderful person in the world! Her intellect her genius—they are sublime. She understands perfectly our language, our religion. She knows India and she loves the people of India."

The occasion on which these words were uttered I shall not soon forget. An educated Hindu gentleman, of the Brahmin caste, whom I had met during my stay in Calcutta, was speaking to me of the faith of his fathers. He was a man gracious in spirit, cultured, earnest and eloquent even in ordinary conversation.

As he spoke the words I have just quoted, he leaned forward, his eyes flashing, his whole face illumined. I was astounded. For this young Hindu was eulogizing, in an eager and almost impassioned manner, a foreigner, and a woman! When you have thoughtfully considered the conservatism and seclusiveness of the East, and the utterly contemptuous attitude of Hinduism toward womanhood, the reason of my surprise will be apparent.

The Foremost Woman of India.

I went through India with a question-mark on my tongue. It is not an exaggeration to say that no other impression or fact combined had so powerful an effect on my mind as this startling truth, that the influence of a foreign woman, Mrs. Annie Besant, high-priestess of modern Hinduism, has done more to retard the work of the missionary, and has achieved far greater results in the rehabilitation of primitive Hinduism, than any other influence.

The career of this woman is without a parallel in the history of religious movements, in India or elsewhere. This foreign woman has won the hearts of multitudes of educated Hindus. She has gained the enmity of many priests. She has done a greater work, in the reënforcement of the original principles of Hindu faith than all the leaders of that faith have been able to accomplish.

Mrs. Annie Besant is a famous woman. She is, I suppose, an intellectual genius. She is certainly a diplomatist, a born leader and a unique personality. Like George Eliot, she was the daughter of an English clergyman, but early wandered from her father's faith. She became a co-laborer with Charles Bradlaugh in the propaganda of anarchy and free love. After various experiences, this strange and terrible woman went to India. The life of that mystic land captivated and enthralled her. She became and still remains a Hindu. She has reëstablished Hinduism. She has become the leader of a great reactionary movement. She has won the confidence of rajahs and maharajahs, and they have poured out their wealth to aid her ambitious projects. She holds the hearts of the Hindus of culture and training.

"The Educated Hindu" in Plain Prose.

There has been much inexact statement with regard to the educated Hindus. We have heard of them as exceptionally alert and quick-witted, intellectually brilliant, keen, profound. We have been told that these men have largely broken with the Hindu faith, and have become skeptics and materialists; or have drifted into agnosticism through study of the works of Huxley and Herbert Spencer.

As a matter of fact, however, the Hindus are not especially keen or profound. In the matriculation examinations, in connection with the great Indian universities, 50 per cent of the candidates fail; at the end of two years of university work about two-thirds of the remainder fail.

The successful students, who graduate at the universities, and pass on to places of civic and professional influence, are for the most part men of average ability. The "multitudes of peculiarly brilliant and able young Hindus who are streaming forth, year by year from the doors of the great universities," and of whom lecturers and book-writers have told us, simply do not exist. It is not pleasant to abandon the illusion which has stimulated our imagination; but men who have been for many years in practical contact with large numbers of the educated classes have assured me that the exceptionally able or exceptionally brilliant man is rather rarer in India than elsewhere.

It is a mistake also to suppose that any large proportion of the educated Hindus are definitely denying the faith of their fathers. The years between 1830 and 1880 have been styled, "the half-century of the illumination." It was a period of intellectual stress and change throughout India. It was the period of reform and revolt. The reform movements integrated themselves in the Bramo Somaj and other societies, some of which approached Christianity in the purity of their ethical teaching and in the lofty ideals which governed their religious life.

The radical spirit expressed itself in a bitter revolt against Hinduism, and carried many of the most advanced thinkers into skepticism on the one hand, or excess and profligacy on the other. Agnosticism was popular for a time; but it was hardly more than a fad, and its influence has passed away.

CENTRAL HINDU COLLEGE, BENARES.

BATHERS AT FESTIVAL AT DELHI.

"The New Hinduism."

During the last thirty years a crusade, strikingly different from the former movement of revolt, has been growing and spreading. It is a reconstructive movement. It is not revolt, nor even reform, but reaction. It has won the loyal support of the great majority of educated Hindus, the same class of men that formerly led in the struggle to unbind the fetters of the ancient faith.

At the beginning of this new period in the development of religious thought the attention of the leaders was focussed upon the sacred writings. The beauty and strength of these were emphasized. An apologetic type of literature appeared, glorifying this heritage, and defending Hinduism from the criticisms of Christian teachers and missionaries.

The propaganda grew in power and productiveness. Many lecturers, monks and teachers entered upon an itinerant ministry. They went from town to town throughout India. They spoke in halls, in temple-courts and on the streets. They sought to popularize the study of the sacred books. They preached, taught, lectured, wrote, and conducted "campaigns of education." The people responded, and waves of enthusiastic response swept the country.

Into the beginnings of this vigorous forward—or backward—movement, Mrs. Besant injected her resourceful personality. It may be confidently affirmed that the vast majority of present-day teachers and leaders are members of the great central party, of which Mrs.

Mrs. Annie Besant, Wearing High Masonic Regalia.

Besant is the moving spirit. This party seeks to defend the entire heritage of Hindu faith and demands a minimum of reform. It is safe to say that if Mrs. Besant had attempted a reform movement her efforts would have been hailed with derision and utterly repudiated. Having announced herself as a Hindu of the Hindus she is listened to breathlessly, and followed ardently.

This alien priestess—or prophetess—seeks through the agency of her well-organized party, three or four distinct ends. In the first place Christianity is seeking the downfall of Hinduism; therefore Hinduism must be defended and its superiority to the Christian faith must be clearly proved. In the second place, by every possible means the lethargic Hindu mind must be awakened to the glories of its faith and made active in the propagation of its principles. In the third place, certain reforms are necessary in order that the old faith may emerge into new purity and a victorious strength.

The Use of the Printing Press.

The question of method is of prime importance and always interesting. The methods of "the New Hinduism" are few, practical and easily stated. They are lectures, advertising and instruction. The advertising takes the form of leaflets, pamphlets and books, setting forth the exalted merits of Hinduism. Cheap editions of the more popular of the sacred books, manuals of doctrine and ethics, and innumerable controversial works, written in answer to missionary criticism, are the "stock in trade." The chief claim of all this advertising material, which is circulated in vast quantities throughout India, is that Hinduism is as good as Christianity, as consistent in its theology, as pure and lofty in its ethics, as humane and practical in its social arrangements. Hinduism, it is constantly said, is as fit to be a universal religion as Christianity. This assertion sounds preposterous, almost ridiculous, for Hinduism is emphatically and essentially a local and ethnic faith; yet missionaries have actually been sent in recent years to other lands to advocate its principles and win converts to its ranks.

The Power of Public Speech.

Lecturers abound. Many university graduates find themselves without an occupation. The few professions they might enter are overcrowded. For other lines of work, where there is opportunity, they have no inclination, or their pride interferes. Talking is easy, travel is pleasant, lecturing is dignified, so many well-educated Brahmins become itinerant lecturers. The lectures like the literature, are expositions of the text which is one of the central principles of the propaganda: Hinduism is older than Christianity, greater than Christianity, better than Christianity.

Mrs. Besant accepts Hinduism in its entirety. The sacred books are her law and gospel. She shows her shrewdness in her solution of difficult questions. Instead of clumsily eliminating the immoral and obscene passages in the sacred books she explains them on the ground of allegory. Thus by a single clever stroke she banishes the uncleanness and introduces the highest moral and spiritual truths, for, as has been said, "by means of allegory anything can be made to mean anything." So the noblest ideas of the Christian religion are found hidden in the grossest stories.

To the objection that the acceptance of all Hindu teaching would involve the free use of magic, which admittedly can no longer be performed, Mrs. Besant makes answer that if the proper pronunciation and enunciation of the magic phrases could be regained the same magical effects would follow as of yore. She hints that the depravity and lack of devotion of many of the modern priests are responsible for the loss here. Let the priests recover their fervor and signs and wonders will follow their incantations. As may be supposed the priests are not flattered by this reference. But there is no love lost, anyway, between Mrs. Besant and the priests. They resent and resist her interpolation in their affairs.

Educational Agencies.

The adoption of modern educational methods, and the establishment and use of educational institutions as aids in her work, are noteworthy features of Mrs. Besant's leadership. She founded the Central Hindu College at Benares. This college has already a far-reaching influence. Its faculty consists of well-equipped and scholarly men, some of them Indians, some foreigners, nearly all graduates of the English universities and specialists in their departments. Most of the teachers from abroad have accepted Hinduism, though some have not. All the aids of the most recent culture and research, all modern scientific appliances, are provided. The professors are allowed perfect freedom in their class-room work.

Mrs. Besant has a scheme for the establishment of similar colleges in various parts of India. She has a persuasive way with her, as the princely rajahs can testify, for she has secured from them scores of lakhs of rupees for her great undertakings, and especially for her educational work. Now a rupee is about 32 cents, and a lakh is 100,000; so a lakh or rupees is $32,000.

I have said that the new Hinduism is reaction rather than reform; yet it has a few elements of reform. Mrs. Besant advocates the raising of the age of marriage amongst Hindu women. She also favors the elimination of many of the sub-castes, and seeks to abolish anything definitely immoral in practice, such as temple-prostitution. She believes in female education and has encouraged the teaching of the women in the zenanas.

She asserts the lofty character of Christ as a reformer, but rejects and antagonizes Christianity as a system. Everywhere in India her followers work against the missionaries. Much damage has been done. The practical working of the Christian missions has been hindered. The half-awakened minds of a multitude of educated Hindus have been steeled against Christianity.

One of the leading educationists of India told me of an address he had heard Mrs. Besant deliver in the town of Cutack. Several missionaries were present. Toward the close of her lecture she turned to the Brahmin gentlemen, the prominent men of the city, who were seated on the platform. In tones vibrating with intense earnestness she besought them not to send their children to mission-schools, and urged them to found Hindu schools of high grade to counteract the harmful and proselyting tendencies of the Christian institutions.

Theosophy and Hinduism.

Mrs. Besant is not only the acknowledged leader of the new Hinduism. She is also the president of the Theosophical Association. She regards theosophy and Hinduism as virtually the same. She came from infidelity to Hinduism through theosophy. Theosophy is the philosophical system which "fits in with" Hinduism, the religious and social system. It starts with the theory of being and affords a philosophical justification for Hinduism.

This resourceful English lady has had much more trouble with her philosophy than with her religion. There have been factions and divisions. The "old line theosophists," which she represents, have had many hostile encounters with the members of the new school of advanced thinking. Mrs. Besant and her forces won the day; she was elected world-president of the society, as successor to the late Col. Henry S. Olcott, formerly of New York; and she will hold office until 1914 at least, by the terms of her election.

The modest claims of theosophy may be gathered from the following extract from Mrs. Besant's letter of acceptance of her high office: "The society asserts itself as the nucleus of universal brotherhood. . . . It is its function to proclaim and spread abroad theosophy, the divine wisdom, the Brahma Vidya, the gnosis, the hermetic science—the one supreme fact, the truth of all truths, the light of all lights."

A Woman's Influence.

To a foreign woman, with a checkered and dramatic career behind her, has been committed the leadership of a religio-social system, to which 200,000,000 adherents are attached. She is the patron saint of the New Hinduism and the guiding genius of the theosophical society. She is a subtle and astounding personality.

It is not without reason that one of the keenest students of Indian affairs said to me that "Mrs. Besant, in her strenuous propaganda, has done more to check and to injure the cause of Christian missions in India during the past few years, than has been achieved by all other forces and agencies combined."

Chicago's Municipal Playgrounds

The People's Own Centers of Social and Athletic Life

By Orvis F. Jordan

Chicago leads the world in a number of social remedies, and in no new enterprise has she distinguished herself more than in the development of the playground idea. It has been only in the past ten years that the idea has been taken seriously, but in that time there has been spent on the south side alone over ten millions of dollars and a million a year will be required for maintenance. The west side and the north side are beginning to develop play centers, and when the entire city is covered with these breathing spots, as it will be in a few years, we shall have one of the most splendid pieces of work ever done by a municipality for the uplift of the rank and file of her population.

The playground in its incipiency was simply a place where children came together to play. Before this there had been no place but the street. The boys had been arrested for playing ball on the streets or rudely driven away, only to find less legitimate amusement in other ways. Once they got themselves pursued by the police, but now find the same nerve thrill in races and games of tag. Formerly the boys had flipped street cars to find some relief from monotony. Now they fly around on the flying rings and have lost in large measure their interest in the old sport. Once the boys smashed windows when they were not allowed to play ball in the streets. Now baseball on the playground diamond takes the place of this anti-social amusement. It has been the testimony of the policemen in every district where the playgrounds have been established that the juvenile delinquency has greatly decreased. The policemen who now patrol the playgrounds have a sinecure and have their chief function in keeping objectionable adults out rather than in restraining the youngsters. They are fathers to the little children and this new generation of children will not grow up with the seeds of anarchy in their hearts, but with a mighty well of patriotism lying deep within.

CHILDREN AT PLAYGROUND NEAR CHICAGO AVENUE.

Salutory Effect on Health.

The effect of these open-air spaces with their out-door amusements upon the health of the district is also one worthy of note. Tuberculosis is to be found in certain plague spots of the city that are crowded and where the houses are bad. An alarming number of school children have been afflicted with it. The playground is shown by statistics to have a real relation to the health of the children as we might expect. The systematic exercise, the wholesome sports, the open air, the more normal life of childhood all tend to react greatly upon the health and vigor of the coming generation. It has been said in the past that the city would die in four generations if not recruited by the fresh blood of the country. Playgrounds may change all that for the better.

Nor must we fail to realize the function of the playgrounds in the education of a child. We are understanding that play is the natural method in education. The young among the animals all play. Their play is educative. All play is either anticipatory or reminiscent. The kitten plays with the ball and pounces upon it in anticipation of the time when it shall catch mice. All through the natural world we see this process going on and observe that education instead of being a terror to the young animal is its chief delight. This point of view has been utilized in human education by such leaders as Froebel, Pestalozzi and others. This being true, the playground becomes almost a necessary adjunct to the public school. It ceases to be the remedy given the poor but becomes as much an educational force for the whole community as is the public school. Through its games and sports, when intelligently directed, some of the very best lessons of life may be learned.

Palmer Park in Pullman.

We turn, however, from a survey of the significance of the playground movement as a whole to a study of a single playground at work. We have selected Palmer Park for a number of reasons. First of all, it is one of the newer playgrounds, and the evolution of things is more easily traced here. Then, again, we were acquainted with Mr. A. T. Campbell, the newly appointed field director, and could learn from him not only the surface things but an interpretation of the ideals that guide the operations.

After having listened to a stereopticon lecture by Mr. Campbell and having had some conversation with him in reference to the work of the park, we went down to Pullman to see for ourselves the equipment and the work.

Palmer Park lies west of the Illinois Central tracks and within a few minutes' walk of the celebrated Pullman works. Everything here once belonged to the Pullman company. The houses, the stores, and even the building in which the government post office did its work, were Pullman property. The great company was compelled to disgorge, however, and now there is a considerable portion of the property that is owned by the citizens. As we walked over to the Palmer Park, we noted that it was surrounded by numerous churches. To the north was a large vacant tract of ground upon which we were told that the Pullman company, by the will of the late founder, proposed to erect a school for the trades which would cover the forty-acre tract.

An Institution for the Whole Community.

The Park itself is centrally located. It is young yet and the trees are not grown up. It is laid out, however, in a way to make it a beautiful spot. We examined the buildings and found them constructed to last, though not built of expensive material. The central building was a large auditorium which would seat a thousand people. On either side were the indoor gymnasiums, one for the women and the other for the men. These were well provided with equipment, shower baths being attached. Near these on either side were outdoor gymnasiums and to one side was the children's playground with the swings, toboggan and other things that delight the child. It was interesting to us to note that in this new playground the thing which gave the movement its name was almost a side issue. This was no children's affair but an affair for the whole community. The little playground for the children was quite eclipsed by the larger enterprise that would make Palmer Park the binding tie in Pullman democracy. Stretching to the south was the large athletic park. There are several baseball diamonds and an abundance of tennis courts. As we turned around again we saw a large swimming pool out of doors and farther away was a wading pool large enough for hundreds of little tots to get in at once. It was constructed of cement and was having its spring cleaning preliminary to the busy season that awaits it.

The Staff of Workers.

We noticed quite a number of people around and began to make inquiry which of them were employes. We found to our surprise a large staff of workers about the grounds. Besides Mr. Campbell, there are two women instructors who help in the gymnasium work. There are also two men instructors who are doing a similar work. On each side of the building there are two attendants who keep the place cleaned up and a perfect model of neatness. There are two police officers who patrol the grounds from noon until midnight. It is true their duties seem light, but they are by their presence able to prevent the development of any rowdyism and keep away characters who might not use the privileges of the grounds according to their original intent. There is a building foreman and two janitors. We undertook to learn what this single plant was costing the city of Chicago but got no accurate statistics. We were assured by the employes, however, that they believed that this plant was expending a hundred thousand dollars a year. This is either a wonderful thing or it is a colossal folly, we meditated.

We then began to inquire more of the activities of the place. We found that there were various nationalities around the playgrounds and that these appreciated different features of the work. The Polish people hold aloof from other races and it is hard to get them interested in games or in dramatic performances. They do love the baths, however, and we found a number of them taking advantage of the showers. They flock to the swimming pool in the summer. The Swedes and the Hollanders are of a more sociable nature and they take part in the various social functions about the playgrounds with great interest.

Antidote for Vicious Dance Halls.

We found that the playground had a well-developed camera club with eighteen members. Some flashlights taken in the building the night before were shown to us. The work was good. We were shown the club room that is being fitted up. Lockers are being provided for the members and the room will have all the conveniences for the photographic processes.

When the playground was first opened the young people of the neighborhood were going to cheap dance halls to find their amusements. Mayor Dunne once expressed the conviction that of all the forces of evil in the city the dance hall is the worst. Perhaps church folks will not all agree with the playground remedy. It is to have dances but under different surroundings. The playground attitude is that the dance itself is not wrong but it has been the associations of the dance that have wrought the harm. We shall watch the results of this experiment with interest. There are now over sixty couples that come to the playground hall once a week for a dance. They are made to go home at a reasonable hour. It need not be said that liquor is barred from these dances.

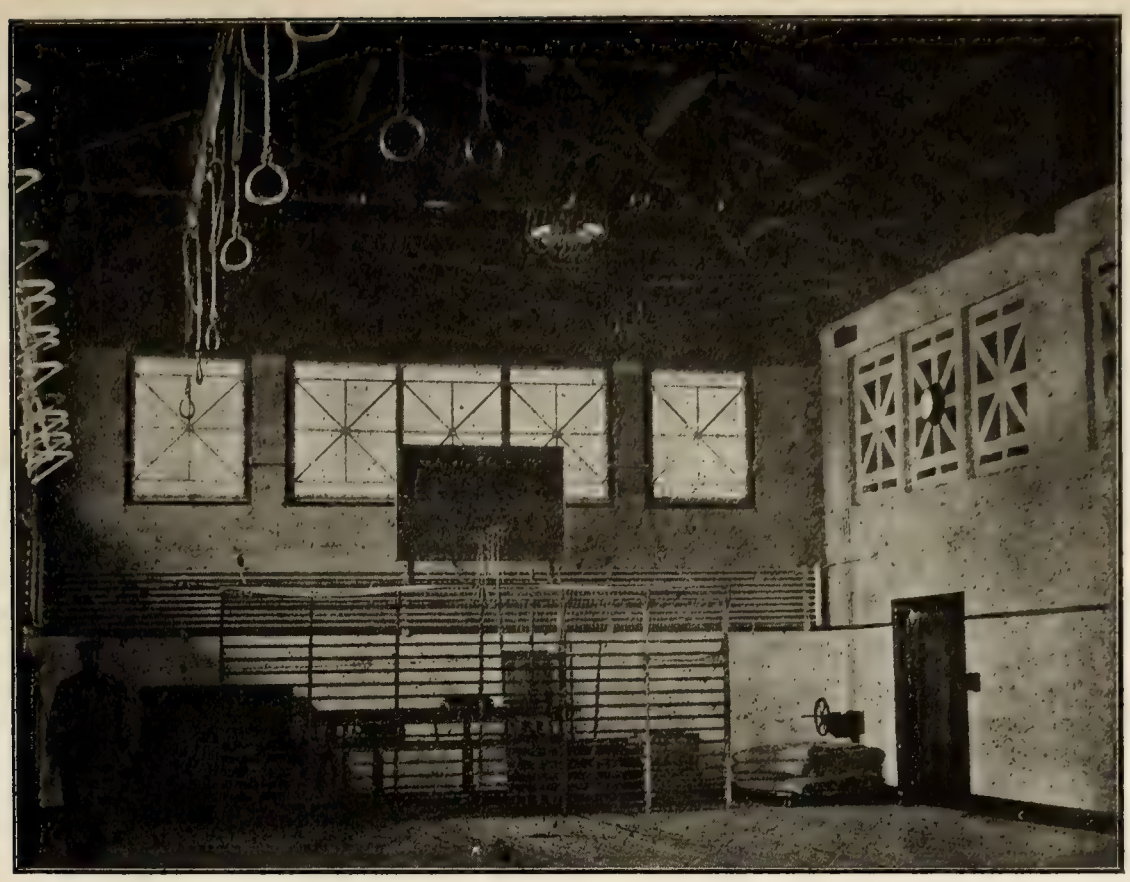
Utilized by a Variety of Interest.

The boys are given interest in the grounds by the military drill. An officer of the regular army takes a large company of boys through all the maneuvers. They are much engrossed in this work and there has been no difficulty in keeping the boys off the street with this device.

There are various neighborhood clubs that take advantage of the hospitality of the playgrounds for their meetings. The price of hall rent has been prohibitive to many voluntary associations that perhaps would have formed in our city life, but the playgrounds meet the need by providing a meeting place free of charge.

In the summer time, the gang spirit in the boys finds expression in the various athletic teams that are formed. Baseball gives an outlet to friendly rivalry between different groups. This is a safer and more elevating outlet to this activity than it formerly had under rival leaders that led the groups to back alley fights and to other unsavory experiences.

Nor are we to forget the reading room. Here the latest periodicals are kept and, even in the afternoon, there are so many idle men in the community who must while away their time that the room is comfortably filled.



On a recent evening, a banquet was arranged for forty fathers each of whom was to be accompanied by his son. The city father often neglects his children in the terrible grind of his toil for bread. His strife with a hostile world to gain subsistence often crushes the tender father-feelings out of his soul or holds them in abeyance. Such meetings as these ought to be productive of much good.

Sunday Afternoon Uplift.

The Sunday afternoon meeting interested us most of all, however. That may be due to our clerical calling but we think not. We have seen in the public school a binding tie for the whole community. The church divides, through our sectarianism, but nearly the whole community of children is brought together through the public school. The children of a neighborhood all know each other and their elders learn the names of the next door neighbors from the children. What can we have that will bind the adult section of the community as the children are united in the public school? What institution shall combat all the devisive tendencies of our city life and preserve our democracy? We think we found it in the pleasant Sunday afternoon at Palmer Park. On last Sunday afternoon a thousand people were admitted and two hundred turned away for lack of room. Some afternoons there is music. At other times there are addresses. There is an intellectual curiosity among the laboring people that makes it easier to get them together for a public lecture on a scientific subject than it is to get their blase neighbors to attend after the weary round of fashionable parties. Among the events booked at the Sunday afternoon meetings are addresses by Professor Allen

PALMER PARK ASSEMBLY HALL.

GYMNASIUM IN PALMER PARK ASSEMBLY HALL.

Hoben and Dr. Willett. These will not be doctrinal but in the very best sense they will be religious. Sunday has been a demoralizing day for those who do not go to church in the city. It is a day of dissipation and wickedness. Through the Sunday afternoon meetings, Sunday will bring the higher life to many who have not had it. The program of Palmer Park is nothing less than to make the playground the social center of the entire community and the binding tie through which the different elements of society will find their helpful fellowship. Already the park is drawing many people from what we term the better grades of society. What no other institution has been able to do, the playground is doing.

What All this Means to the Church.

We cannot help asking from our point of view what all this means to the church. There are all those little churches ranged around this park. What will it mean to them? What will it mean to the Y. M. C. A?

As we looked at those churches we reflected that, after all, they had triumphed in a larger way than they had dreamed. Providence is greater than the largest human plan for the church. The ideals of the Christian religion have been adopted by the municipality and are being carried out as no voluntary association acting for a part of the community could carry them out. By the side of this triumph, the conversion of Constantine pales into insignificance. It is to be feared that Constantine converted the church rather than the church Constantine. The rescue of the Holy Sepulchre is an idle dream by the side of this great work of extending essentially Christian ideals beyond the range of ordinary church activity.

But will there still be a church? Must the mother die with the maturity of the child? Has the time already come for the church to give way to the kingdom? Most decidedly no. The dynamic of this great movement must still live. The playground does not cover the whole nature of man. It dare not provide worship. Man is a worshipful being. The public institution dare not penetrate into those great life problems which we term religion. Somebody must still teach the young the fundamental ideas of our holy religion. Someone must still lay a kindly hand on the erring. There might still be revivals around playgrounds perhaps greater than ever before.

The Church's Work of Pioneering for the Kingdom.

But must the church abandon that idea try to do the work of the park or they will fail. They do not have the equipment. They would inevitably be worsted and the interests of the community would demand that they be defeated in this. But as the churches have pioneered the way for nearly every social remedy we have, so we may hope in the future to furnish the laboratory for these experiments. That will save the church from the reproach of idleness and will give a clinic and a workshop for her members. As the church goes on feeding the religious life of the community, providing worship in the congenial forms, giving instruction to the young, and to practice in useful ways the religion it professes, even the playground people who have not gone to church may come to love and help the church.

Let us rejoice then that even great and wicked cities, before they are able to learn self-government properly are yet reaching out to larger ideals of service. Truly the Kingdom of God is near at hand.

Moral Regeneration

By Carlos C. Rowlinson

"And that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations." Luke 24:47.

It seems to be the lot of ordinary mortals to commit errors, to make failures, to be self-centered and blindly wayward. Sometime conscience awakes. It brings us to consistency. It shows us the folly of our old life. Then, if we are true, we resolutely set about the correction of our errors. We forsake the companionships and the habits of sin. We endeavor to establish associations and customs which will bear us up in our resolution to lead a true and correct life.

But conscience does not always produce this moral regeneration. Perchance our errors may drive us to remorse. From remorse, one is apt to plunge into deeper excesses. From maudlin remorse to unlimited excess is the too frequent course of the drunkard, the gambler, the libertine and all sorts of the violently wicked. Even remorse without violent reaction eats out the heart, and has no regenerative values.

Again it is possible somewhat to quiet the conscience. Scripture speaks of those who have their consciences seared as with a hot iron. These are the half-moral men of our streets—sometimes degenerating to the respectably bad, breaking the hearts of their mothers and their wives by their secret sins. These are good men to meet in a worldly sense. They show a respect for purity of life while doubting if any are pure. They easily become skeptics and scoffers. They rail at the real or supposed hypocrisies of professed Christians, and make them the excuse for their own lapses. These blase rebels against the life of the spirit call all things good. In philosophy they are gross materialists.

The genuine man is neither remorseful nor indifferent. He seeks repentance. He has a sincere desire for and determination to have a regenerated life. The cry that comes to him in his wilderness of sin is full of hope, as well as judgment. "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." God does not expect or require remorse in men, for it eats out the heart or pushes into limitless dissipation. God calls to repentance, for it works regeneration and salvation.

Repentance is possible—indeed is common—for a good man; remorse cannot be. A good man, gaining ever clearer vision of truth and duty, throws away limiting and destructive habits, and ever builds anew.

Repentance, therefore, is just the necessary prerequisite for the forgiveness of sins. Repentance is the beginning of the spiritual process which is finished in forgiveness. Repentance prepares the soil for new life; forgiveness plants the seed.

Evidently forgiveness is, in a sense, an act of the man himself. On the other hand, it is God's love which leads to repentance quite as truly as it is his love which grants forgiveness. To think of forgiveness as wholly an act of God is to cling to our legalism. Man and God are not set over against each other as our cold old theologies asserted. The processes of spiritual development are co-ordinated and transfused elements of both human and divine energy. It is always true that the "Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sins." This is blasphemy to the ordinary supernaturalist. The beautiful prayer, "Lord forgive the sin I cannot myself forgive," is largely impossible to answer. It is a very natural cry of the humble spirit. But the one who utters it does not really fail to forgive himself, else he could not utter it. Such a prayer breaks from the heart of one only in whom repentance wrought by God's love has already compelled the sense of forgiveness.

The man who repents, but cannot forgive himself, (if such use of words is permissible), is really consumed with remorse. On the other hand, the man who forgives himself but does not repent, is "sold to sin," is the "slave of sin," is a reprobate.

To the reprobate and the remorseful the exhortation of the gospel is "repent ye;" its promise is "repentance and remission of sins."

Evidently also the daily need of every life is "repentance and remission of sins." The continuous process of moral regeneration is the fundamental need of every life.

Our Readers' Opinions

"Too Many Ministers"

Editors Christian Century: Your editorial, "We have too many ministers," is not only the latest, but the best thing on the subject from A to Z. If we can keep that line of thinking squarely to the front, great good will come therefrom. Too many little struggling congregations and little struggling preachers. Brother Willett is making the Family Altar page very fine indeed.

———

Editors Christian Century: In your editorial, "We Have Too Many Ministers," you take the "other side" in earnest; and while, at first blush, it might impress the average reader of our papers these days as somewhat startling, allow me to record my humble opinion that you have made a pronounced "strike" in what you write. Though possibly incidental to your main contention, the editorial appeals to me as a notable contribution to the union problem, for the solving of which we stand. Quite likely you intend in another article to make it clear that the province of the Christian colleges would be in no wise restricted or interfered with by putting into practice what you advocate, because there can never be a "glut" of thoroughly trained and instructed Christian workers and teachers of the gospel of God's grace. The Christian Century is making a commendable reputation for fairness in its "Readers' Opinions" page. Sincerely,

The Centennial: A New Vision

We came home from the Centennial last October much as the Crusaders of Peter the Hermit—to begin a new reformation. The door was opened there and suppressed voices now begin to speak. "Christian Union" is for its time again in the ascendant and baptism will be handed down from the court of ecclesiastical authority to be and to remain in the realm of personal affairs. We are even to view "The Declaration and Address of Thomas Campbell" with our own eyes. One of our young men makes free to say that declaration "has a great truth and a great error."

Against our dreams of Christian Union there lies the inherent tendency of Protestantism to fracture, to cast off sects that go whirling apart, each in its turn to cast off others, and with all previous ones to gravitate back to forms and authority Romeward. Not even the tendency of the Disciples has been toward organic union, they having cast off two or three sects and never gained one. Accepting the New Testament collection as the last will and testament of a deceased testator which makes the Pope administrator, instead of church journals, as it is with us, we set the fatal limit to Christian liberty and make Christian union impossible. The several appearances of finality found in the New Testament have a strong influence in closing the door to our growth on union grounds. The synoptic gospels are a great mystery, having been written long after the Pentecost and the startling events of the Acts, and yet they are closed circles and hardly anticipate the greater events that were known to the writers when they were finished. The Acts of Apostles have all the appearance of a new beginning—a new circle which seems to close with the ministry of Paul. Paul was commissioned an oral messenger and yet his letters, entirely casual, became the center of gravity of our protestant system.

Paul regarded his own call as the completion of the apostolic circle, saying "He was seen of me last of all as of one born out of due season." We know no apostle after Paul. We are environed by his program as much as Rome is by the order of Peter, her patron saint as Paul is ours. Paul closes the circle of his apostolical office further by saying "if any man or angel preach any other gospel to you than that I have preached let him be anathema." To close the door against other sects we fairly pound the pulpit to give emphasis to these words of finality. And we even quote Paul's words as though they were themselves scripture when he, referring entirely to the Old Testament scripture, says, "All Scripture given by inspiration of God is profitable for doctrine for reproof for correction and instruction in righteousness that the man of God may be perfect." While Paul himself was not a "scripture" writer we feel that this very writing itself closes the scripture canon giving us a magna charta which no man can reopen or question. This is the great blunder of Protestantism. We accepted it. But neither those gospels, nor the Acts, nor Paul's being the last witness, nor his dictum of the entire sufficiency of the Old Testament Scripture, nor his anathema upon any who preach another gospel completes the circle of divine communication, either oral or written or apostolic.

Although the revelation seems to close by pronouncing a reprimand upon whoever adds to or takes away from "this word of prophecy" it is only barring against meddling with its message as such. The notion of a closed program that views these books as a last will and finished legal testimony like the law of the Medes and the Persians is delusive and obstructive as well as divisive.

When men like Professor James Denny go back of the gospels and allow all that the critics contend for and out of what is left rehabilitate the eternal and glorious Christ and stand him forth in the fullness of his Messianic power, we have begun the great new day, the restoration of primitive Christianity. But never while we are slaves to incidental writings that make no claims to the place we have assigned them. If the Declaration and Address of Thomas Campbell is not large enough to take in and include these things, if it does not leave us as free as he was to see facts, it is unworthy.

It is strange talk we hear about our fathers having settled certain questions for us. The Bible can not be held to settle any question till it first be shown that it entertains that question even if it pretended to be a settler of questions which our academic protestantism is always raising. The Bible did not entertain our baptismal question. If there is any kind of scriptural finality, if there is a closed circle, it would certainly be in the Revelation. But this very book is not in practice in any part of our New Testament canon nor incorporated in our system, which closes earlier. And here when we understand the book better we hear Christ saying, "I am alive forevermore" and "Behold I stand at the door and have the keys of David and I open and no man can shut, and shut and no man can open." And again, "Behold I stand at the door and knock, and if any man hear my voice and open I will come in and sup with him and he with me." Did Christ or did Martin Luther open the door to the Reformation? Did Christ or did Thomas Campbell open the door to the Disciples' movement? Who can answer; and yet the door was open and is still open, and every great opening for the ever expanding light of the kingdom of God is a surprise to us.

The Basis of Christian Divisions

Editors Christian Century: While the growing idea of the Fatherhood of God is leading the Christian world to the necessity and duty of cultivating the spirit of brotherhood among men, the Disciples should not mistake this growing tendency toward Christian union as a general endorsement and acceptance of their distinctive views of Scripture teaching.

Then, while they are making Christian union their special plea, and trying to convince others that this union must take place on their basis, they have but little to say about the basis or cause that has led to the divisions among Christians. Now it seems to me that it is impossible to bring about any permanent union while the cause of division still exists; and no permanent union is possible until the cause of division is taken out of the way.

God has given to every man the divine right of private judgment, or the right to do his own thinking, and to honestly draw his own conclusions as to what is the true import of scripture language; and as this is a divine right, every man should respect the religious views of every other, and a want of this respect leads to intolerance, and intolerance leads to misrepresentation; and such alienation of feeling as leads to the division among Christians.

Intolerance, then is the very basis of the divisions among Christians; and it is simply nonsense to try to bring about any permanent union as long as any people claiming the name Christian, continues the un-Christian practice of refusing to felloweship and tolerate the honest religious views of others just because they cannot see out of their little eyes and hear out of their long ears. Then, as every man has the right to look out of his own eyes, those who try to prevent it are disunionists; and instead of being eye-openers they get to be "blind leaders of the blind."

Another Parable on Baptism

God commanded a certain king to do a certain thing. When the king returned and met God's man he said, I have performed the commandment of the Lord. God's man said to him, What meaneth then this and this which I hear? The king said, I have found a more convenient and pleasanter way of doing the thing than the Lord's way which reaches the same results. "In good condition bearing the finest fruit."

God's man said to the king, you have not obeyed the voice of God. The king said I have obeyed the voice of God.

But he was told that he had not obeyed the commandment of the Lord, and also that for his disobedience he had lost the kingdom. I think the above parable may have some interest for your readers in connection with your renewed discussion of the subject involved. E. L. FRAZIER.

A STORY OF THE TRUSTS

BY JANE RICHARDSON

CHAPTER XXII.

A Tragic Outlook.

To poor, morose Tim Clark, with his large family, the closing of the Works was only one more irrefutable proof that "luck was against him." It always had been. He had lost the little patrimony he had inherited from his father, and he was one of those unfortunates who fail in almost any venture, through no particular fault of his own, but because he lacked financial acumen, and hardihood. Every failure made him still more sour and hopeless.

Randall discovered that Clark had his good points, which by the exercise of a little tact, could be utilized, so he took him into his employ, bore with him patiently, and as he mastered the details of his duties, he promoted him until he was made superintendent of the drawing department of the Works. Indisposed, by nature, to look on the hopeful side of life, even his promotion did not reassure him.

Clark had loved his wife in his own way, although he had never spared her, and the touch of bitterness that tainted every source of happiness was that she was no longer living to profit by their improved circumstances.

Jessie's unselfishness he accepted as a matter of course. Like thousands of others, he imagined the house kept itself—that the three daily meals were cooked and came upon the table without human intervention, and he did not see that the girl's youth and strength, talents and happiness were absorbed by those for whom she drudged uncomplainingly. She was the most talented of all his children and he appreciated and loved her the least.

He went home, not sorrowful, but consumed with a deadly burning rage against Randall, the Trust, Mullins,—everything! But with what sense of discrimination yet remained to him, most bitter of all toward Mullins.

Supper was waiting; Jessie had set the table and prepared the meal carefully, as she always did.

While passively kind, or, at any rate, rarely violent, there were times when Clark's children angered him, and he then beat them cruelly. As he entered the house the two younger boys who were romping noisily and did not see him until too late, ran under his feet; he struck first one, then the other in the face. Knowing better than to anger him further by an outcry, they crept away, not daring to fly openly to Jessie for comfort. She knew also that silence was the part of wisdom when her father was in this brutal mood.

He glanced at the table, and cried fiercely: "You wasteful huzzy! I've told you a thousand times that you'll have us eaten out of house and home!" and he pointed at it with a finger shaking with the rage that possessed him. "Loaded with enough stuff for twenty men. You'll mind me, mebby, when we're starvin'—you and the brats!"

Jessie poured out his tea, and, as was her habit, bore his injustice without protest. She spoke gently to one of the boys who dropped a spot of gravy on the cloth.

"Let him alone, d—— you! I paid for this cloth; he can smear it from one end to the other if he wants to. I'm the one to find fault, not you! We won't have any more table cloths after this, nor much of anything else. We'll land in the poor house yet."

He had often made this threat and they had grown so used to it they paid very little attention. It had ceased to make any impression.

"Mebby you don't believe me!" he said furiously, "but I'm a beggar, and I've got a lot of beggar brats tied to me!"

They were his own; but he was not the first son of Adam disposed to forget his own individual responsibility for their existence.

He brooded sullenly for some time, then it came out at last:

"The Works are goin' to shut down for good. I don't know which way to turn! There ain't any jobs any more for men growin' old like me!!" he cried desperately.

Jessie lay awake all night in her hard bed under the roof. She realized that her father had spoken the truth. The outlook was tragically desperate. There was little work remaining for men past their prime. A gray head had ecome the stigma of uselessness. She revolved in her mind plans by which she hoped she might be able to feed and clothe the children.

It had already sadly taxed her strength to keep the house, cook their food, and make their clothes, but she believed, that, if it were necessary she would be enabled somehow to do still more. She had dreaded—she did not know how much until now—lest the family might be separated, the children scattered amongst grudging relatives or strangers, to grow up untaught and neglected. There was none among all those affected by the imminent closing of the Works on whom the blow fell so heavily as on Clark's overburdened, innocent daughter. When morning came, sad and somber, she faced the future with dread. She fully realized that this last misfortune was the culmination of all her father's "bad luck"—a phrase she had heard all her life—and each time it had befallen him it had worked a little more disaster, till now the outlook was indeed hopeless!

CHAPTER XXIII.

"Shut Down."

The day came, at last! The machines, whose cheerful clamor meant work and bread, grew silent, the fire in the furnace died out to be no more re-kindled, and whirling band and flying wheel were stopped as by an authoritative and relentless hand. The men received their pay. Some who had been with the enterprise from the start, were pitifully dazed; they could hardly hold in their trembling fingers the last wage from the Works. It was over! Randall bade them good-bye briefly, scarcely able to speak a word. The gates were shut behind them for the last time!

No man among them all, unless it were Clark, harbored the slightest grudge against Randall. They had learned the true situation—the unequal conflict—in which he had had, as they said, "no show from the start!"

The few weeks which had elapsed since they had known that they must quit had been spent by most of the men in inquiring for work elsewhere, and the result had not given them much encouragement. Those who had been paying for their homes, with no provision that their wages would suddenly be cut off, were terribly anxious. Upon the usual terms of such arrangements, where the payments could not be met, it meant not only the loss of the home, but of all that had been invested in it; the savings of months and years—every dollar of which represented stern denial and deprivation of both the common comforts and the necessaries of life. One man had gone without an overcoat in the bitterest weather; the wife of another had taken in washing to swell the savings that the house might be sooner paid for; the boys and girls who were at work had contributed their mite, and all without avail.

"What encouragement do men and women have nowadays, to be saving and self-denying?" demanded Teddy Wilkins at the Sunday afternoon club. For, notwithstanding that Brainard, the moving spirit, was in Washington, the club kept up its organization and still met in his library, at his express desire.

"What use is it for a man to try to own the roof over his head? It is getting to be more and more impossible. Men are forced to be tramps and vagabonds—they can't help themselves. A system which makes paupers of those who are willing to work is a danger to the whole country. There's fifty tramps today where there was one twenty years ago." And none could deny it.

Carlinville had never been a manufacturing town. The Wire Fence Works was its "leading industry," as the Clarion put it. It was the commercial center of a rich agricultural region and drew much of its support from the farms beyond its environs, but the farmers were in need of no more hands. No man could have supported a family on the wages of a day laborer, had there been work for them.

After the Works closed, a dozen or more families were forced to move away. Many of the houses were, therefore, abandoned—doors and windows boarded up, standing vacant, yielding no income, the expense, nevertheless, going on. Some were advertised for sale in the delinquent tax list, and others were bought for a trifle by men who had the ready money for such ventures, able to hold the property until circumstances should increase its value.

Of those who were thus evicted—for it was eviction to all intents and purposes—and had gone to other towns, tidings came at irregular intervals, stories of suffering and distress, of aimless wanderings from place to place; of girls clerking in great department stores at starvation wages and then falling into vice; the older men rejected on every hand, where employers, demanding the utmost strength and endurance for their money, retained only the most stalwart of the young.

Susan had believed stoutly that Alonzo would have no trouble in finding something to do. But the days passed and he could hear of nothing, though he sought diligently wherever there was the slightest chance. Idleness was intolerable. He was now in increasingly feeble health. He could not throw off his despondency, and he had a cough with a hectic fever that filled poor Susan's heart with foreboding.

She had counted with much certainty on getting all the sewing she could do, but the closing of the Works affected even this class of workers.

"Everybody's economizin'" said Susan to Eleanor, showing for the first time signs of distress. "Nobody's buyin' anything new; they're makin' over their old things themselves. I don't see just what I can do!"

"Don't give up, Susan. Something will turn up," encouraged Eleanor.

She had made up her mind to go about amongst her friends, explain Susan's case and ask work for her. In the hard times they could help, and they ought to. Work was the only form of assistance which could be offered to a woman like Susan Johnson.

At last, through Eleanor's solicitation, Alonzo was given a temporary job at the waterworks. He accepted it with something of the eagerness which a man feels for life, who has been reprieved from death. He counted each day's certain employment, and certain

Melitta

Dear little lass from far away,
You're called Melitta, so they say,
And out beyond the ocean's foam
In fair Vienna is your home.
But here a welcome waits for you,
With flowing curls and eyes of blue;
You need not speak to make a friend,
Just smile on us and gain your end.
We should not understand a word
Of German—isn't that absurd,
When you can chatter all day long
In nothing else? The very song
That wooes your drowsy eyes to close
Has words each German mother knows.

That wooes your drowsy eyes to close
Has words each German mother knows.

But Russian, French, or Austrian,
Or born in Persia or Japan,
It matters not. The magic spell
Of babyhood we know so well
Is yours, and with its sorcery
You win all hearts, where'er they be.
The witch by whom the world's beguiled—
A sunny-hearted little child.

The Mouse and His Friends

A Story For Little Readers.

'Twas a winter night. The cold wind whistled loud and shrill, and the cold moonlight fell on all around.

But the old kitchen was warm. A fire blazed on the hearth and lighted up the brass andirons and bright tins wonderfully, a streak of pale moonlight lay across the floor, and a merry little cricket was singing on the hearth while the old clock beat time for him.

"Tick, tick, tick, sing," said the clock, and the cricket began. He sang of the beautiful summer time and of the warm glowing meadow.

A mouse put his head out of a hole. "Don't let me interrupt you," said he.

"Hullo," said the cricket. "We are waiting for you. Come through the moonlight for good luck."

"What good luck can there be for a three-legged mouse?" said the new comer, as he limped in and took a seat before the fire.

"O don't be unhappy," said the cricket. "It will grow again."

"Never!" said the mouse.

"Somebody will mend it," said the Table. "I have had two legs broken off short and mended again."

"Impossible!" said the Mouse. "I wish that old trap was—"

"My dear fellow," interrupted the Trap, "don't be unreasonable. I've nothing against you. It was only in the way of my business."

"Is it your business to nip off my leg?" said the Mouse, in a passion.

"It is my business to catch you if I can," said the Trap. "That's what I am here for."

"I wish you were not here then," said the Mouse. "It was very pleasant before you came."

"It was indeed," said the Cricket. "You used to come and see us every night, and dance and frisk about as lively as a cricket, almost."

"My dancing days are over," said the Mouse.

"O dear, no! don't be down-hearted!" said the Andirons. "Here, blaze away, you Fire, and make it look more cheerful."

"You'll find something to eat in the crack under the table," said the Broom. "Some split peas and a raisin. Cook tried to make me sweep them away, but I wouldn't."

"An old Broom knows where the crumbs are," said the Cricket.

"You are very kind," said the Mouse, as he went under the table and brought out the feast.

"Perfectly delicious," said he as he nibbled away. "It is a long time since I have tasted a split pea."

"Have some cheese?" said the Trap.

"For shame!" said the Broom, "Another word and I'll sweep you away." So the trap said no more.

"Come," said the Cricket, "now tell us about the old times."

"Where did I leave off?" asked the Mouse.

"She didn't like cats," replied the Cricket.

"O yes. Polly didn't like cats," resumed the Mouse. "She threw water at them and drove them away whenever they came near the house. So we were safe from them. She lost the trap. She said she couldn't tell whatever had become of it, and that loss was our gain. When she went out of an evening she always left the doors open so we could come in from the shed and go straight into the pantry, and help ourselves to cheese and pies and everything good."

"Catch Jane leaving the door open! said the Broom.

"No," said the Mouse. "If you want to go in now, you must gnaw a hole, and by the time you get it gnawed, they fill it up. I am expecting every day they'll stop up the one I have made behind the door."

"Not if I can help it," said the Broom. "That's where I stand, you know, and I try to hide it."

"Thank you," replied the Mouse. "I have some friends."

"I should think so," said the Cricket.

"She always left the bread box open a little," continued the Mouse, "so that we could easily go in and out of it. We never nibbled a whole loaf or a whole pie. Take what was cut. That was the rule."

"I wish I had been there then," said the Cricket.

"Ah, well," sighed the Mouse, "it was not all pleasant. Accidents happened. Once a cousin of mine fell into a deep pan of milk, and with all we could do we couldn't get him out. I ran around the edge of that pan as many as fifty times, and came near slipping in myself, but did no good. We had to leave him there, with his whiskers and the tips of his ears sticking up through the cream. 'Twas sad."

"O dear! If you had only had one of my straws he could have clung to it," said the Broom.

"Perhaps so," replied the Mouse, as he wiped his eyes. "Another friend of mine fell into a high pitcher, and couldn't get out, and we could do nothing for him. He was taken prisoner and we never saw him again."

"O horrors!" exclaimed the Cricket.

"And though Polly was so kind to us in some ways," continued the Mouse, "she didn't really seem to like us. I've known her to scream and jump up on the table if one of us ran out on the floor."

"So have I," said the Table, "to my sorrow."

"Come, come," said the Clock, as he struck twelve. "It is time to go to sleep. I'm going to take a nap myself, now I have come to the small hours, so good night."

"Good night, then," said the Mouse. "I'll take home the raisin for tomorrow."

"Do," said the Broom.

"Good night," chirped the Cricket. "Come again." —Selected.

Glass Bricks

Glass bricks are coming into use in France because they are hygienic and of easy make. The glass brick does not crumble or receive the norious ambient dust found in the worn earth brick of ordinary manufacture, and it can be made of refuse glass, old window panes, broken bottles, and the like.

In the best method the bmolten glass is run into molds capable of resisting the different heating and cooling degrees. The finished brick present a smooth, impervious surface.

The new brick is supplanting the old brick in walls, pavements and side walls and flooring of bathrooms and hospitals, the waiting rooms of railways stations and places of similar character.

For use in laboratories it offers the advantage of being immune from the inouence of chemical products. In Grenoble, France, and in Germany (Hamburg and Berlin) houses are being built entirely of glass bricks. In Dresden and in other cities of Saxony they are coming into use in theaters, museums and other public buildings.

In Hamburg they are used in meat markets, where they convey the impression of dazzling purity. In Milan the hospitals have adopted their use, and the schools use them because rooms walled with glass bricks receive more light.—Harper's Weekly.

Elizabeth

By Grace Wood Castle.

"A beautiful stately woman
  My daughter will sometime be,"
And the proud young mother fondly
  Kissed her first-born at her knee;
"So the name that I have given her—
  Hers to her latest breath—
Is beautiful, too, and stately;
  Her name is—Elizabeth."

So every one tried to remember
  To give to the winsome mite,
The charming adorable baby,
  The name that was hers by right;
But it was of no use whatever,
  Soon each of her kith and kin
Had a name for the dainty maiden—
  Sweetest baby that ever has been.

Lizzie and Lisa and Lisbet,
  Betty and Beth and Bess,
Elisabetta and Elise,
  A score of them, more or less;
But as years go by swift-footed
  These will slip from her, one by one,
And the name her mother gave her
  Be hers till her years are done.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, APRIL 3

Theme for the Day.—The Divine Guest and the unreceiving world.

Scripture.—He came into his own, and they that were his own received him not. But as many as received him, to them gave he the right to become sons of God. John. 1:11, 12.

To Our alone my thoughts arise,
The Eternal Truth, the Good and Wise,
To Him I cry,
Who shared on earth our common lot,
But the world comprehended not
His deity.
—Longfellow ("Coplas de Maurique").

Prayer.—Our Father, we bless Thee for the life of Christ, our Friend and Teacher, who walked the ways of life with us to show us how rich and beautiful our lives can be. May we not be of the company who receive him not, but rather may his companionship be our supreme desire. We thank Thee for this good day, made memorable by the conquest of death, and the observanee of the Feast of Love through the ages. May we enter the sanctuary today with the joy of those who have received the right to become the sons of God. And may our souls respond to Thy call to the higher life of faith and trust. Amen.

MONDAY, APRIL 4

Theme for the Day.—The glory of maturing life.

Scripture.—Now that I am become a man, I have put away childish things. 1 Cor. 13:11.

I have written unto you, fathers, because ye know him who is from the beginning. John 2:13.

Grow old along with me!
The best is yet to be,
The last of life, for which the first was made;
Our lives are in His hand
Who saith, "A whole I planned,
Youth shows but half; trust God; see all nor be afraid!"
—Robert Browning ("Rabbe ben Ezra").

Prayer.—Heavenly Parent, from whom we receive all the gifts of life, we bless Thee that our pathway grows brighter as the years go on, and that we have faith to believe the best is yet to be. Help us to grow old with dignity, goodness of heart and cheerfulness. May we not be spoiled by life's successes, nor made bitter by its troubles. May children find us loving. May men and women younger than ourselves discover in us optimism and appreciation of all that is good; and may those of mature life welcome us to their circle as friends and companions of the upper way. We ask in Jesus' name. Amen.

TUESDAY, APRIL 5

Theme for the Day.—The great Teacher.

Scripture.—Jesus went out of the house and sat by the seaside. And there were gathered unto him great multitudes, so that he entered into a boat and sat; and all the multitude stood on the beach. And he taught them many things. Matt. 13:1, 2.

On a rock,
With the broad moonlight falling on his brow,
He stood and taught the people. At his feet
Lay his small scrip, and pilgrim's shallop-shell,
And staff, for they had waited by the sea
Till he came o'er from Gadarene, and prayed
For his want teachings as he came to land.
—U. P. Willis ("The Daughters of Jairus").

Prayer.—Merciful God, we adore Thee for Thy abounding love. Thou hast sent to us the great Teacher, in whose words we have found all wisdom and power. Save us, we beseech Thee, from the sin of slighting his message. May we give ear to his story of eternal life even as those who first brand him by the sea. And with the desire to hear may there also be born within us the will to understand and follow him. Good Father, grant us the humble heart and the obedient spirit, and may the Master find us among his own in the day of the homecoming above. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 6

Theme for the Day.—The holy city.

Scripture.—And he carried me away to a mountain great and high, and showed me the holy city, Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God, having the glory of God. Rev. 21:10.

And straight beyond the star
I saw the spiritual city and her spires
And gateways in a glory like our pearl—
No larger, tho the goal of all the saints
Strike from the sea.
—Alfred Tennyson ("The Holy Grail").

Prayer.—Our Father, we thank Thee for the City which hath foundations, Jerusalem above, which is free, and which is the Mother of us all. In the visions of faith we may see its glories, and rest our weary souls in the contemplation of its beauty. For its fair and spacious life we long, not as some far-off goal of after days, but as an ideal toward which it is our privilege and duty to strive. Help us, O Father, to believe more confidently in that city that is to be, that cowes down out of heaven from Thyself to us, as we give it place and room, and make ready for its coming. Then shall come our true and lasting joy. Amen.

THURSDAY, APRIL 7

Theme for the Day.—The pillar of cloud and fire.

Scripture.—And the Lord went before them by day in a pillar of cloud, to lead them the way; and by night in a pillar of fire to give them light. Ex. 13:21.

When Israel, of the Lord beloved,
Out from the land of bondage came,
Her father's God before her moved,
An awful guide in smoke and flame.
By day, along the astonished lands,
The clouded pillar glided slow;
By night Arabia's crimson sands
Returned the fiery column's glow.
—Sir Walter Scott ("Ivanhoe").

Prayer.—O Thou who leadest Thy people through all the ways of life, we thank Thee for the record of Thy gracious leadings of old. With strength of hand and with an outstretched arm Thou didst bring Israel into a land of Thine own choosing. So, Father, bring us out of our bondage to sin, and by the pillar of cloud and fire wake us to discern Thy presence and know the safeyt of the way we take. Thou hast been our fathers' God; forsake not us their children. And may our journey through the wilderness lead at least to the highlands of God. Amen.

FRIDAY, APRIL 8

Theme for the Day.—The eternal song of the skies.

Scripture.—There is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard. Psalm 19:3.

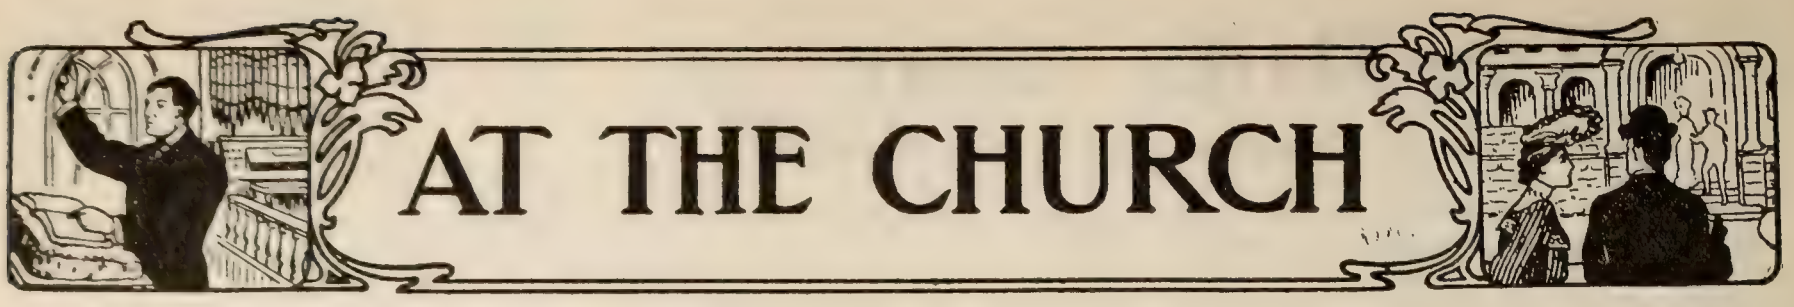
When the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy. Job. 37:7.

Look how the floor of heaven
Is thick inlaid with patines of bright gold:
There's not the smallest orb which thou behold'st
But in his motion like an angel sings.
—Shakespeare ("Merchant of Venice," 5:1).

Prayer.—O Thou great Creator, who hast set Thy glory upon the heavens, we praise Thee for all the wonders of Thy universe, which in its wonder and beauty fills us with joy that we also are the creatures of Thy hand. And Thou has taught us that these things which Thou hast made are only the short-lived tokens of Thy power. They shall perish, but Thou remainest. And we, too, who wear Thy image, shall abide into the long eternity ahead. Help us to make our lives worthy of Thee and of the destiny held out to us. And may our song of rejoicing be not less pleasing to Thee than that of the morning stars. Amen.

SATURDAY, APRIL 9

Theme for the Day.—The passing world.



Scripture.—For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes and the pride of life is not of the Father, but is of the world; and the world passeth away. 1 John 2:16, 17.

The worldly hope men set their hopes upon
Turns ashes—or it prospers; and anon,
Like snow upon the desert's dusty face,
Lighting a little hour or two—is gone.
—Omar Khayyam ("The Rubaiyat").

Prayer.—O Thou Unchanging Friend, teach us the lesson that much of what we see and desire can only satisfy us for a brief time, for it will not last. Save us from the mistake of giving our best affection and effort to that which can not endure the testing of time. Our lives are in Thy keeping, gracious God, and may we be content to leave them in Thy care, lest they be wasted in unprofitable ventures. We close this week with prayer to Thee for wisdom and comfort. So may all our times be in Thy hand, till time melts into eternity. Amen.

Love and Service

If in thy life on earth,
In the chamber, or by the hearth,
'Mid the crowded city's tide,
Or high on the lone hillside,
Thou canst cause a thought of peace,
Or an aching thought to cease,
Or a gleam of joy to burst
On a soul in sadness nursed;
Spare not thy hand, my child;
Though the gladdened should never know
The wellspring amid the wild
Whence the waters of blessing flow.
Find thy reward in the thing
Which thou hast been blest to do;
Let the joy of others cause joy to spring
Up in thy bosom too.
And if the love of a grateful heart
As a rich reward be given,
Lift thou the love of a grateful heart
To the God of love in heaven.
—George Macdonald.

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The First Ambassadors*

The closing words of the ninth chapter of Matthew give an admirable summary of the work of Jesus and of the feelings with which he contemplated the vastness of the program which he only had time to begin. His methods were three: Teaching, preaching and healing, and these are the examples of what the church must always do. In the final issue all educational work is the result of Jesus' activity as a teacher. Although we have separated between church and state and have grown to be very cautious of any mingling of the two interests in our modern life, yet we are quite aware that it is the Christian interest in a community which leads to all educational activity. The schools are in reality Christian foundations, even though they may be devoted to entirely secular disciplines. Where Christianity is unknown, education is either totally neglected or is of the poorest sort.

Jesus preached, and his preaching has been the example of all effort to gain the attention of society to the great tasks of religion and the moral life. Wherever the message of religion goes out in any aggressive form of evangelism it is inspired by the Christian ideal. The church that fails to teach and to preach has little to justify its existence. For it is the business of the Christian church to call the thought of the world to the holy life. This is the very heart of teaching.

The Work of Healing.

But not less truly must the church imitate its Master as the healer of the world's distresses. Too long it neglected this task, and fell under the reproach of other-worldliness and indifference to human need. In recent years it has come dangerously near the opposite extreme of devoting itself too largely to the physical wants of humanity. And many have even gone the length of insisting that the chief business of the church is to heal the bodies of men. Proper attention to the program of Jesus would correct both these tendencies. He came to call attention to the full and normal life of humanity. That of course included physical welfare. Jesus healed the diseases of humanity in token of the fact that the church must always give some of its attention to the distressed and delinquent members of the race. Nor was it his intention that men should so misunderstand his call as that they should attach to the mere healing of bodies so large an importance as some divisions of the church have done in recent years. Least of all was it the purpose of our Lord that men should go about claiming the power of miracle in his name. For this would be sure to lead to a false conception of his work in the world, and it would be sure also to fail of accomplishing what was claimed.

But every institution or effort that contemplates the uplift of social and physical conditions is in part the fulfillment of the ideals of Jesus. He not only fed the hungry, clothed the naked and healed the sick, but taught his disciples that they must do the same. And wherever by medical knowledge, by surgical skill, by the provision of asylums for the blind, the deaf and the orphan, or of hospitals for the diseased, the spirit of Jesus is interpreted to the world, there the great enterprise of his church in behalf of the unfortunate again discloses the spirit of the Lord. It has long been the glory of the Roman Catholic church that it gave due and serious attention to the physical needs of society. Too long have Protestants lagged behind in this good work. It is one of the satisfactions of our age that a fuller gospel is being preached, a gospel which includes physical welfare as well as education and the regenerate life.

The Wide Field.

As Jesus looked upon the people whom he was thus attempting to help he saw the vastness of the work. The multitudes pressed upon him daily. In spite of his tireless devotion to his mission there must have been thousands even of those who were attracted to his ministries, whom he could not even reach with his preaching, to say nothing of that more careful instruction which he reserved for the most intimate circle of the disciples, or that healing power which he bestowed upon a comparatively small company of appreciative and believing supplicants. But who would take up the task of leadership among the multitudes who lacked guidance, and were as sheep without a shepherd? This condition burdened his heart, and made him often enjoin the disciples to keep the needs of this great harvest field, this vast and unshepherded flock, in their minds. They must pray earnestly that more laborers might be sent forth into the harvest.

As if to illustrate this need and the source of its supply, Jesus at some point in the early Galilean ministry, sent out his own disciples, the twelve, upon an evangelistic tour through the neighboring towns. His purpose was two-fold; to reach the communities he could not visit in person, and to give the disciples experience in handling aright the message with which he was soon to entrust them. His sending forth of these witnesses is characteristic of his own conception of the tasks of the ministry. He never called men into the work of preaching in masses. He rather selected here and there those whom he could trust with the precious message of his life. The church has not always remembered this example. Too frequently it has thought that the mere calling of numbers of young men into the ministry would meet the needs of the church. Jesus' method is better. He begged his disciples to pray that the Father would call such as he chose for the great adventure. A praying church will have a conquering ministry. But any cheaper and less personal method of increasing its preaching force will have only secondary and too often unhappy results.

Instructions to the Twelve.

When he had called the disciples to this work of evangelism, he laid upon them certain instructions regarding their plan of work. They were not to leave Jewish territory. They must not even go across the border into the half-Jewish region of Samaria, but rather confine themselves to their own people, the lost sheep of the household of faith. They were to proclaim everywhere the coming of the kingdom, which was present already in the person of Jesus, and was in a measure present in their own lives. They were to do the things they had seen Jesus do, heal the sick and minister to helpless and demoralized humanity, realizing that as they had partaken so fully of the nature of Christ, they were freely to give it forth to others.

They were to make no provision for the way. No money was to be taken, nor any extra garments. They were to depend entirely upon the free gifts of those to whom they came, knowing that their message was worthy of reward. They were to seek reputable homes to dwell in, and in them they were to remain as long as they tarried in a city. They were to bring the atmosphere of peace and good will into whatever house they entered, as all servants of Jesus are to do. If, at last, in spite of their earnest efforts the people of the place refused to listen to their message, they must leave the town with that characteristic gesture of condemnation, the shaking of dust from their feet, as a token that they put upon the people themselves the responsibility of their present action. And surely a heavy judgment rested on any community that refused them hospitality and hearing.

By a comparison of this body of teaching with the similar records in Luke (Luke 9:1-6, 10:1-24) it will be seen that in the first gospel the instructions to the twelve and the seventy have been combined. They differ little save in the sterner note used in the instruction to the larger body toward the close of Jesus' ministry. But these instructions stand as a model of direction for those who go out in the name of the Christ. And though the conditions of our modern life have modified some of the details of this commission, they have not altered in the least the principles which Jesus there set forth

By W. D. Endres

Topic for April 10: God is Here. Psa. 139:1-12.

God is here. Do we believe it? do we realize it? Do we act as if we thought it true? Think for a minute of what it means. There are inner courts in the lives of us all, upon which the public cannot gaze. Even our most trusted friends are not allowed to enter, indeed, there are holy of holies into which not even the life-long companion, husband or wife, is asked to come. The most faithful biographer charitably draws the mantle of silence over the inner life of the man or woman about whom he writes if there be those things there which would humiliate. This is right. Who of us wants to know of the things which are out of keeping with the great and good lives of Washington, or Lincoln, or Frances E. Willard. They have been so glorious, so helpful and so inspiring that we do not want the unfortunate things of their lives revealed. But God knows them all. Not only the things of darkness away from the gaze of the world but all the unspoken thoughts and controlled and smothered impulses. Yea, those things of the heart which they have felt but never expressed even to themselves.

But let us remember that God is here with us. He is not a God of the mountains, of the sea, of the valley merely, but of human lives. He knows the inmost recesses of your heart and mind. Would we be willing to have the thoughts of our minds, the feelings of our hearts, and the deeds of our bodies to be written out and displayed on a canvas in large letters over a thoroughfare of the city? From such a thing we all shrink. Then we do well remember that, think what we will, say what we may, and do this deed, or that, God is ever present and sees and knows them all. We can literally say to Jehovah as the Psalmist did centuries ago:

Thou searchest out my path and my lying down,
Thou art acquainted with all my ways.
There is not a word in my tongue,
But, lo, O Jehovah, thou knowest it all together.

We are young people, and strong is the temptation to do things which our conscience condemns and our elders disapprove. Many are the times, too, when we slip away and do under the cover of the night's darkness these same things because we are sure they will not be found out. But do we forget that God is there. Says our lesson again:

Even the darkness hideth not from thee,
But the night shineth as the day:
The darkness and the light are both alike to thee.

There is only one way then for Christians (Endeavorers) to be acceptable to God and that is to be genuine. In just a word, it is justly assumed that the Christian, as such, is committed to the defense and extension of righteousness. This is what God wants, with nothing less than an earnest effort to do this will He be satisfied. Are we doing this? Let us be careful how we answer, for God is here. He hears the answer and knows if it be true.

pay with the feverish greed of a miser. When it came to an end he collapsed bodily and mentally. He gave up, and sat for hours, drowsy and inert in his chair, by the window in the sun. Death was stamped on his gaunt face.

In his presence Susan was the same cheerful and hopeful creature that she always had been; she laughed and joked and sang at her sewing machine which ran all day long, for Eleanor succeeded in getting many orders for her amongst her own friends. Then, too Randall's wife brought quantities of material to make up into garments for the children of the Orphan Asylum. Of necessity Eldora had to quit school. She brought her books home and made no complaint, but Susan knew that she cried herself to sleep that night.

Eleanor was a haven of refuge, and the next morning she slipped away to have a talk with her, taking a bit of hand-sewing along that she might lose no time. She let her tears flow while she talked, filling Eleanor with that compunction and dismay which she might have felt at such signs of grief in a strong man. It was utterly unlike anything that she had ever known in the self-sufficient, resolute creature.

"That Gates was right," she said abruptly, "things have turned out just as he said they would. Randall couldn't help himself when the Trust got ready to swaller him. And it's the trusts that make such fellers as Gates and keeps 'em busy." She sighed deeply and continued: "Seems to me I feel as sorry about Eldory as anything. She was so ambitious and took such an interest in her studies."

"It is hard," replied Eleanor sympathetically, as she saw a bright drop splash on the little garment Susan was finishing. "But the hard times cannot last always; when the weather is warmer Alonzo will be better, and he can look for another place."

"Hain't he looked and looked!" exclaimed Susan despairingly. "That is half what's the matter with him, poor man. He wasn't strong when the works shut down, but he wasn't what you'd call 'sick.' Now he's clean broke down; he'll never be any better and I know it as well as you do, Miss Eleanor."

Eleanor was silent; she could not truthfully contradict her.

"He's fell behind with his dues at the lodge, so he ain't entitled to any help from them—after payin' assessments all these years. Randall's been good as gold, but we can't take any more from him—not seein' any way of ever payin' it back."

"I'm sure he'd never press you."

"No. In spite of all I can do, what with medicine and doctor's bills and payments on the lot, our money's goin' fast." Her deep discouragement pierced Eleanor's heart.

After a moment Susan went on: "If I'd had sewin' all along I could have managed better, but I couldn't get that, till you helped me. Poor Eldory, she has to do most of the work and help me sew besides. It's hard on her—and to lose her schoolin' too——"

"She need not lose it. I would be glad to help her. I'm dreadfully rusty; but I'll study up, and perhaps what I once knew will come back to me."

Susan looked at her gratefully, unable to speak for some time, then she said: "Your comin' here was certainly a blessin' to us. The good Lord, himself, must'a sent you." She thought sadly a moment: "Ain't things strange! The ones that don't want things has to have 'em, and them that does has to go without them all their days."

"It is always so," replied Eleanor.

"Ned hates school; he'll never want to go, an' when he gets old enough he'll quit an' go to work, if there's any work left anywhere for such as us, by that time! But Eldory took such an interest. She was proud of standin' at the head of her class, and she's set her heart on bein' a teacher.

"She shall be a teacher, yet," said Eleanor with conviction. "We will see to that. And, Susan, think of what people have done who had no schooling at all—the teachers, the presidents, and great editors, who have had almost no education."

"That's all right," replied Susan, "and, if they done well without, they'd a' done a heap better with it. I don't take no stock in all this talk about adversity trainin' and helpin' us. Many a one's had the life crushed out of him by the terrible trials he's gone through, fittin' himself for his place, when he needed all the strength for the work he'd been countin' on doin'." Eleanor did not attempt to make denial.

"The folks that talk that 'a way, don't know nothin' about it. I don't mean you; God knows you've had your full share. If they had to hustle like the folks they're so fond of preachin' at, they'd change their tune." She picked up her sewing, wiped her eyes and resumed her work.

After a short silence she said abruptly: "I sold my organ. Wells & Company said they'd give me fifty dollars for it, as I'd kept it so good. It was worth twict that, but I needed the money so, with Lon havin' to have so many things."

Eleanor pitied her deeply, as only a woman could, for she knew that poor Susan felt that one more claim to respectability was gone with the organ. She had not time to say a word of comfort for Eldora's voice was heard calling:

"Ma! Ma! Pa wants you!"

"He's just like a teethin' baby. I can't leave him a minute," said Susan pityingly as she hurried away.

With the sale of the organ began the spoilation of Susan's home, in which she had taken such innocent pride. Eleanor soon missed the hanging lamp with its scintillating prisms. Then the plush-covered album disappeared. The bartender of the "Bird-cage," the new saloon which had been opened in one of the recently vacated grocery stores on the outskirts of Wakefield, bought the couch at a bargain. He also took Teddy's house off his hands, paying him liberally for the painting and other work he had done.

Teddy was even less fortunate than Alonzo. He was one of the many who could find no work of any sort in the town. He even asked to dig in the streets, but found the places filled by the tools of the "ward-workers." He was forced to modify his fixed belief that "a man out of a job can get another for the asking, if he really wants work."

The wedding was postponed of necessity. It was impossible to keep up a home with the little money he had left and with no cerainty for the future. Mary folded up her pretty trousseau, which she had prepared with such fond anticipations, and packed it away, with the delicate lingerie and initialed linen which were her especial pride. She had not in the least shared Teddy's hopeful views; she could see no prospect of better times, and she was haunted by a certainty that ill luck had overtaken them, and that everything was at an end.

Eleanor realized how unhappy she must be, and invited her to come and stay with her, and Mary, sick of her dismal boarding house—indeed, unable to stay there longer—accepted the invitation gratefully. She was installed in the little room that Eleanor has occupied before her mother's death, and which she had occupied on her frequent visits, and in the quiet, well ordered household began to regain her shaken courage.

She was not willing to settle down on Eleanor—a helpless burden—and she was fortunate enough to get another situation. Her employer was not a second Dick Randall, she soon discovered, but heaped work upon her, the bookkeeping as well as the correspondence, until she was often detained late into the night.

She was never able to pass the little house that was to have been her home. Every association connected with it was now a source of pain, and almost unendurable regret. Mary had not yet attained that "patience under affliction" for which the Litany makes special petition, and which, if acquired, at last schools the soul to submission.

As but few of the Neighborly Club had been directly dependent on the Works, they were not so greatly affected by its closing down, and the meetings were not discontinued. But, with sorrow and distress all about them, they found much to do in the imperative work of relief. Many were the plans that they devised which would help without wounding the self-respect of those who, for the first time in their lives, found themselves in need of assistance.

Brainard's letters were now Eleanor's chief comfort. She thought she had had some comprehension of his sympathy, his helpfulness and strength in the past, but she realized in their closer relations, how far her estimate of his mind and character had fallen short.

Church Life

From Easter till Children's Day—one of the most fruitful times for the aggressive church. Many of the results of the year's work will be gathered up at this time.

The offering for the work of the churches in May will call for careful preparation on the part of pastor and people that the offering may be worthy of the strength of the church.

The Congress of the Disciples is in session at Bloomington, Ind., this week, a report of these meetings will be made in our pages next week. This has come to be one of the significant meetings of our Brotherhood each year.

The call of the National Benevolent Association should not be neglected by any of the churches. If the offering was not taken last Sunday it should not on that account be allowed to go by default. Next Sunday will not be too late.

American Missions in May.

A new church has been organized at Cedar Falls, Iowa, and articles of incorporation filed with the court at Waterloo.

J. W. Marshall, Evangelist, is leading the forces at Waterloo, Iowa, in a two weeks' meeting.

Stephen J. Corey, Secretary of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, spoke at the First Church, Bloomington, Ill., March 13.

Charles E. McVay is singing in a meeting at Morrell, Kansas, for C. H. Mattox. He has one or two open dates for the summer.

The attendance of the Sunday School at Urichsville, Ohio, is near the 400 mark and the pastor is trying to push it over the line.

"Growth Through Loss and Defeat" was the subject of the sermon by Edward Scribner Ames, at the Hyde Park Church, Palm Sunday.

H. W. Head reports the work at Pacific Grove, Cal., moving along nicely. H. W. Wilson is the pastor, and his work usually goes along in good shape.

The office of the Board of Church Extension has been moved to 603 New England Building, Kansas City. This change was made necessary in order to secure more room.

A series of Decision meetings were held in the Central Church, Syracuse, New York, during Passion Week. Joseph A. Serena, the pastor, did the preaching.

At three o'clock on Easter Sunday afternoon, the Colorado Christian Home, West 29th Ave., and Tennyson Street, Denver, was dedicated.

W. J. Wright will hold a meeting in Norfolk, Va., during April, which it is expected will mean much for the growth of the churches in that city.

Mrs. J. P. Pinkerton. wife of the beloved pastor at Springfield, Mo., died March 20, and was buried on the 22nd, is the sad news announced by telegram.

The Christian Church at Marshalltown, Iowa. has secured the services of C. W. McCord, formerly Presbyterian Minister of that city.

Charles Darsie, pastor of the church at Urichsville. Ohio, has been leading the church at Nelsonville, in a meeting in which there have been nearly one hundred additions.

The Sunday Schools of Denver, Colorado, have an athletic Association, and have this year elected James A. Semple, of the South Broadway Sunday School, as president.

Mark S. Peckham, son of G. A. Peckham, Hiram College, is now pastor of the church at Sumter, South Carolina, and reports frequent additions to the membership of the church.

Miss Olive Griffith, Living Link missionary from the First Church, Lincoln, Nebraska, is planning to return in April for a brief visit in the homeland. Miss Griffith's work is at Damoh, India.

Walter L. Martin, formerly pastor of the University Heights Church, San Diego, has been called to the pastorate of the church at Douglass, Arizona, and begins his labors at once.

W. E. Bobbitt, Pastor of the church at Woodland, California, has been giving generously of his time during the last few weeks in assisting in the temperance campaign in his county.

A. M. Meldrum has resigned at Pendleton, Oregon, after a very successful work in which a new church has been built. Mr. Meldrum is highly commended as pastor and preacher. He will remain on the Coast.

E. W. Cole, pastor of the church at Huntington, Ind., observed Passion week, by giving in the church each evening, a series of illustrated lectures, on events connected with the closing days of the Master's earthly life.

The church at Liberty, Mo., R. G. Frank, pastor, is rejoicing over the fact that their offering for Foreign Missions this year puts them in the Living Link class. This is a fine accomplishment for this fine old church.

B. H. Melton has resigned as pastor of the Marshall St. Church, Richmond, Va., after eight years of successful work there. He has not yet accepted a call to another church and will remain in Richmond until September.

The choir of sixty voices of the University Church, Des Moines, sang "The Crucifixion," at the service of the church Palm Sunday morning. The Pastor, C. S. Medbury, gave a short sermon on the crucifixion.

There were 519 in the Sunday School of the church at South Lawrence Avenue Church, Wichita, Kan., Sunday, March 29, and two additions to the church. The offering for Foreign Missions was $150. C. C. Sinclair is the pastor.

James M. Helms has resigned as pastor of the church at Lawrenceburg, Indiana, that he may give his time to developing oil and coal interests which have just been discovered on some land which he holds in Virginia.

The attendance of the Sunday School at the South Broadway Church, March 13, was 410, and the offering $32.99, including an offering from one of the classes of boys for state missions, amounting to $10.00, and another offering of $11.00 for the organ fund.

Special Decision services were held at the South Geddes Street Church, Troy, New York, under the leadership of the Pastor, C. R. Stauffer, and Arthur Braden, President of Keuka College, beginning Sunday, March 20, and closing Easter Sunday.

Harry G. Hill of the Third Church, Indianapolis, was assisted by L. E. Sellers in a special series of meetings preceeding Easter. Work is progressing on the new church building which will be the best of our Brotherhood in the city.

A. R. Liverett, Minister of the Christian Church at Cameron, Mo., lectured Friday night, March 18, at Troy, Kan., under the auspices of the Young Men's Sunday School Class. He will lecture at Princeton, Mo., March 31.

The meetings at the Englewood Church, under the leadership of W. J. Wright and H. S. Saxton are in progress. There have been a number of additions to the church, coming mostly from the Sunday School, and naturally so, for the Englewood Church has a large and flourishing School.

The churches of Huntington, Ind., held a union meeting the afternoon of Palm Sunday, with addresses by the different pastors of the city. The subject of the address by E. W. Cole, pastor of the Christian Church was, "A Godly Manhood."

At the close of the meeting with the Central Church, Des Moines, Peter Ainslie, President of the American Christian Missionary Society will go with I. N. McCash on a tour of the Central States, speaking in several of the more important churches.

A forty thousand dollar church was dedicated by F. M. Rains, at Amarillo, Texas, March 20. More than ten thousand dolars was raised, which provides for all indebtedness against the property. W. P. Jennings is the pastor.

Announcement has been made that W. H. Book, pastor of the Tabernacle Church, Columbus, Indiana, has been offered a position as teacher in Virginia Christian College, with the condition that half of the year should be spent in work as evangelist for the college. It is said that he will not accept.

S. Ellwood Fisher, who has been serving as pastor of the church at Paxton, Ill., will begin his ministry with the church at Dixon, the first of May. Until Mr. Fisher can take up the work at Dixon the pulpit will be supplied from Sunday to Sunday by various ministers.

Dr. J. M. Philputt, formerly pastor of the Union Avenue Church, St. Louis, Mo., has sent word from Athens, Greece, that he and Mrs. Philputt are in good health and having a fine trip. A rare privilege was accorded Mr. Pilputt, when at the invitation of the ship committee he preached to a large assembly on Mars Hill.

The Sunday School of the Evanston, Ill., church made an offering to the building fund of the church at the close of their services on Easter Sunday. The offering was deposited in a huge Easter egg. It was proposed that fifty adults should bring one dollar each for the fund and that each of the children should bring a silver offering.

The Broadway Church, Denver, observed Passion week with services each evening. The beloved Pastor, B. B. Tyler, preached on the following topics: "The Triumphal Entry," "The Cleansing of the Temple," "Solemn Warning," "The Unanswerable Question," "The Agony of the Garden," and "The Trial and Death of Jesus."

S. D. Dutcher, pastor of the church at Terre Haute, Ind., is commended by a local paper for his ability to recall names and faces. It is said that he can recall at an instant the name of every one of the more than twelve hundred members of his church. No member of the church has yet found ground for disputing the claim. This is an accomplishment worth possessing.

The Christian Messenger, Georgia, announces the death of T. M. Foster, one of Georgia's veterans, after a service of 37 years, as pastor of local churches and in the service of the state society as Evangelist. An interesting item comes from the diary of this soldier of the cross, showing that in all this time Mr. Foster received for his services an average salary of $415.00 per year.

The First Church, Springfield, Mo., is said to have extended a call to E. W. Bowers, of Des Moines, Iowa, to become their pastor, succeeding N. M. Ragland, who gave up the work here several weeks ago. Mr. Bowers was pastor of this church before going to Iowa, and it is thought that he will yield to the voice of the church in its call to a second service with them.

A Cedar Rapids paper recently gave large space to the report of a sermon by F. E. Smith, Pastor of the Second Church, on the subject, "Towel as Weapon." The sermon was based on the narrative of the washing of the Disciples' feet and from this was impressed upon the hearts of the audience the greatness of humility in service. A large audience was in attendance.

I. J. Spencer, who has just closed a successful meeting with the University Place Church, Des Moines, took occasion while in Des Moines Capitol City, to study the commission form of government and upon his return in a Sunday evening sermon described and commended the plan to the people of Lexington, Ky. This is a fine illustration of the place the live preacher will occupy in the life of his city and community.

The annual report of the North Carolina Christian Missionary Convention has just reached our office. The work in this state is being pushed with enthusiasm, and the people of the state are hopeful. The officers for the present year are: J. W. Hines, President; J. H. S. Hodges, Vice President; C. Manly Morton, Corresponding Secretary; J. R. Rountree, Recording Secretary; and George Hawkney, Treasurer.

The choir of the church at San Jose, California, has just given the last of a series of seven sacred concerts to the new building of this church. These musical services have attracted large numbers to the church, and the work of the choir has been of the very best. Geo. W. Brewster is the pastor of the church.

The churches of New York recently held a "Disciples' Banquet," at the Central Hotel. The attendance broke all records. Addresses were made by Attorney Williams, who has been working for the Layman's Missionary Movement, and I. N. McCash, Secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society.

The Central Illinois Christian Ministerial Institute, will be held in Peoria, April 6 and 7 (Wednesday and Thursday). Addresses are to be made by T. T. Holton, Bloomington; B. H. Sealock, Petersburg; S. S. Jones, Danville; W. F. Turner, Peoria; C. S. Medbury, Des-Moines; O. W. Lawrence, Decatur; O. C. Bolman, Havana; J. H. Smart, Decatur; David H. Shields, Eureka; R. B. Sloan, Streator; C. C. Morrison, Chicago; and Edgar Jones, Bloomington. The change from Clinton to Peoria was made on account of the Laymen's Missionary Movement Convention held in Peoria, April 7 to 10.

At the missionary rally at the First Church, Oakland, March 1, the following question was debated: "Resolved, that the evangelization of China is of greater moment to the future prosperity and trade than the construction of the Panama Canal." Pastor Fred Newsome, of Richmond, and Prof. E. E. Washburn, of Fruitvale, took the affirmative; while attorney Hugh Brunk, of Berkeley, and Otto B. Irelan, also of that city, brought up tne negative. Leon V. Shaw was moderator. The judges were Prof. H. C. Ingram, of Oakland, Mrs. Louise Jones Taft, Berkeley, and A. N. Daniels, Alameda. The decision was in favor of the affirmative.

Andrew P. Johnston, Pastor of the Church at Chickasha, Oklahoma, is sending through the mails to the membership of his church a series of bulletins informing them of the progress of the work and calling their attention to things needed. From Bulletin, No. 2, we gather some interesting facts. There have been fifty-eight additions to the church in the past five months. The parsonage has been repaired, the Sunday School attendance has doubled; and is now striving for an attendance of 500. Earnest effort is being made to strengthen the financial work of the church so that there may be no danger of any embarrassment at any time.

John A. Jayne, for fourteen years pastor in Pittsburg, Pa., who made himself so favorably known to the Disciples by his service as secretary of the Publicity Committee for the Centennial Celebration has accepted a call to the pastorate of the church at Hampton, Virginia, and is already at work in his new field. Mr. Jayne is a graduate of Transylvania University and has been for the last ten years pastor of one church. In addition to his preaching, Mr. Jayne has written extensively for the Pittsburg papers, publishing in one of them a sermon each Sunday morning. With this fine record behind him, he and the church at Hampton look forward to many years of happy ministry together.

Nathan E. Corey and wife, Keokuk, Iowa, celebrated their fiftieth wedding anniversary March 19th, spending the forenoon with their son, where a number of guests were invited to dinner, and the afternoon in receiving callers at their own home. Mr. Corey has been pastor of many of the churches of the Disciples in Illinois, Iowa, and Missouri, and has received into the membership of the church over 7,000 persons. Mr. Corey has done his share of travel having visited Europe six different times. There are four sons of these good people still living, H. M. Corey lives in Chicago, and best known among the readers of our papers is A. E. Corey, Dean of the Union Bible College, Namkin, China. Mr. and Mrs. Corey are still in good health and have the promise of many days of happy and useful living.

To the surprise of his congregation, J. R. Perkins has resigned his pastorate of the West Side Church, San Francisco, and will return to the middle West when suitable occasion offers itself. Mr. Perkins was called from the church at Paris, Mo., to the church at Fresno, California, the largest group of Disciples on the coast, and from there he was called about a year ago to the West Side Church, San Francisco. The Church was unanimous in its desire that Mr. Perkins remain with them but personal plans for his life make it imperative that he accept a work in the Middle West, preferably in Missouri. We have no doubt but that Mr. Perkins will have abundant opportunity to return to the state of his choice as soon as this desire is known.

The church at Lathrop, Mo., has purchased a new parsonage. It is a commodious house and will answer a very urgent need. The church raised $2,000 as first payment. The offering for foreign missions thus far is over $85, the best in the history of the church.

The West Jefferson Street Church, Fort Wayne, Indiana, has under the leadership of their pastor, Earle Marion Todd, adopted a systematic plan by which they will hereafter make their offering to all missionary purposes. Their plan is to create a "Fund for Missions and Benevolences." Subscriptions for this fund are solicited from members of the church and the congregation, and are payable the first Sunday in each month. A Church Missionary committee is appointed each year which is to recommend to the church annually the amount that should be appropriated from this fund for different missionary interests. A secretary and treasurer of the fund keeps an account with each contributor, and issues regular statements. This fund for the present year is to be divided between the following interests: F. C. M. S.; A. C. M. S.; State Work; Church Extension; Benevolent Association; Ministerial Relief; Local Charities; and Church Federation.

John L. Brandt and wife in their tour around the world, are now in Japan, whence they go to China, India, and Burmah, before entering the Mediterranean. Of the progress of the Kingdom in Japan, Mr. Brandt writes: "There is a gradual zut sure change going on that means a complete transformation of religion. The missionaries have done great work, but it is only a beginning. All are hopeful. The prejudices against the Christians are rapidly disappearing, and the principles of Christianity are better understood than ever before. The scriptures are being studied by many students who have never been in a mission school. The statesmen are studying the Bible and every where one can see the benign influence of Christianity. With the wide spread study and use of the English language has gone the many benefits of our civilization. Now is the time to sow the good seed. What is done today will count immeasureably for the future."

"The Breadwinners Bible Class," taught

J. W. Marshall, evangelist, is holding a meeting at Waterloo, Iowa.

The church at Leston, Mo., is making plans for a new house to be built this coming summer.

Dr. W. E. Macklin and family of Nankin, China, sail for America next month for a six months' furlough.

J. M. Helms has resigned at Lawrenceburg, Ind., to care for certain business interests at Parkersburg, W. Va.

W. B. Crewdson leaves Corning, Iowa, the first of April for a pastorate in North Dakota.

Dr. W. N. Lemmon, Greenville, Texas, will soon go to the Philippine Islands as a missionary.

The congregation of the University Place Church at Urbana, Ill., is planning extensive improvements on its property this year.

Fine progress is now being made on the new building of the First Church, East St. Louis, Ill. The building will cost when complete $30,000.00.

President Miner Lee Bates, Hiram College, recently visited Warren, Ohio, occupying the pulpit of the First Church both morning and evening.

The church at Healdsburg, California has called M. S. Johnson to become its pastor and he will enter upon his work early in April.

The church at Pendleton, Oregon, has just completed its thirty thousand dollar building which replaces the fram building destroyed by fire in 1908. The building was dedicated March 20.

Miss Katherine Ruckner of Somerset, Ky., reached Tokyo from Kyoto Jan. 14. Miss Rucker is an artist and will spend some time in Tokyo studying Japanese art. She is living with Miss Miller.

The Sheffield Ave., Church, Chicago has reduced its indebtedness to $2,500.00 and is facing the future with courage strong. W. F. Shaw, the pastor, has been a faithful leader of this church in its fight against great odds.

W. M. Vories who has been doing independent mission work in Japan since 1907, supporting himself by teaching English and by doing architectural work, is on his way to America to secure funds for erecting suitable building for his work. Some of the rope-holders of the Yotsuya Mission are also helping Mr. Vories. It is a deserving work.

Nelson Hastings Trimble, pastor of the Metropolitan Church, Chicago, has announced on an attractive calendar a series of Sunday evening sermons, "To Young Men and Other Folk." The following are the subjects: "The Man Who Was First," "The Man Who Wanted Vision," "The Man Who Stuck to It," "The Man Who did Nothing," "The Man Who Obeyed," "The Man Who Refused," "The Man Who Chose Best." In this calendar Mr. Trimble shows ability in advertising, in such a way as to command the attention of the community.

We have received the program of the dedicatory services of the Magnolia Avenue Church, Fort Worth, Texas, which was held, March 27. Edward McShane Waits is the pastor. The service began at 10:45 a. m., with the sermon by F. M. Rains, Cincinnati. In the dedicatory ceremony the church used a service prepared by Robert J. Burdette, and adapted by the pastor to the particular field. The music used on the occasions was by the best composers. In the afternoon was held a fraternal service in which the pastors of the various churches of the community were represented.

Yet Another Kansas City Church

And One of the Fairest in the Brotherhood

The Linwood Boulevard Christian Church was started about twenty-five years ago as a mission Sunday-school over a store room on Holmes street, Kansas City, Mo. This Sunday-school was organized by a class of boys in the Sunday-school of the old First Christian Church, Eleventh and Locust streets, of which T. P. Haley was pastor. Miss Ellen Hackett taught this class, and a number of men, now preaching in various parts of our brotherhood, were members of this class, among them the present pastor of the Linwood Church, Burris A Jenkins. He was present at the first session of this Sunday-school. After a while a church organization was formed and a building erected at the corner of Thirty-first and Charlotte streets. For a long time the church was called the Springfield Avenue Christian Church. Brothers Gilham and Jinnett were the first two pastors. When Dr. Haley resigned his work at the First Christian Church, he went out to this little Springfield Avenue Church and preached for them without remuneration for a good many years, until finally about six years ago the church purchased ground and built a foundation at the corner of Linwood boulevard and Forest avenue, removing to this basement as their place of worship. Dr. Haley, on account of his advanced age, resigned his work and suggested the name of Dr. Jenkins as his successor. Two years ago last fall he was called and accepted the work, with a membership of about 550.

On December 26, 1909, the completed edifice was dedicated by Drs. Haley and Jenkins together. The total cost of the building was $132,000 including a $10,000 pipe organ, which is the finest in the city. $25,000 was raised on dedication day to pay off the floating indebtedness on the structure. A bond issue of $50,000 yet remains to be taken care of, though this issue was made for ten years.

Dr. Charles Reign Scoville has just closed a meeting with this congregation by which over 300 have been added to the church roll and something like 400 to this and other churches combined. The congregation now numbers about 1,100; the Sunday-school on last Sunday reached 644. The church has the usual departments and organizations, all of them healthy and vigorous. Since the close of Dr. Scoville's work about $1,700 has been subscribed to the current expense fund of the congregation. The official board has voted to become a living link for foreign missions. It has already been, for several years, a living link in the home work and everything looks bright for the future work of the church.

LINWOOD BOULEVARD CHURCH.

"The World"s Cry"

By S. W. Traum.

"For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together (with us) until now," says Paul. Creation has "an earnest expectation," and this waits on "the revealing of the sons of God." Not, as I take it, that the sons shall be revealed, so much as it is a revealing by the sons of God. Creation groans and travails, and its cry is inarticulate, but it is the "glory of the sons of God" to interpret that cry, and to give it answer. Creation's abasement was through no will of its own, but through the will of him who subjected it, that in hope deliverance should be given from this "bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the children of God."

When Paul says "and in like manner the Spirit also helpeth our infirmity," speaking for us when we cannot speak for ourselves, the argument is that we perform a like office for the world. If we walk in the light, we speak as those who thus walk. Our advantage over the world is our new view-point. The God whom others ignorantly worship we declare. The Spirit works in us and through us to the salvation of the world. If in the progress of the world's redemption there is delay, we must know what causes it. It is a hurt world with which we are dealing, and its cry ascends to heaven. But the answer that God gives is through us.

A deputation of disciples once came from John to Jesus to inquire as to his ability to make good in healing the world's diseases and dispelling its distempers, and assuaging its pain. "Art thou he that should come or look we for another?" John's cry is the analogue of the world's cry. The world yet wants to know whether in the midst of this new world in which we live Jesus is sufficient. For reply we must have the "revealing of the sons of God," just as Jesus in his reply to John "revealed the Son of God." The world needs that message, and care must be taken that it be not lost in the midst of the complexity of our mechanical contrivances by which we endeavor to carry on the Lord's work.

If in our day we are disposed to ask whether Jesus can make good, it surely is not an irrelevant question to ask, make good in what sense? Everything is in that question. Has not the world expected Jesus to make good in regions over which he has not assumed jurisdiction? Has there ever been a time that Jesus has not made good? May it not be that any disappointment known to the questioner has grown out of his mistaken notions as to what Jesus has come to accomplish? That Jesus understood John, and under the circumstances gave him the fittest reply, I have not the least doubt. And if we may judge from what Jesus said in reply, we may discover something of the difficulty that lay in John's way. John was looking for the Messianic reign, and doubtless measured it after the material splendor of earthly courts. But Jesus corrected this by indicating the kind of work that needed yet to be done to bring about that universal reign of God.

That vision of the kingdom of God the church has lost in the centuries that have intervened since the Lord ascended. As an institution, she has concerned herself with things less matter-of-fact than the present distresses of the world. She has pictured her Lord as having gone to glory, and drawing her imagery from the splendor and pomp of earthly courts, and adorning her speech with the phraseology of the twenty-fourth Psalm, and embellishing it withal with the first verse of "Coronation," has worked up quite a rhetorical effect. Her attitude has been that of contemplating the glories of the King at an almost immeasurable distance, and seeing that the ravages of sin continue cries out: "Is this he who should come, or look we for another?" The manifest answer to John would be (if we might paraphrase it): "Go tell John that I have not gone away. I am still here. There is a great work that I have to do. I am not content to rest in a supernal glory while my brothers, my kinsmen in the flesh, are bowed down with heavy loads. I am no sinecure, who seeks office for his own enrichment, but am come to serve. My scars will tell the story of my heart's supreme desire. On my way back to God, I must take my weaker brother. The halt and maimed, the blind and the lame, the lepers of body and of soul, I want to help. I am come not to be ministered unto but to minister. Go back and tell John that I am spending my days and nights in this kind of work. Tell him that."

If corrective we need in our estimate of the work of Jesus, or what is the same thing, of the work that Jesus would do through us, it must descend into particulars of just this type. Since the days of Christ's life on earth, but few species of oppression have become extinct. They are all here and life is still hard. The hedgerow work is still at a premium among the children of men. The symbol that best suits the age of the son of man is not the ecstasy that leads the dervish to fall down in frenzy, nor yet of the Musselman who can for hours sit and devoutly contemplate his navel, but a Christianity that is willing to spend and be spent in errands of mercy, inspired by a heart that loves and feels, and a mind that plans, and that is able to make a body render a service on purpose. I believe that there are people who can do this for Jesus who could not do it, for any other person in all the world. It is because this number is legion, and the hosts of Christ's servants increase daily that we are full of optimism. As we hear the world's cry, let us not alone give it the message, but the service; not alone say, but do it, and so will we accomplish the "revealing of the sons of God."

Follow the International Lesson Committee

Every informed Sunday-school worker desires to have the graded system introduced into his school. But it seems like too big an undertaking to grade the school all at once. Hence nothing at all is done, and the school goes on in the same old absurd way of teaching the children the lessons provided for grown-up people

The International S. S. Committee has made it possible to bring the graded system in, like the Kingdom of God comes, "without observation." You can have your school graded without any agony—almost without knowing it, except in its beneficent results. Begin at the bottom now—with the elementary grades, the pupils under twelve years old. Provide teachers and pupils with the Bethany Graded Lessons, based on the outlines already authorized by the International Committee. Later on—perhaps in nine month or a year from now—when the Committee authorizes an outline of lessons for the Intermediate grades you will be ready to adopt them and the Bethany Series will be ready with the helps for you. And so on, through the Senior and Advanced grades, follow the International Committee and as fast as they provide the lessons you will be ready to adopt them.

Our advice to all schools, then, is: FOLLOW THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE. No independent course yet devised is better than that provided by the International Committee, if indeed there is one so good in all respects. Besides, there is advantage in the whole Sunday-school world studying together when our leaders really lead—as the International Committee is now doing.

The Bethany Graded Lessons may be commenced at any time. Purchase the main bulk of your supplies wherever you wish, but let us furnish you these fascinating lessons for your pupils under twelve. THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO., 700 East Fortieth Street, Chicago.

Notes from Paducah, Ky.

The writer closed his work in Fulton, Mo., the middle of December last, and began work at once with the First Christian Church in Paducah. He found a church property worth about $45,000, centrally located, in the very heart of the fifth city in Kentucky with 30,000 inhabitants. The church has an auditorium which seats 1,100 people, the largest and most beautiful in the city, Sunday school room, class rooms, dining room, etc., well equipped in every way for modern, aggressive church work. The membership of the church is about 350, among the best and most consecrated people of the city.

ciples have two other congregations. The Tenth Street Church is ministered to by G. D. Wyatt, who accepted the pastorate January 1. This congregation has a membership of about 200. It is one of the most aggressive religious bodies in the city. A new church home is needed and a movement is now on foot to build a $15,000 church. The church on Goebel Ave. has 130 members. H. M. Philips is their minister.

These three months of service with the church, where George E. Flower and W. H. Pinkerton spent possibly the most fruitful and happy years of their ministries, have been months of accomplishments beyond our most sanguine expectations. The church board decided to use the individual envelope system for current expenses and this was installed the first of the year. The plan is always successful, for it is the reasonable, scriptural and convenient way of raising the church finances. The Ladies' Furnishing Society presented the church with a very handsome individual communion service. Some needed improvements have been made on the church property. The Bible school has grown steadily, with E. B. Bell as superintendent. A number of members of the church have adopted tithing as the minimum measure of their financial obligations to God. Twenty persons have been added to the church.

Our great achievement has been in making the church a living link in the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. This church has not been recognized as one of our great missionary churches. There has not been so much antagonism to missions as the spirit of indifference, due largely to the fact that the church has had heavy financial obligations at home to meet. Previous to the offering, for a month a campaign of education on missions was waged. The climax of the campaign was reached in a visit from Stephen J. Corey. He spoke on Sunday, March 6, on "How the Missionaries Work" and "The Accomplishments of Missions during the Past Century." On Monday evening, March 7, a banquet was given, under auspices of the men's Bible class, prepared and served by the Ladies' Furnishing Society, to 100 men. The ladies gratuitously provided the banquet, which was pronounced by all the most beautiful and bountiful which they had ever enjoyed. J. C. Utterback was toastmaster, C. C. Grassham spoke on "The Bible School the Basis of Christian Citizenship." George C. Wallace on "Reducing the Church Debt," Dr. I. B. Howell on "The Elements of Success." The closing address was made by Brother Corey on "Men and Missions." That week pastoral letters were sent to the membership and each member provided with a collection envelope with name written thereon. The following Sunday at the close of the sermon, without any begging or soliciting amounts, the baskets were passed. The count showed that we were a living link. This was six times the apportionment and sixteen times the amount given last year. One of the leading church officers said that he had been giving $10 a year to foreign missions from a sense of duty wth absolutely no interest in the enterprise, but that now he had a new vision of it, a new interest in it, a new sense of obligation toward it. This year he gave $50. The experience of this man was the experience of many others. I have never found a more responsive people than the members of the church here.

We have a church debt of $8,000. We shall reduce the debt this year $1,000, and possibly $2,000. Before any pledges are taken the Ladies' Furnishing Society agrees to give $500.00 and possibly more on the debt this year. Two of the elders, Bros. H. C. Overbey and George C. Wallace agree to give $100.00 each of every $1,000 raised. The church debt is not a burden now and we hope to do more for Missions than ever before. As the pastor I have suggested three ambitions of mine for the congregation, viz., to make the church an evangelistic church, and certainly in a city like this there are the opportunities, to make it missionary in spirit and in service, and to emphasize the teaching function and thereby build up a large Sunday School. We have seen "the hand of the Lord" with us thus far and our faith guarantees its continuance.

W. A. FITE.

The Appeal of the American Board

The Disciples of Christ stand at the threshold of their second century. Under His guidance we have become a great host which no man can number. Generous critics among our religious neighbors credit us with having changed the thought and practice of all religious bodies in America. Sects and denominations still remain, but the spirit which creates and maintains them has undergone great change. A host of leaders in all the bodies are of one heart and one soul with us in our plea for CHRISTIAN UNION ON THE NEW TESTAMENT BASIS. Party walls are fast crumbling, and the sheep will ere long be of but "one flock, one Shepherd." The great historic creeds, works of genius and piety, have lost both their significance and power. Our first century has taught both church and world that to hold fast to Christ is enough. ONE CHRIST, ONE BOOK, ONE CHURCH, IN ORDER TO ONE REDEEMED HUMANITY, represents the best thought and prayer of our age. For "our plea," " 'Tis daybreak everywhere."

The American Christian Missionary Society stands on the threshold of its seventh decade. To have come through sixty years' warfare and work argues its fitness to survive in order to more work. From weakness which was all but inanition, the Society has waxed lusty and boasts a multitude of friends. The churches it planted and cultivated to the point of self-support are the greatest of our brotherhood, and are numbered by thousands. But frontiers and foreigners, cities and sects, mountaineers, Mormons, and the millions away from Christ, call more loudly for our aid now than ever. About two-thirds of the American population are unchurched. It is at once our privilege and duty to give them the Gospel of the grace of God. The Society can do no more without larger means. We beg and bombard, we beseech and besiege individuals and congregations for the money with which to enlarge our work. A thousand importuning and deserving bands of brethren appeal in vain to us annually for aid. We can help hardly one in ten making application. Scores of groups of Disciples in cities, towns, and on frontiers dissolve annually and are lost in the rush of the world or swallowed up by vigorous denominations because our people fail to provide an adequate Home Mission fund. In countless places our chance is lost beyond recovery.

How long shall these conditions obtain? How long shall this Board say "no," because our appeal has fallen upon leaden ears or hearts? We have done our best to get more money; we are proud of what we have done with small means. When will you enlarge our means? When will you enable us to do our part in American evangelization?

Announcement Extraordinary

The Crescendo Compaign for American Missions.

Pursuant to its policy of publicity, the American Christian Missionary Society announces to all the churches its plan of campaign for the May offering. In order to relate the A. C. M. S., vitally and effectually to all the churches, a large campaign committee has been appointed, representing the entire country. Each missionary district in the states of our strength, and each of the other states, has a member of this committee. This committeeman has charge of the campaign in behalf of American Missions in his district. His work will be to act as our agent, interviewing pastors and elders, soliciting from them the pledged fealty to this great basic enterprise of the Disciples of Christ; arranging for addresses, conferences, and in every way developing an interest among the churches in the May offering. Through these men every church will be reached with an appeal from the A. C. M. S. We entreat the pastors and leaders in church activities everywhere to receive these men graciously, both on their own account and for their work's sake, coöperating with them and us, and thus making this the greatest year in the history of general home missions.

GRANT K. LEWIS,
I. N. MCCASH, Secretaries.

Notes from the Foreign Society

Our school for native evangelists at Nankin is gaining a splendid reputation among the similar schools in China. A. E. Cory is in charge of the work and is training a large group of young men for the native ministry.

The new church building in Vigan, Philippine Islands, was recently dedicated. It is the largest Protestant building north of Manila and well fitted for our strong work there. There was great enthusiasm on dedication day. At night the Catholics vigorously stoned the roof of the building, but the day was a great success and full of joy.

Our people should have their full quota of 135 at the great Men's Missionary Congress to be held in Chicago May 3-6. If you can go please report to the Foreign Society.

Our preachers and men who are near should not fail to attend the great Laymen's Missionary conventions at Davenport, Iowa, April 1-3; Peoria, Ill., April 7-10; Indianapolis, Ind., April 12-14; St. Paul, April 26-28, and Chicago, April 29 to May 2. This last convention will come just before the Men's Missionary Congress at Chicago.

There are about two hundred in the great mission study class in Hiram, conducted by Professor C. T. Paul.

First Church becomes living link. Northside and South Omaha combined, become diving link.—J. M. Kersey, H. J. Kirchstein and E. A. Jordan, Omaha, Neb.

Great and enthusiastic offering this morning in our East End Church. Final amount will probably reach more than one thousand dollars, may reach twelve hundred. This would mean $4 per member. Nearly everyone gave something. The missionary idea pushes up the dome of your head and extends the capacity of your heart.—John R. Ewers, East End, Pittsburg, Pa.

Mrs. P. A. Davey of Tokyo, Japan, reports that three young women were baptized on February 20, at the Koishikawa Church. They are gaining a greater interest from the younger women. The cooking and singing classes are a means of bringing them together and they are attending the church services more faithfully.

Professor K. Ishikawa, president of our Boys' Middle School and teacher in Drake Bible College, Tokyo, recently spent five days lecturing in Sendai district. His addresses on our Centennial Celebration and other things in the United States that impressed him were very interesting to the Japanese.

The church at Akita, Japan, has taken a forward step by deciding to become independent of mission support. The members of the church have assumed all the financial responsibilities connected with the church except half of the pastor's salary which the missionaries will pay for a while. The Akita church was the first church organized by our mission and it is but fitting that this church should be the first to take such a decided step forward. Two young men were baptized in Akita February 20.

The church at Nevada, Mo., enters the living link rank. They will probably reach $700. W. W. Burks is the pastor.

Though weighted by unfamiliar duties he found both time and means to alleviate the despair and suffering of the broken-hearted and disconsolate in Wakefield, Miss Abigail faithfully carrying out his plans. He stood almost alone in the Senate in his determined opposition of the trusts, and he was the butt of brutal ridicule, hated by the Lobby of the Corporations. One man can do little in the face of such combined, well-financed opposition, save stick stubbornly to his righteous principles and preserve his own self-respect.

Denver Doings

George B. Van Arsdall is making good at the Mother Church. Nine persons confessed Christ, Lord's Day, March 20. Forty-five have entered the fellowship of the church at the regular meetings of the congregation during the last two or three months. The missionary spirit is taking possession of the members. Brother Van Arsdall is preaching and making emphatic an altruistic gospel. The preaching is producing fruit. The offering for missions will be taken Easter Sunday. The indications are that the offering for foreign missions will be the largest in the history of this grand old church.

J. B. Horton of the East Side Church baptized two persons last Lord's Day. One other confessed Christ. Brother Horton is an active and influential member of the Philosophical Society, in Denver, an organization of wise men who go about with their pockets full of interrogation points! The new building of the Colorado Christian Home will be dedicated Easter Sunday. B. B. TYLER.

W. H. Pinkerton at Kenton, O.

W. H. Pinkerton of Kentucky, has just closed a three weeks' meeting in Kenton, where his brother, T. W. Pinkerton, is the pastor of the Church of Christ. Mr. A. L. Haley of Butler, Ind., assisted as singer in this meeting, proving himself a good chorus director and an effective soloist. His ability and high personal character won friends to him eveywhere. This is the third time that Evangelist Pinkerton has been with the church at Kenton, having been called there for the first time five years ago during the pastorate of C. C. Rowlison.

The active influence of Mr. Pinkerton's splendid preaching can not be estimated, even by the great number of those whom he leads to confess Christ. It must be said of him that he is among those most worthy to preach the gospel. N. L. MYERS.

Kentucky District Convention

The Kentucky churches are preparing for their annual district conventions. This year these conventions will be more comprehensive than at any previous time. They have formerly been devoted to the interests of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions and the Bible-schools. Provision has been made, however, for the cause of Christian Education and Kentucky State Missions to have special sessions this year. The varied program and the mighty interests to be presented make it imperative that the churches shall be well represented in the conventions. Every local church has already signified its hearty willingness to prepare for a much larger attendance of delegates than has been customary. The list of the dates follows: 18—Rochester, April 12, 13; 13—Stanton, April 15-17; 10—Stanford, April 19, 20; 8—Winchester, April 21, 22; 5—Harrodsburg, April 26, 27; 1—Clifton, Louisville, April 28, 29; 12—Eliza-ville, May 3, 4; 9—Central, Lexington, May 5, 6; 22——Princeton, May 10, 11; 23—Bardwell, May 12, 13; 21—Earlington, May 17, 18; 2—Leitchfield, May 19, 20; 20—Smith's Grove, May 24, 25; 3—Irish Bottom, May 27-29; 7—Dry Ridge, May 31-June 1; 6—Warsaw, June 2, 3; 11—Mt. Vernon, June 15, 16; 4—Dunnville, June 17-19; 16—Fullerton, June 24-26. State convention, Owensboro, September 19-23. ROBERT H. HOPKINS.

The Bethany Graded Sunday-School Lessons

Will the new Graded lessons make their way into the Sunday-schools and become the standard lessons of the Sunday-schools of the world as the Uniform lessons have done? There are many signs indicating that this is precisely what will happen.

1. All the authorities in religious pedagogy have been a long time agreed that it is better to suit the lesson to the learner than to compel the learner to adapt himself to the lesson, regardless of his stage of mental development.

2. The International Committee which has for thirty-five years selected the Uniform lessons has now begun the issue of an additional series called the International Graded Course, consisting, not of one Scripture lesson for the entire school, but of a separate series of lessons for each year or grade, chosen with direct reference to the age and ability of the pupils.

3. These lessons are being adopted by the best schools of all denominations. The Presbyterians report that about two thousand of their schools adopted the International Graded courses for children under twelve years, last quarter. This is phenomenal. The Methodists and Congregationalists had to go to press the second and third time to supply the unexpected demand for the graded lessons.

The New Christian Century Co. is supplying these lessons to the Disciples' schools. There is no single achievement in which the publishers of this paper take greater satisfaction than in connecting our schools with this most significant Sunday-school advance of the last fifty years.

The editors of The Christian Century, Mr. Morrison and Professor Willett, both regard the Graded principle as essential to the highest efficiency in religious instruction, and both believe that the Bethany Series is the truest, simplest and most artistic set of supplies for the elementary grades that has ever been put out.

Our pleasure in offering the Bethany Graded Lessons to the brotherhood is enhanced by the fact that our orders for supplies for the winter quarter have been much beyond our expectations. Many other schools have assured us of their purpose to adopt The Bethany Lessons at once. This series may be begun at any time. See full description on another page.

Trinity Church Tenements

In the past there has been much unfavorable criticism of the condition of tenement-house property belonging to Trinity Church, New York City. The report of an investigation conducted for the Tenement House Committee of the Charity Organization Society has just been made public. It presents conclusive evidence that the houses "are, in marked degree, better than they have been painted." A large majority were found in good condition—about sixty-two per cent of the whole number examined. Thirty-four per cent are buildings with some or many defects, while only fourteen are in bad condition Of these one has been demolished, and improvements have been made in others since the investigation was concluded. The inspection covered 334 houses, comprising 810 apartments, and included all the houses owned by Trinity Church and used as dwelling houses. Doctor Manning, the rector of Trinity, commenting on the report, says it shows "that we are doing our best to make things better. . . . . But the report is by no means final. We are going ahead with our work." Due recognition of such honest effort to meet its responsibilities in a creditable manner should now be as frankly accorded this ancient parish as it was previously vigorously blamed for its neglect.—The World Today.

An Unknown Tongue

Mr. Howard was a man of exceedingly few words. He positively disliked to talk, as an Indian dislikes to smile. One day he went into a music store to buy the music of an opera for his sister. The clerk came up, and to him Mr. Howard said in his quiet way:

"'Mikado' libretto."

The salesman frowned.

"What's that?" he asked.

"'Mikado' libretto," repeated the other.

"Me no speakee Italiano," said the clerk, shaking his head. Washington Sun.

The Mettle of the Ministry

The question of young men for the ministry is so impressive and of such significance for the churches that it seems worth while to give it frequent consideration. A short time since we raised the question as to whether there were not too many young men entering the ministry for the good of the work itself and the future of the church. It was then pointed out that the frequent defection from the work of preaching to other tasks indicates less that the ministry is losing its character as a desirable calling than that a considerable number of those who undertake it are unprepared both in character and disposition for the responsibility it imposes.

We are satisfied that the ministry is too much regarded as a soft snap by the young men of our generation. This has a double result. It attracts to the ministry many young men who are looking for easy work, with fair financial returns and good social position, and at the same time it deters that considerable body of young men who are of really aggressive and heroic mould, from taking up what appears to be a trivial and unmanly work.

That this impression of softness and ease in the work of the preacher is totally and inexcusably wrong we make no question. No one who puts into the tasks of an ambassador of Jesus the blood and nerve and passion demanded finds the work a sinecure. We are only speaking of the impression too likely to be made by features of the ministry that are thrust upon public attention.

For example, the impression prevails that a young man preparing for the ministry should be looked after, encouraged, endowed and coddled to a degree which has made the ministerial student too frequently a synonym for the cloistered and pampered child of luxury. No one, who is aware, questions the struggle that most ministerial students have to make to win through their college courses, to say nothing of those graduate studies that are now more than ever indispensable to the success of the servant of Jesus. It takes constant self-sacrifice on the part of a young man who is not endowed with a plentiful degree of this world's goods to secure for himself the training he knows his work will demand.

Therefore there has arisen in the church the feeling that ministerial students must be provided with funds, scholarships, gratuities, gifts, and tuitions, which are never thought of in the case of students preparing for other types of work. We seriously question whether this old plan of endowing ministerial edueation is not a serious handicap to the effectiveness of the individual and the standing of the entire group in the minds of observers. We are not saying that many ministerial students are not strong enough to resist the insidious and enervating effects of such gifts. We are only concerned to point out the serious detriment wrought in the cases of many, and the unquestioned resentment of other types of students against the entire system of gratuities for preachers.

There was a time when the preacher was treated as an object of charity by the entire community. His salary was low and his service was community service, so everybody took a hand in his support. The shoe-maker provided him with shoes, the grocer furnished some of his provisions without expense, the clothier reduced the price of his garments, and the stage coach driver chalked his hat in token that he was a free passenger. This was in a day when the local church could not very well pay a reasonable stipend, and everybody took his share in the effort to make up a living for the spiritual father of the place.

Conditions have radically changed today. When the minister consents to accept gratuities it is at the cost of manhood and standing. It is a fortunate thing that half-fare permits, and worse still, free travel, on the railroads have been abandoned in the case of ministers. It seemed a very small and not unreasonable thing to grant a minister reduction of fare in his railroad travel, considering the service he rendered the community. But it was perfectly evident to the thoughtful that the community itself had to make up the cost of this reduction to a particular class, and it finally decided that it was better that all should share in the reduction than that it should be limited to the favored few. Today this reproach against the ministry, that it accepts favors denied to other people, has largely passed away. To be sure there are ministers who still expect reductions on the prices paid for commodities, but their number is decreasing, and happily decreasing, annually.

Is not the same principle true as applied to ministerial education? Is there any reason why a ministerial student should receive free tuition, scholarships, and gifts, when students preparing for teaching or any other life work are compelled to pay the full price in every instance? The principle of the fellowship, where a student who is worthy of the honor performs actual service in compensation for money voted him to prosecute his studies, is above criticism. But this is a very different principle from that of the gratuities with which some theological seminaries and divinity schools go out into the field to buy students to pursue their courses. It is no reflection on the strong men who are working under these handicaps to say that some considerable section of the ministerial student body of the present time has been induced to take up that work through the inducements offered by theological schools, and will either turn away from the ministry after the educational work is completed, or will contribute permanently a secondary type of service to the work of the church.

It is our definite conviction that all gratuities to ministerial students which cannot be justified on the basis of exacting work performed, precisely as with the fellowships granted to all other students, should be abolished, and that the ministry would instantly show the advantageous effects of such a change. We know all the arguments that are used in support of the gratuity system, but we believe that they are more than overborne by the conditions which the ministry today presents. The work of a servant of Jesus Christ is not an easy one. It is not greatly remunerated; it has many hardships; it calls for definite and persistent self-sacrifice. But in these facts lies its chief value and its strongest appeal to the heroic and purposeful young men of the present day.

Why is it that many of the strongest of our young men are ready to volunteer for the life-long hardships and self-denials of the foreign fields, while they turn away from what seems to them the comparatively easy activities of the ministry at home? It is because the heroic note of self-denial is not sufficiently struck in the appeal which the ministry makes to the young manhood of our day. There is as much chivalry in the spirit of the youth of the twentieth century as was to be found in the Round Table of King Arthur, and those callings that promise high and purposeful adventure win the regard of young men of heroic type. Why should not the ministry make this appeal? It can only do so when it disengages itself from the semblance of hesitancy, timidity, disinclination and dread of hardship, and accepts with high courage the splendid and self-sacrificing work for which the cross of Christ must ever stand.

In Congress Assembled

"My only criticism of this Congress is that there is such a fine Christian spirit here that we seem not to be able to get up a live discussion. Won't somebody please start something!" These were the half-impatient, half-humorous words with which Acting-President Allan B. Philputt tried to spur the delegates at the Bloomington Congress to fill up the time assigned in the program to "general discussion."

But he said this before Errett Gates had read his paper on "The Increasing Faith of Present Day Religious Thought," a good share of which we are giving our readers in this issue of The Christian Century. With the presentation of this paper everybody wanted to talk.

The lack of talk in the other sessions, however, must not be taken as a measure of interest manifested in the congress. It was a deeply interesting program. Rarely, if ever, has so high a level been maintained by all the lecturers and reviewers as in this Eleventh Annual Congress. From the opening session when Professor E. S. Ames of Chicago spoke on "Education and Initiative" to the closing session when President R. H. Crossfield of Transylvania University spoke on "The Educational Problem of the Disciples" there was hardly a dull moment.

The Kirkwood Avenue Church of Bloomington, Ind., was host to the Congress. This is one of the best churches in Indiana or any state. With twelve hundred members they find their chief glory not in their numerical strength, but in the character of their ideals and the quality of their service. Fourteen years of pastoral leadership by the sweet-spirited Rev. T. J. Clark put the church into helpful relationship with every civic and moral interest of the community. With the coming of Rev. J. C. Todd a year and a half ago, the conservation of the ideals of his predecessor was assured, and new paths of progress opened up. Mr. Todd's people characterize him laconically. "He's just genuine," they say. And that is the way he impressed the "congressional" visitors. Unassuming, unselfish, thoughtful, easily approached—he gets his work done noiselessly. Through his teaching style he is drawing from 250 to 300 students of the state university to the services constantly and commending Christ's gospel to them in terms of their own life and thought.

It was somewhat regrettable that the Congress came during the Spring recess in the university. The visitors would have greatly enjoyed attending assembly sessions of the students, and, no doubt, certain papers on the Congress program would have drawn many students had they been in town. Our contact with the university was made through Professor E. H. Lindley, who read a paper at the Congress and attended most of the sessions, occasionally taking part in the general discussion. Professor Lindley is head of the department of Philosophy and Psychology. He read a paper on "The Psychology of the New Thought Movement." It was pronounced by members of the Congress one of the most lucid statements they had ever heard. The various types of so-called "New Thought" were examined in a survey of the whole field. Its pervasive influence through organization and through current literature was traced. The speaker held that the phenomena of healing common to the various cults were traceable to a common psychological principle—the law of suggestion. How this principle operates in mental life was described by means of vivid illustration. Professor Lindley developed a point of view from which such cults as Christian Science may be sympathetically regarded for the good that is in them, while their inevitable mischief in social and spiritual life is laid bare.

We are a little ahead of our story of the Congress, however, for Professor Lindley's address came on Wednesday evening, while the program opened on Tuesday evening. Following Mr. Batman's address of welcome, which was responded to by President A. McLean, of the Foreign Society, in his characteristic fashion, the opening paper was presented by Professor E. S. Ames of the University of Chicago. "Theological Education and Initiative" was his theme. He pleaded for greater freedom of experimentation in the ministry. Science and practical enterprise must justify themselves by repeated experiment and re-examination. Why should the minister and the church be shut up to traditional and accepted dogmas and methods? "Could not the minister be more vital and important if he claimed less and took his place on the humbler level at the side of the scientist and the practical man? Sunday-school work especially in the sphere of the so-called teacher-training and adult Bible class work is a kind of patent process for the wide and easy diffusion of the more obvious and least significant facts of Biblical history. It affords a semblance of mental activity engaged upon religious matters, but it may leave one as remote from the great spiritual forces of religion as do the revolving prayer wheels of the Buddhist monks. Another device for the diffusion of uncritical ideas and unorganized emotion is the modern revival. Every one would agree that the successful evangelist has plenty of second rate initiative and audacity, but none suspects him of exercising any freedom of thought or any constructive power in reference to the fundamental concerns. Evangelism, like the press of color, takes the quick way of numbers and does not trouble about ideas or logic."

Wednesday forenoon proved a rich occasion. "Primitive Christianity and Christian Union" was the theme discussed by Rev. Alva W. Taylor, editor of the Social Survey department of The Christian Century. Mr. Taylor's paper was a distinct contribution to that rich literature of the Disciples of Christ on the primitive church. The abiding impression left by his paper is that the essential element in primitive Christianity is the mind of Christ—not a particular form of organization nor a particular formula of belief. Statements of faith will change as man grows. Changing social conditions will call for new machinery on the part of the church. But the constant element in Christianity is the mind of Christ, which is the spirit of loving service.

Rev. Edgar DeWitt Jones, of Bloomington, Ill., read a review of Mr. Taylor's paper that was a literary gem. This session revealed the growing sense among leaders of the Disciples that, after all, the unity of God's people will not be accomplished along lines of creedal agreement or correctness of organization, but along the line of Christlike service. When the church awakes to the immensity of its human problem it will quickly settle its technical differences on the basis of practical effectiveness in doing Christ's work.

The session of Wednesday afternoon brought forward a paper by Rev. W. S. Lockhart, of Fayetteville, Ark., and its review by Rev. O. W. Lawrence of Decatur, Ill., on the subject, "The Church and Men." Messrs. Macfarlane and Shellenberger of the Brotherhood officiary had conducted on the preceding Monday evening a men's meeting for the Bloomington church men. So there was electricity in the air when this session of the Congress opened. Mr. Lockhart diagramed the complex problem of the modern church, giving evidence of strong social sympathies. Mr. Lawrence discussed the practical problems of the new Brotherhood movement, and released a cyclone in Secretary Macfarlane when he asserted that the Brotherhood lacked "definiteness." Mr. Macfarlane and others replied to this assertion by citing the definite purport of the national constitution, together with testimony of the definite things undertaken and accomplished by local Brotherhoods. Finally Mr. Lawrence arose and made it clear that the definiteness which he said was lacking in the Brotherhood movement was a definiteness of ideal, not of task. There are many definite enough tasks for the Brotherhood, but as yet there has not been formulated a definite idea big enough to serve as a constant motive for the men of the churches. Dead Brotherhoods are scattered throughout the churches, Mr. Lawrence said, and it must be our purpose to avoid the multiplication of Brotherhoods which do not have in them adequate spiritual motive. With the work that the officers are doing Mr. Lawrence declared himself in complete accord. Their problem is big. Precedents are few. Room must be allowed for experiment.

Next day, Thursday, Dr. Gates read his paper. It provoked such a discussion as made the face of Chairman Philputt beam with satisfaction. "This is a Congress now," he said. Dr. W. T. Moore had arrived, and the chairman characterized him as a Congress all by himself! He and Rev. W. L. Hayden contended that Dr. Gates' so-called Modern Thought was centuries old, and had been refuted long ago. The reviewer of the paper, Rev. H. A. Denton, and the first speaker in the general discussion, Rev. J. M. Rudy, assumed that the paper denied the miracles and preached Pantheism, and both based their criticisms upon these assumptions. Others took part, speaking on the conception of God developed in the paper. We are glad to be able to give so large a portion of this paper to our readers this week and will take pleasure in extending the discussion beyond the circle of those who attended the Congress. If a reader of Dr. Gates' address is moved to say anything for or against, he may have the use of The Christian Century's weekly Congress, "Our Readers' Opinions" page.

"The Unification of our Missionary Interests" was discussed Thursday afternoon after an introduction of the subject by Chairman Philputt. Three alternative plans were proposed, (1) The merging of all our national organizations into one. (2) The merging of these organizations into two, with our entire set of Home interests in one and our entire set of Foreign interests in the other. (3) The merging of our organizations into three—Home, Foreign and Christian Woman's Board of Missions. We have not space to give a report in detail of either this "open parliament" or that on "The Brotherhood Publication Society," which was led by W. R. Warren, managing editor of the Christian-Evangelist. It must suffice to say that the consensus of opinion seemed to be concerning the first, that either unification or reduction to some simpler system of organization is both desirable and inevitable; and concerning the second, that the only vital thing the brotherhood will ask is that the paper shall really represent the brotherhood.

"The Disciples and the Educational Problem," a paper by President R. H. Crossfield, of Transylvania University, was a thoughtful and thorough organizing of the facts of our educational history in comparison with other religious bodies, and a comparison of denominational schools with non-denominational schools. An interesting discussion followed in which the plea of Mr. Crossfield was reinforced by speakers from the floor.

The report of the joint committee on the union of Baptist and Disciples' congresses reported favorably to the proposal to unite biennially. It seemed to be taken for granted by the delegates that there is an inevitable trend toward the union of Baptists and Disciples, and everywhere there was shown a disposition to do anything possible to promote it.

The officers chosen for the Disciples' Congress two years hence are: President, Rev. C. H. Winders, Indianapolis; Vice Presidents, Pres. R. H. Crossfield, Lexington, Prof. Elsworth Faris, Waco, Tex., and Rev. B. A. Abbott, Baltimore; Secretary, Rev. J. C. Todd, Bloomington, Ind.

The Congress is serving its place among the Disciples of Christ. It furnishes a free forum within which growing opinion may be tested as steel with steel. It is developing a spirit of tolerance and fairness among us that keeps us open constantly to the enrichment of all new truth which is ever breaking from the word of God.

Passages in the Psalms that Have Helped You

There are devout souls that make little use of the psalms but it can hardly be said that a disciple of Jesus is enjoying all his privileges if he does not frequently turn to the psalms for guidance in worship and for inspiration to holy living. The psalms help us to feel the need of God and they give assurance that God can be found by the pure in heart. They reflect the glory of the heavens and the beauty of the earth. In them the lonely exile cries out to God and the man of faith mocks at the evil intentions of the mighty. A passionate patriotism breathes through them. The sinner makes full acknowledgment of his guilt and the forgiven soul expresses gratitude for divine mercy. Joy and sorrow mingle in the psalms. Every mood of the soul is met by some word of this ancient book of worship.

In the one hundred and third psalm the frailty of man aand the never failing kindness of God are contrasted. It is one of the many passages of scripture in which the brevity and pathos of human life are celebrated. "He remembereth that we are dust." There is a dignity in the shorrt life of man becanse it is under the tender care of God. Faith in the mercy that is from everlasting to everlasting takes away the bitterness of death and reconciles man to his fate.

The theme of psalm 104 is the activity of Jehovah in creation and in providence. The universe as we see it is his creation. Every living thing depends upon him for the satisfaction of its wants. The inventiveness of the modern man causes him to forget at times his dependence upon God. He is prone to imagine that by his great wisdom he is the author of his own prosperity. He gets a little more of nature's bounty than the ancient man was able to get but he is not thereby rendered independent of nature. If he thinks he is, he ought to go to school to the Hebrew singers. They were nearer to the heart of things than the glib descriptions of popular science bring the modern man who thinks nothing was known in the former days.

"O Lord, how manifold are thy works!
In wisdom hast thou made them all:
The earth is full of thy riches."

Chicago Grog Sellers Testified

At the last moment the Chicago grog sellers succeeded in having the Anti-Saloon petition thrown out. Just what the Local Option forces will do is not decided at the time of this writing, but they will either resort to court action in an effort to compel the election commissioners to allow the vote, or will immediately begin a campaign for a vote at the next election.

The petition contained 74,026 names. This was 10,500 more signatures than was required on the petition. The saloonists claimed that fully one-half of them were not legal. The election commissioners sustained their claim in regard to 26,128 of the names and marked 3,620 others as "doubtful." If such a condition were found to exist in regard to a petition that had been circulated by saloon interests the public would not be at all surprised and would immediately conclude that it was a characteristic piece of liquor crookedness. But when the temperance people are so defeated the public suspects that there has either been a faulty law or a faulty ruling under the law.

What disfranchised these thousands from the right of petition on a legal matter? The ruling of the election commissioners that a "registered voter" must be a voter who is registered in the precinct in which he lives at the time he signed. This means that every qualified voter who moved across a precinct line in the annual May change of flats is not a qualified petitioner. "Registered voter," then, does not necessarily mean qualified voter. The fact that there has been no chance to register does not remove this fictitious disability, and the man who has a right to vote on a question has not the right to ask for the right to cast a vote on it. If it is a lawful ruling it is manifestly not a common sense one, and the dictum that that interpretation of the law should obtain which is most nearly the dictate of common sense and equity does not obtain.

Many jokers signed the petition, but not thousands. Some signatures would be found that were not yet qualified from the fact that they never had registered in the city, though their first ballot could be cast in April. A few forgot and signed twice. But all these were not enough to invalidate the petition. It was invalidated by the ruling that a "registered voter" was not a voter who was registered, but one who had not moved into another precinct since he registered. This technicality saved the grog sellers from seeing the vote taken and they heaved a great sigh of relief.

The Anti-Saloon forces have not lost anything. The frenzied efforts of the barkeeps to prevent a vote show how much they feared it. They feared it not because they expected to be defeated at this election and compelled to close their saloons, but because of the moral effects of the great vote they felt sure would be registered against them. Their action has given the lie to their earlier professions that they welcomed a vote because their majority would be so great that the question would be closed up once and forever. Their terror has shown the power of the Anti-Saloon element. Their action has caused thousands who were mildly against the idea of closing all the saloons in the city to be disgusted at their cowardice. It has cost the brewers an immense amount of money and cheered the Local Option hosts to a mightier battle.

If only the whole moral force of the campaign can now be turned to the more politic effort of electing a legislature that will pass a county unit and residential option bill and thus allow the country counties to do as they have done in Ohio and Indiana, and the residential districts of the greater cities to wipe out the saloon, the victory will be colossal. It will be a much greater victory than to attempt to close all the saloons in Chicago before there is sufficient sentiment to properly enforce the law.

What Are the Actual Catholic Figures?

Our census gives the Catholics a total count of, in round numbers, 12,000,000. One statement is that the Director of Census deducted 15 per cent from their total to offset the number, under nine years of age, who have never taken communion. To put them on the basis of a fair consideration with Protestants, the percentage would have to be more than doubled, and the age of nine raised to that of twelve or thirteen. It is a better estimate to say that most children of twelve and under are counted ineligible to church membership. This, putting the Catholic total on the basis of a fair comparison with Protestants, would leave them only 9,000,000 members. If, then, the lines of voluntary professions were drawn as the Protestants draw them and only those counted who had a voluntary church membership or who would take one if they were compelled to face the same test as Protestants do, the numbers would be again greatly reduced.

In the general sense, there are about 13,000,000 Catholics in the country. Thus, if we have a population of 95,000,000, there are at least 80,000,000 who are Protestants in the same sense that the 13,000,000 are Catholics. But only 21,000,000 are assigned as Protestants. By the same method of accounting the Protestants would be given 68,000,000, and there is little doubt that a very large proportion of the nominal Protestant population goes to church about as often, contributes to the churches in some slight way at some time each year, and is about as genuinely Protestant as the great numbers of nominal Catholics are genuinely Catholic. The difference is that every Catholic born in the church is counted by the church without regard to his morality or his fealty to the church, while only those Protestants are enumerated who make open profession of their fealty to the organization and whose morality is approved by some church organization.

Protestant and Catholic Comparisons

It is often said that the Catholics set Protestants a good example in the matter of church attendance. The Catholics have one priest to every 600 members, the Protestants one minister to every 145 of their members. The Catholics have one church to every 1,000 members and the Protestants one to every 100 members. In the great cities the Catholics will have but one church to an average of from 4,000 to 5,000 members, while the Protestants will have one for from every 200 to 300. It will thus be seen why the former can fill their edifices for several masses on a Sunday, while the latter have seats to spare at most of their services. Whatever success there is in Catholic over Protestant church attendance is the success of unity over division. The Protestant minister perhaps cares for half as many souls on the average as the Catholic priest, for he does much for those nominal Protestants who send their children to his Sunday-school and attend his services intermittently, and the rest of his energy he wastes in duplicating the effort of his fellow pastor of a competing denomination in the same vicinity.

More Men in the Churches

The wail that men pay so little attention to the church is perhaps more the sign of an awakening and of a determined effort to bring men to church than it is of the fact that fewer men are interested than at former times. The estimates of the census show that of actual membership in the churches, forty-three out of every 100 are men.

The Congregationalists have been working at the problem and are increasing the proportion in their denomination. They say that up to 1890 only one-third of their membership were men. In the past year the increase has been more rapid than in the seven preceding years, and the men now number a total of 16,725 more than the old time one-third out of a total membership of 720,000.

The Catholics claim a larger proportion of men than do the Protestants. It is doubtful if they could lay just claim to as large a proportion if their members were reckoned, as are those of the Protestant bodies, by the number whose profession is indicated by a personal and purely voluntary moral test. Women greatly predominate at the confessionals. The most nominal Catholic will go to mass at least once a year when he lives among Catholic neighbors. It is quite as much by the constraint of custom as by volition and the priests exhort them to come to confession, bewailing their negligence just as Protestant pastors speak of the neglect of the church by men.

Many good men do not unite actively with churches. They contribute to charity and many other philanthropic causes that were once church cares, but are today functions of government or of public societies regardless of religious affiliation. Because the church is divided into sects she has lost many of her birth-rights, among them the privilege of administering public charity.

What Proportion Are Unchurched?

The total number given in the enumeration of church members is 33,000,000. If the total population has increased at the same ratio in the past ten years as in former decades, there are today about 95,000,000 people in the United States. One-fourth of these must be deducted as not eligible to church membership because of youth. This would leave but little over 71,000,000 eligible. If we put the Catholics in at 9,000,000, the actual number of church members would be 30,000,000, or more than 42 per cent of all. If the total population should be found to be only 90,000,000, then the percentage is raised to 45 per cent.

The question may well be asked about the quality of the membership of this 30,000,000. How many of them are merely nominal and really do little more for the church or live no more righteously than do a great number of those who claim no church membership. Such a test would doubtless apply to more than one-half the Catholic adult membership and to at least one-third of that claimed by the Protestant communions. In other words, if the church were to claim its membership on the Catholic basis of birth and nominal adherence to its tenets, the largest part of the entire population would be counted. If it were to apply strictly the canons of what Protestant membership ought to imply, the numbers would be cut at least one-third.

It is quite the custom for missionary workers to deduct the total number of actual Protestant church members from the total population and speak of the remainder as uncared for religiously. They will even count the five or six chief evangelical denominations only and dump all minor communions with Catholics and infants and even the children in their own families and Sunday-schools into the total of the "unchurched." It would be a good rule to at least deduct infants under four and add the enrollment in the Sunday-schools to the church membership before making the subtraction.

Was Cannonism Defeated?

Few have mourned the fall given Uncle Joe. Yet, unless much more is done, we have not unhorsed the grim old man. He fought like an old tiger until defeated and is not out of the fight yet by any means. He knows the resisting power of party fealty and counts upon it to win for his methods in the end. There are some real "insurgents" who voted to depose him, but the "near insurgents," those who listened tremblingly to the rumble from the home districts, and those who are at heart against the system, but who dread to break the party bonds of regularity, joined with the compromise faction of the "regulars" and kept the old man in his chair.

But even the deposition of Cannon is not the main thing to be achieved. Cannonism is not a thing of Cannon alone. It is the name fittingly applied to that species of partisan rule that comes to any party long and successfully in power. Uncle Joe gives it name in our time simply because fate has made him the head and mouthpiece of the thing. He has carried it into our governmental methods further than it has ever been done before, but he has not done it alone. He has done it as the acute and bold leader of a partisanship that has been unusually favored with long and powerful domination. If Cannon were deposed the situation would only be less aggravating in the measure that a less dominant individuality was put in his place. The system would still be in vogue and it is the system more than the Speaker that is at fault.

Was Cannonism defeated? It can scarcely be so affirmed. It does not break up the system to either leave the Speaker off the Rules Committee, or deprive him of the right to appoint it. That committee has just the same power it had before and can do just what the former committee did, if it so chooses. The same power that made and keeps Cannon Speaker can make and keep the new committee of the same kind. No power of the committee has been changed. The only thing done was to remove Uncle Joe from it and change the method of selection. He still has power to appoint all other committees, and that is too great a power.

The Rural Church in America

A Study of the Church's Great Opportunity

By Vaughan Dabney

The condition of rural life in America is attracting attention as never before. Our papers and magazines are replete with information concerning dry farming, irrigation projects, and the wheat fields of the great northwest. We read of the prosperous farmer with his telephone and automobile, who sends his son away to an agricultural college; we follow with interest the work of the country life commission, appointed by former president Roosevelt; we discover that land shows and stock exhibits are common occurrences.

And as we note these signs, which indicate an awakening people, it is with chagrin that we discover the apparent inertitude of the country church. The farmer, disdaining the use of an antiquated plow, is content for the church to use the worn out implements of a preceding generation. His children must receive instruction in schools and colleges of high rank, where they sit at the feet of trained and efficient teachers; yet in the rural Sunday school they are taught but little of the fundamentals of pedagogy. Training and organized adult classes are rare; missions, home and foreign, are neglected.

Who is to blame for this condition? It may be the city man, who, because of his absorption in his own problem, has neither the time nor the inclination to attempt the betterment of rural conditions. It may be the country man, who, becoming so engrossed in the erection of new barns and the installation of better equipment, has for a season neglected the interests of the kingdom. But whoever may be to blame, it is evident that this question is of vital import and merits the earnest consideration of every one—whether he be citizen of "no mean city" or an inhabitant of a country town.

Exodus from Country to City.

Probably we can best determine the importance of this subject by a brief review of a much discussed topic, which deals with the exodus from the country to the city. Those on the affirmative side of the question present plausible arguments and bring to light many facts worthy of our close scrutiny. The population of America a century and a half ago was largely rural; in fact, over 93 per cent of the population of the colonies lived in the country. John Fiske states that when Jefferson entered William and Mary's College in 1760—but a lad of seventeen—that he had never seen as many as a dozen houses grouped. And the condition a half century later was but little changed. For in the beginning of the nineteenth century when Virginia possessed one-sixth of the population of the United States, her largest cities were Norfolk, with 6,926, and Richmond, with 5,737. In the entire north there were but six cities that had a population of over 8,000. But the passing of another hundred years shows a marked change, for at the beginning of the twentieth century there were in the United States 517 cities having more than 8,000 inhabitants. The cities of Maine, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New York, Maryland and Illinois in the decade preceding the year 1890 gained 2,509,00, while the country lost 200,000 of its population. In the year 1880 the committee on agriculture and immigration for New Hampshire reported 1,442 vacant and abandoned farms; while the ninth annual report of the bureau of labor statistics for Michigan shows that in the above mentioned state there were 7,419 less farms inhabited in 1890 than a decade previous. In brief, out of forty states of 25,746 townships, 10,003 lost in population during the years intervening between 1880-1890. And the affirmatives, besides calling our attention to the fact that the last census shows two-fifths of our population are inhabitants of our large towns and cities, predict that when the report of the next census is made, about one-half of the people will be urban inhabitants.

Granting that these arguments are true, and agreeing to their prediction that ere long one half of our population can be found in our towns of over 8,000, it causes one to feel all the more anxious concerning the efficacy of the country church. It is to the advantage of the city resident that a clean type of manhood should reside in his midst. Men, moral men, child-like in their faith, untiring in their zeal and patience, have ever advanced the best interests of the cities. Yet they are all too few; and woe to our urban life if the incoming thousands have lost their faith in God, and forgotten their obligations to their fellow man! The rural church has an excellent opportunity to demonstrate her usefulness to the world, and prove her right to an existence by furnishing to the urban inhabitants a splendid type of manhood, which would fight with vigor for the speedy rectifying of existing evils. But at the present time it seems as though such an opportunity has not been grasped. Those familiar with the true state of affairs in the city, tell us that one of the most discouraging features of a city pastorate is the lack of interest the new inhabitant shows in church work. He becomes lost in the throng, and his indifference to things spiritual causes him to seldom gravitate toward the house of the Lord.

But the champions on the negative side of the question present equally convincing proofs. They admit that the cities are growing but point to their evident congestion and predict a speedy exodus. With the construction of interurban lines and the introduction of the telephone the farm makes no lonesome home. W. L. Anderson, in his book, "The Country Church," says that while the population of the United States fell from 96.6 per cent in 1790 to 66.9 per cent in 1900, it was because of rapid multiplication. On reading further we note that during the six decades preceding the year 1890 the increase of our population by reproduction varies from 14 per cent to 28 per cent. If Massachusetts had not received a single immigrant since 1830 and could have kept her people, at the beginning of the twentieth century she would have had only 225,000 people less than the statistics show. Under the same conditions, Connecticut would have passed her actual figures and had at least 222,000 in addition. New Hampshire could have reached her population and with her surplus of 500,000 have filled a Boston where Portsmouth now stands. In the words of the author, "If a Chinese wall had been built around New England, and no one escaped and their population grew, they could have provided for all the cities and furnished to Newport 1,500,000 people." The negatives claim that it is time for the pendulum to swing in the other direction, and consequently they prophesy a rush to the rural life.

Strategic Position of Country Church.

Now if those on the negative side are correct, and if in the near future a great throng will pour into the country districts, the condition of the country church is still a matter of great importance. For in her present condition, with preaching once or twice a month and manifest laxity in regard to systematic work, the church could hardly care for the increased population in an efficient manner. Our opinions relative to this question of an exodus from country to city may differ, but we certainly agree that the position occupied by the country church is a strategic one.

What is the condition of the average rural church. First let us notice the building—its appearance and construction. We know of a few handsome country churches; quite a number present an inviting appearance, but were it possible to strike an average we have our doubts about the cheerful aspect of the mean. From personal observation in many states of the union, and from an examination of photographs of rural houses of worship in several denominations, we conclude that the appearance of this average building would not be especially inviting. It would suffer in a comparison with the neat and attractive public school. And as to its construction, every one is aware of the unfitness of the building for efficient work. As yet the rural mind has not conceived of the church building as a useful work shop. In this structure of one large room, we find no separate class rooms; sections are not even curtained off; pandemonium reigns while the lesson is being taught.

But what of rural spiritual life? Are most of the inhabitants church members, and do they attend regularly? We hear much of the fidelity of the rural communicant. We say that the ringing of the church bell always summons a crowd. But an examination of facts tends to upset any such theories. Judging from statistics we must conclude that the country membership is small and interest on the wane. The Evangelical Alliance in the summer of 1890 investigated this matter in New England, and unearthed facts which caused no little surprise and dismay. They found from one fourth to one tenth of the population in the small towns and country districts at church on a pleasant Sunday. Less than 50 per cent said they were church members or attendants. In fifteen villages of about 2,000 population, only 23 per cent were church members. They found the services uninteresting and enthusiasm on the wane. It is a difficult matter to obtain accurate statistics from the various religious bodies relative to our theme, and we must be content with general statements. In the minutes of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church in the United States for 1909 we find expressions which may safely be said to indicate the true condition in the various denominations. We read that "about a year ago the attention of the committee was called to the possibilities of a simultaneous revival in rural communities. Emphasis was laid upon the fact that most churches in rural districts have lost heavily in the past two years." And it is fitting that the Disciples should take their condition more seriously. We are often too optimistic about our marvelous growth. One of our leading educators recently said, "Right now we are probably losing at the rear of the procession as fast as we are gaining at the front. While we are planting new churches, old churches are dying; while we are strengthening our stronger churches, our smaller churches are growing weaker." And again, in the report of our Centennial secretary we find these statements: "Many of our country churches in all states are actually losing in membership and in many instances are ceasing to exist." It is evident then that the condition of rural spiritual life, if measured by the strength of the church, is far from satisfactory.

Bitter Spirit of Sectarianism.

But there must be causes for these effects, and what are they? In the first place there is the bitter spirit of sectarianism so prevalent in rural communities. Federation is unknown, and any effort which tends toward the union of forces is chilled by the frost of indifference. One writer displays the true condition of affairs when he tersely says: "The churches have chosen to die in independence, rather than yield to a prudent consolidation. But the churches of Massachusetts are making an attempt to eliminate this cause. They have chosen an inter-denominational committee, and urged them to rectify such an apparent evil. This committee has divided the rural churches into three groups. There is the strong church, which is a help to the community. This is allowed to develop unhindered. There is the weak church, which is given material aid. There is the superfluous church, which is eradicated. Of course such attempts are by no means entirely successful, for they are not heartily received by all. Yet they are indications that the churches in that state are not ignoring their weaknesses, and are trying to bring about a better condition of things. Would that every state would make just such an attempt!

Again, individualism so rampant in the country hampers the progress of the church. It destroys the cohesion essential to a well-directed organization; it causes the church to become self centered. And because of its presence it is a difficult matter to carry out successfully a systematic program with a unity of forces. To overcome such a condition is no child's play. Individualism thrives when a more advanced state of agriculture prevails. Few farmers' clubs exist; sociological agencies are unknown. And yet the church to be true to her mission, must grapple with this problem; and her ministers and laymen should welcome any suggestions made by students of rural life. The suggestion of President Butterfield of the A. and M. College of Masschusetts is worthy of note. He tells us that only by a slow process of education can this cause be eradicated, and that it is the duty of the church to begin now to create public sentiment against individualism.

Country Church's Civic Function.

Then the rural church fails to realize its civic function. Graham Taylor indicates a three-fold civic function of the church in the small towns and country districts.

(1)) To have better ideals for country religious life. It is evident that the standard set by many of our country churches (and city churches as well) is too low. No distinction is drawn between the church and the kingdom. To obtain salvation one must only be enrolled on the church book. But with more teaching and less preaching these false ideals will gradually die away.

(2) To initiate agencies for realizing high ideals practically and progressively. Institutional work is needed as much, if not more, in the country as in the city. Few places of amusement and recreation can be found in the country, and such an action on the part of the church would accomplish great things. But care should be taken in choosing the methods to be employed. The warning of Professor Bailey of New York is worth heeding. He tells us that we need country institutions developed from the country viewpoint, rather than city institutions taken to the country. Good reading rooms and illustrated lectures on subjects of interest will be more beneficial to the rural inhabitant than swinging clubs and vaulting bars.

(3) To develop the spirit of sacrifice. This seems to be an unknown element in the rural church. The farmer, unlike the city man, is not accustomed to the daily expenditure of money, and consequently the rural church does not receive his hearty financial support. It is a burning shame that the well to do farmer gives so little to the work of the Lord. In the southern part of this state there are four members in a certain church that are worth $100,000 each, yet together they give only $100 to the church work. And this case is by no means exceptional. When the farmer learns to give liberally the future of the country church is assured.

The Call for Leaders.

But who is to lead the forces in this great campaign against the destroyers of the rural church life? Who will preach federation? Who will uplift these high ideals? Who will introduce institutional work? At first thought these questions seem superficial. But as we attempt to answer them we soon realize that we cannot find the men to lead the cause. But, as you say, what are our schools for? We have a goodly number of young men studying for the ministry, and so why be alarmed. That is true. We have our schools and our ministerial students, but how many of them are preparing to fill a country pulpit? How many of them are anxious to live in the country and pastor a rural flock? These are grave questions, and unless they are answered by the church she will continue to lose ground in the country districts. Young men are looking for the large city churches, and pass with scorn the country pastorate. It is sad to note that there is so great a number of old ministers in the country. Not that they are not able and godly men. Not that their wisdom and experience counts for naught. But the country as well as the city has a right to demand the services of young men—men full of optimism, and rejoicing in the strength of youth, who can successfully handle the rural problems. But who will go?—that is the question. One cannot be forced to take the rural pastorate; and if he could be forced his heart would not be in the work. We must have volunteers. Our brightest young men and women are volunteering to go to the foreign field. Why not have volunteer bands for the country work? This is the suggestion of many of our leading educators, and it should be acted upon by our various religious bodies in our land.

A MORE MODERN TYPE OF COUNTRY CHURCH.

Will the rural church develop and wax stronger as the years come and go? This is a natural question. When a great struggle is on, men are anxious to have some idea of the outcome. It is a dangerous thing to prophesy, but we believe that the rural church will triumph, and that right speedily. The farmer by nature is more pious than the city man. The leisure and solitude possessed by him favors mysticism, and "mysticism and the absence of social problems permits concentration upon individual relations. These two breed the revival fever." We are not here to discuss the results of revivals; but where can you find more apparent interest in spiritual affairs than at a country meeting? Rain or shine the farmer comes, over smooth turnpikes or in the mire of a dirt road. Family worship, too, is not neglected in the small towns and rural district, and there are few rural inhabitants who are really ignorant of the Word of God. Also the farmer is aware of the new methods of church work, and is anxious to have them applied in his locality. In some places modern church buildings are found, with the stables in the rear lighted by electricity.

And as the young men and women return to their rural abodes, from the colleges and universities, they will bring freshness and strength to the church life.

So the future looks bright. Though the problems are difficult they are capable of solution. Rural zeal is aroused; urban interest is excited, and soon a great step forward will be made. The night has been long, but the dawn is at hand. The laborers enter the harvest. The fields of waving grain fall before the sickle keen.

Scholarship's Increasing Faith

An Interpretation and Appreciation of Modern Religious Thought

By Errett Gates

Modern religious thought is constantly making its appeal to two principles: (1) The principle of reason, and (2) the principle of right; the one emphasizing the intellectual, the other the moral basis of modern thought. It would serve the same purpose, and mean practically the same thing for the present discussion if I spoke of these two principles as the principle of truth and the principle of goodness.

What I mean to indicate is that the modern religious man requires that his religion shall satisfy his rational and moral nature; and he is not deeply concerned to make it conform with the authoritative religious standards of the past. This is how the modern religious mind differs from the ancient; not that the modern is rational and moral, while the ancient was superstitious and immoral. That may be the way it appears to the modern mind. But the ancient believer believed his religious faith to be just as moral and rational as the modern believer. They were his convictions, and he was just as sure of rational grounds for them. Even what appear to us his superstitions were reasonable to him, and his immoralities, moral. Even his subordination of reason to revelation, and of faith to authority was reasonable, and he had the best of reasons for it. He frequently deceived himself and his authorities, as when Origen asserted his belief in the inspiration and infallibility of Scripture and then practiced the allegorical method of interpretation upon them. The ancients were just as jealous of the rights of reason as the moderns, but it was a reason according to the light that was in them.

Reason Always in Ascendant.

Neither did they hesitate when there was a conflict between reason and revelation to set aside revelation in favor of reason by one device or another.

We are greatly mistaken if we suppose that the early disciples of Jesus held their faith by a suppression of their reason. Jesus was just as reasonable to them as to us, but under the forms of the experience and rational canons of the time and place. It was reasonable then and natural, too, that there should be wonders in the heavens above, and signs on the earth beneath; blood and fire, and vapour and smoke; and that young men should see visions, and old men should dream dreams. Faith looked for them, and fed on them. It would have despaired without them. As Dr. Rowland says: "In the ages when men believed in voices, they heard them; when they disbelieve in them they hear them as heavenly voices no more." "A man who hears an unseen speaker nowadays does not answer, but goes to a nerve specialist; and if we all heard voices, we should consider ourselves mad, but not religious."

There is nothing new, therefore, in the appeal to reason. Men have never in any generation rested in an irrational faith,—a faith, in other words, that did not seem true according to the criterion of truth recognized and used by that generation. The criterion of religious truth in one generation may be visions and voices, healings and tongues; in another the satisfaction of the metaphysical intellect; in another the harmony of terms in an Aristotelian category; in another rational clearness, and universal validity; in another, agreement with moral intuition, or religious feeling, or human needs.

Paradoxical Indictment.

How paradoxical it seems that modern religious thought should be charged in the same indictment with rationalism and irrationalism. As a matter of fact it is less rationalistic, but not less reasonable than the older orthodoxy. The logic of the older was formal and metaphysical; that of the newer is real and empirical. That is why the older orthodoxy seems more logical. It is more logical; it is buttressed by a more imposing dialectic; it is logically answerable. And the modern answer to it is not a syllogism, but an insight; not a knock-down argument, but a human experience. "One thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see."

Logic ruled the mediaeval mind; life rules the modern mind. Permit a single example of the difference between the rule of logic and of life. The mediaeval church reasoned thus: It is better for a man to lose his body than his soul. Heresy is poison and death to the soul. If the heretic is allowed to live and propagate his heresy, he will destroy not only his own soul but the souls of many others. It is better, therefore, to put him to death; for the longer he lives and the wider he propagates his heresy, the more souls he will destroy, and the greater will be the burden of his guilt to be atoned for in Purgatory.

Many a good man was made an offering to such reasoning. It is good logic but bad life; praiseworthy end, but abhorrent means. The only answer of the modern religious mind to such logic is life. The whole consciousness of human feeling revolts against it. To the mediaeval mind a thing was true and right if it could be reasoned out satisfactorily in thought; to the modern mind a thing is true and right if it can be carried out satisfactorily in experience and action. The modern religious man gets no satisfaction out of hurting one of his kind, not even for the sake of supposed spiritual, future benefit.

I. The Modern Thought of God.

The modern man believes in an immanent deity; in more and not less God.

The change which has come over our thought of God has been necessitated by our new scientific knowledge, and our new ethical feeling.

Men's knowledge of the world has always been reflected in their conception of deity. The gods will be great or small, beneficent or vindictive, one or many, according as men understand or view the world. A new universe will mean a new deity; and that is what we have in the modern age. Instead of the universe of caprice and disorder we have one now of law and order. This was the first step in the change. Place was found for God in his universe, according to the mediaeval mind, only where there was magic and miracle. Disorder, mystery, and catastrophe meant to him the presence of the divine; law, regularity, and intelligence of nature's processes, meant to him the absence of the divine. When modern science reduced all to law and order, it eliminated God from any part in nature, and gave us the Deism of England, the Skepticism of France, and the Enlightenment of Germany. Orthodox theology thus adjusted itself to a transcendent, an extra-mundane deity. There is where religious thought began in the ancient Greek and Latin Churches, and there is where it remained until the present.

But science took a new step in the nineteenth century, and found that the universe was a growing universe. Instead of mechanical it was vital; instead of fixed, it was moving; instead of static it was kinetic. It nowhere yielded evidences of an instantaneous creation in time past, and gave no promise of completion in the future. Creation has always been going on, and we are the privileged spectators of a continuous creation.

Religion and a Transcendant God.

Religious thought was no longer able to rest in a transcendent deity. A universe which is alive and growing in every part at once, cannot be cared for by a God who sits off in space viewing the on-going of a wound-up machine. The cosmos of our latest knowledge concerning it, must have a God in whom circling worlds, growing nebulae, changing species, and the spirit of man can live, move and have their being. Nothing can satisfy it but the thought of

"A presence that disturbs me with the joy
Of elevated thoughts: a sense sublime
Of something far more deeply interfused,
Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
And the round ocean, and the living air,
And the blue sky, and the mind of man:
A motion and a spirit that impels
All thinking things, all objects of all thought,
And rolls through all things."

Is this more or less faith in God, a richer or a poorer faith—to believe in a God who is in the whole, or only in a part—in all events, or only in mighty revolutions; in all persons, or only in the Hebrew prophets; in all times, or only in ancient times?

The Hebrews had a richer faith than this poor mediaeval creed, for, as Professor Rauschenbusch declares: "They went to school with a living God who was then at work in his world, and not with a God who had acted long ago and put it down in a book." "It takes more faith to see God in the little beginnings than in the completed results; more faith to say that God is now working than to say that he will some day work."

It seems the most difficult thing in the world to get some men to believe in a present, living, indwelling God. They find it easy enough to believe in a God who lived and moved upon men in the past, or will move among men in the future; but the present seems to be abandoned by God, and one's own generation and life emptied of the divine. And all because there were no events that look like miracles!

God Must Be Moral.

The modern man believes in an ethical deity, as well as an immanent deity. He finds it impossible to believe in a God who is not as good as the best man he knows or can conceive.

"The wrong that pains my soul below
I dare not throne above,
I know not of his hate—I know
His goodness and his love."

The ethical has come to sovereignty in the ideals of the race, and it must be sovereign in the character and conduct of deity. We can part with every other attribute of the divine—with omniscience, omnipotence, and omnipresence—but not with goodness.

As Dr. Rowland says: "Rather no God than one who is not wholly good. The good character of God is for us all the essential part of God's character, and, arguing from analogy, very probably it is the first demand He makes of us. However much we may yearn for the love of our creator, I suppose the most despairing religious penitent would be less revolted by the scorn and wrath of a good God, than by the love of a bad one. The beauty of holiness has at least this charm for us: that whether we believe it to exist in God or in man, if a God exists at all, that must be his eternal attribute."

This is why the modern man turns away from so many Old Testament representations of God. They outrage both his reason and his moral sense. He refuses to believe that the God he worships in Jesus Christ commanded the heartless extermination of the Canaanites, or the spoliation of the Egyptians, or the Amalekites, or the slaughter of the priests of Baal. The condoned immoralities of Noah, Abraham, Jacob, and David he will not defend, he cannot defend, as expressions of the will of God, and every clever device for the explanation and justification of them as acts of God, whether the allegorical method of interpretation, or the covenant idea, or the principle of pedagogical accommodation, he repudiates as dishonest and temporizing. He is obliged to do so to keep his faith in God. It is because he wants to believe in the God of Jesus Christ, and wants this present generation to believe in him, that he rejects many of the stories of the Jehovah of Israel. He cannot believe in both.

Faith Unafraid of Science.

The most beneficent result that has come out of this modern movement is the peace which the modern man has in his religious faith. He does not fear the discoveries of science, for science herself, along with Scripture, has been his teacher, and a revelation of the nature of God. The scientists are his modern prophets, for each in his sphere—biologist, chemist, geologist, and astronomer—has been "thinking God's thoughts after Him."

Is it the result of more or less faith to be able to stand unafraid in the presence of learned research and critical inquiry and confess faith in the God and Father of Jesus Christ? Who believes most or least: he who denounces free inquiry and the higher learning as enemies of religion, and lives in the world in momentary dread of some discovery of science which will overthrow all faith; or he who rejoices in all the achievements of modern learning, and counts himself living in a world whose every disclosure is a new word of God? Is our religious faith going to the bad under the influence of the world's growing knowledge? Then we are of all men most miserable, we men who by a necessity of our nature must believe in the immanence and goodness of God, and by another necessity of our destiny must live in a world that nowhere expresses that immanence and goodness.

But that is the awful fate of the man who believes in a God who never comes into this world except to work a miracle, and never speaks to his children except in external ghostly appearances.

II. The Modern Thought of Christ.

Professor Harnack declares in his book on "What is Christianity?": "The most important step that was ever taken in the domain of Christian doctrine was when the Christian apologists at the beginning of the second century drew the equation: the Logos is Jesus Christ."

"It gave a metaphysical significance to an historical fact; it drew into the domain of cosmology and religious philosophy a person who had appeared in time and space."

As a rival in importance to this first great equation of the ancient world, I would place the last great equation of the modern world: the Ethical is the Divine. This is the highest reach of religious thought. It is the synthesis of twenty centuries of Christian experience. But it was also the highest word of Christian revelation: "God is love." This does not mean that he is love when he is not something else. That would be to say that God is merely loving. As much could be said of men or animals. But the affirmation of John is that the essential principle of deity is love; that he is never anything else. The essence of divine being is thus conceived as spiritual principle; not physical power; not metaphysical intelligence; but ethical nature.

This may be said to be the culmination of all revelation in Jesus Christ; the divine in human form. To this end was he born, and to this end came he into the world to bear witness to this truth. If it is so—that God is love—whoever loves shares the divine nature; and he that loves most is most God-like. The Incarnation does not look so difficult after all, nor the divinity of Christ so incredible.

Christ's Heavy Burden.

That was a heavy burden which the person of Christ had to bear when divinity was identified with physical power; scarcely less when it was identified with metaphysical intelligence. The one called for mighty miracles which Jesus found it difficult to supply, while the other called for a universal range of knowledge which Jesus nowhere claimed. But in the face of all the risks of such a crude supernaturalism, the earliest apologetics bound up the proof of the divine in Jesus with miraculous powers and prophetic wisdom. And he carried that impossible burden of proof until historical criticism and scientific discovery removed it, and ethical idealism reclothed him in the primitive robes of divinity, which he himself chose to wear.

This modern equation of religious thought—the ethical is the divine—has prepared the way for a new appreciation of Christ, a wider confession of his divinity, and a sounder apologetics.

The antagonists of the older orthodoxy prepared the minor premise for the new orthodoxy. Turn to such a "collection of impartial testimonies to the character of Christ" as Philip Schaff has brought together in his "Person of Christ." Read what all the noted skeptics have said, from Celsus to Renan. Goethe said, "I consider the gospels to be thoroughly genuine; for in them there is the effective reflection of a sublimity which emanated from the person of Christ; and this is as divine as ever the divine appeared on earth." "No matter how much the human mind may progress in intellectual culture, in the science of nature, in breadth and depth; it will never be able to rise above the elevation and moral culture of Christianity as it shines in the Gospels."

Carlyle said of Jesus: "Our divinest symbol. Higher has the human thought not yet reached."

Channing said: "In regard to miracles, I never had the least difficulty. The grand miracle, as has often been said, is the perfect, the divine character of Christ."

Strauss said: "He remains the highest model of religion within the reach of our thought; and no perfect piety is possible without his presence in the heart."

Renan said: "Whatever may be the surprises of the future, Jesus will never be surpassed."

Affirmations of Skepticism.

That is enough. What these older skeptics and unorthodox denied—that Jesus was "of the essence of the Father, God of God, and Light of Light, very God of very God, begotten not made, being of one substance with the Father"—very few orthodox think it necessary to affirm today. But what the older skepticism affirmed of Jesus—his moral greatness and his redemptive influence—is now taken as the middle term of the newer orthodoxy. Of all the surprises with which history presents us, none is more interesting than this. When Trinitarian theology was clamoring for so much from its enemies, it was securing all it could ultimately use.

This is how the argument runs:

(1) The ethical is the Divine.

(2) Jesus is the highest expression of the ethical ideal that has ever appeared in human form.

(3) Therefore Jesus is Divine, and if God has ever revealed himself to man, that revelation must have been made in Jesus.

But there was something in Jesus which has made all the difference between him and other teachers and prophets. That distinction was one of spiritual life. It was not what he said; it was what he did—the kind of life he lived, the kind of spirit he manifested. Others said things, but did not do them. What he said he did. His sayings were his doings; both together made a revelation of the divine nature. "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." This does not refer to his physical person, or his miraculous power, but to his moral nature. "The Father and I are one." Not one in substance, or in knowledge, or in power; but one in spirit and purpose: "for God is a Spirit."

Distinction in Love.

The uniqueness, the distinction, the greatness that belonged to him, was the kind of greatness he set before his disciples in the kingdom of God. He that would be greatest, let him be servant of all. "The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister and gave his life a ransom for many." He achieved the greatness before he described it to the disciples.

But it was a greatness into which every disciple could enter. He said, "Be ye perfect as your Father in heaven is perfect." It was a uniqueness which did not separate Jesus from man by a difference of nature, but by a difference of attainment. It was a separation between him and other men which lies between the ideal and the real, the complete and the incomplete, the perfect and imper-

A Great Missionary Achievement

Heartening Story of a Small Church's Unselfishness

By Richard W. Gentry

It is the purpose of the following lines to tell, as briefly and simply as possible, the story of an achievement. It seemed at first an impossible thing for the Hyde Park Church of Chicago to attempt—to send two trained missionaries abroad. This did indeed appear a staggering proposition for a church of one hundred and sixty members. And when, in addition, that church was situated in the heart of a great city where the church problem is most complex and difficult, where people all too often move on before the church has had time to win their loyalty, it seemed as if they were almost foolhardy who had given the plan its birth.

However, the dream had behind it some very vital realities. Mr. and Mrs. Guy Sarvis, both exceptionally well qualified people, were members of the Hyde Park Church and highly esteemed. Personally, they are attractive and convincing. Both are experienced. Mr. Sarvis was for two years a secretary of the Y. M. C. A. in Calcutta, India, and later traveled across the continent of Africa as companion and secretary to William Edgar Geil. Mrs. Sarvis, a sister of Rev. A. W. Taylor, of the Irving Park Church, Chicago, has had much experience in Y. W. C. A. and other religious work. Both were student volunteers. Both were graduates of Drake University and would be students of three years standing in the University of Chicago at the time of taking up this work. Mr. Sarvis has made Sociology and Ethics his specialty in the University and is splendidly equipped to take a position in the faculty of our college at Tokyo, Japan, or in Nankin, China. Mrs. Sarvis has been working in Domestic Science, Sanitation and other subjects which would fit her to do admirable work in the girls' school either at Tokyo or at Nankin.

Such is the character of the volunteers who were ready to sacrifice American comforts and surroundings of culture to go. Probably our foreign society never sent out two persons better equipped for work in the most strategic and far reaching of all missionary endeavor, namely, in education. The most vital missionary work of the future is certain to be that of the educator. The Orient desires the full measure of Western civilization, and the best medium for conveying this is the school. Moreover, the influence of teachers is broader than the class room. They are admitted into the inner circles of the country, and have a wonderful opportunity to influence life at its most sensitive points. Mr. and Mr. Sarvis were competent to take an active part in this statesmanship of missions as well as in the general social life and academic work of the school and the community.

On the other hand, there was the church. Many aspects of its life justified the undertaking of an ambitious plan. For a year it had had the services of both a minister and an assistant, and had generated enough activity to keep them both busy. Many trails had this little church blazed through the forest alone. It had worked out an effective financial system. Especially interesting was that portion of it known as the Chicago Fund, ramifying into the different worthy philanthropies of the great city. Recently it had reached that consummation in which churches find themselves most happy, a pledge list which more than covered its budget of expenses.

It had been among the leaders in the establishment of a church library. In one corner, beneath a bronze tablet inscribed in memory of Lillian White Grant, stood a large library of the very best and latest books that are published.

On Sunday mornings there met the Sunday-school. Ever had its two aims been—trained teachers and a scientific curriculum. The school was carefully graded, working up its material independently to fit the years and needs of the child, and seeking for its teachers men and women who were experts in their line.

The evening meetings of the men's club had been indeed true "experience meetings" in which with freedom and fearlessness the men had talked to their religious problems and helped one another to solve them. An order of "The Knights of King Arthur" for boys was proving so vital and attractive that it took energy and attention to direct its overflowing life. The constructive preaching from the pulpit was reaching more and more successfully those individuals who found no help in outworn dogmas and mediaeval catchphrases. Especially winning had it been of late with the young men of the college community.

Such was the teeming, vigorous activity which could be made to function in missionary channels. Those who were behind it and responsible for it felt that we had all this to give and much to get in return. Such an undertaking would identify our local church with the world-wide progress of modern Christian civilization in a way that would be incalculably beneficial. It would help the individuals and the country to which these friends would go; it would quicken our own interest and deepen our knowledge with reference to these world concerns; it would enlarge the meaning and value of our religious life; it would enable us to realize on a magnificent scale and in a most satisfying way the constructive and practical ideals of our faith; it would relate directly and effectively to many "home" problems which immigration and foreign relations are forcing upon our own American people and religious institutions.

The thing, talked over and yearned for, came spontaneously into life. The officers of the church at their regular meeting Feb. 6, unanimously authorized a letter requesting subscriptions. The undertaking was cordially endorsed by the Women's Missionary Auxiliary of the church. The first definite subscription of twenty-five dollars a year from our own active members was made by Mr. and Mrs. H. W. Caldwell. Mr. Geo. E. Scranton, of Philadelphia, on hearing of it, volunteered a subscription. Pledges began to come in slowly. One man said earnestly, "I want to think it over, and perhaps I'll give more." The days passed by and the pledges increased. A stenographer gave fifty dollars. A young man gave ten and joined the church the next Sunday. An individual who had delayed took the minister's breath for a moment by saying quietly, "I have decided to give a hundred dollars." Easter Sunday drew nigh. On that day success or failure was to be announced. At the opening of the final week it became apparent that the thing would be done and the hearts of the leaders sang. By Friday night preceding the Easter the twelve hundred dollars was reached. In the midst of the telling of it another pledge came over the phone. Others followed until the sum passed considerably beyond the mark.

Such is the history of the achievement. We are still close up to the recent events, too close for a good perspective. Has the church done a remarkable thing? Perhaps on reflection there are some of us who will feel that it is not so remarkable a thing for a church of such earnestness of purpose and largeness of vision.

RICHARD W. GENTRY, ASSISTANT MINISTER.

Our Readers' Opinions

An Open Letter to G. W. Gerwig

My Brother: Your painstaking write-up in the Christian Century of March 3 as teacher of Bellevue, Pa., men's Bible class, furnishes interesting and helpful data, accounting in part for the phenomenal development of this the largest men's Bible class in our brotherhood. The methods as you enumerate them, employed in bringing so great results are worthy the emulation of all—with a single exception, which will appear further on.

Writing of your recent "course of class entertainments," you say: "One of the most successful was its minstrel show." This forms the exception above noted—"the fly in the ointment," from my humble viewpoint. Out our way a "minstrel show" always means a burnt cork show. If, in addition, yours was given in your church building, that would appear more surprising still—for an evangelical people; even outdoing a certain Congregational club in a Chicago suburb, just now rehearsing for a minstrel performance to be enacted in a public hall, which fact may serve as a slight palliative.

Please understand me as being fully enrapport with every consistent effort to reach and hold the men. I was reading only today what a writer says of a large men's Bible class in another suburb of our city: "Many a man has been attracted to our class by first attending one of our social functions, and then joining our number." Granted that "talent" should be developed, and all that—on safe lines; but seriously, brother, would you popularize minstrel shows, vaudeville, and the like, as a method in seeking to win men for the Master, and is this a measure that will pass muster with Him—the standard He would have us maintain? Some are seemingly answering in the affirmative.

What might be regarded as a yet more ultra departure, is the plan introduced a couple of years ago by a Presbyterian men's club near here, viz., the giving of "smokers" in the church club room as an aid to sociability. My informant as to this said, "I was present at the initial club meeting when this was tried, and I smoked with the minister, who was the first to light his cigar." It might be added that said minister has since been succeeded by another; and the "smokers" may have been discontinued.

Believing that you will "read between the lines" and construe me as writing in the spirit of one whose chief desire is to best serve the cause of our common Lord, I am, Yours in the love of the Master,

Chicago. W. P. KEELER.

"Scholarly Opinion"

Editors Christian Century: Allow me to express my appreciation of the excellent paper you have been giving us. I have been pleased to note the spirit with which you have approached many subjects of discussion among us. I have been surprised occasionally at the warmth with which you have stood for our practices. However, I have not been in agreement at all times either with the editors or some of the contributors. Sometimes you have made statements which I have wished you either had not made or had backed up then and there. This applies to the statement that it is not the consensus of scholarly opinion that baptizo means in the New Testament "I immerse," "I dip," "I plunge," and never sprinkle or pour. And, too, I have always thought futile and even injurious the assumption of authority in critical matters. I cannot stop to cite instances. But it has seemed to me that until you could show to us why certain critical positions were taken it would be better not to take them. So long as you simply say "The scholarship of the world saith so and so" we will doubt. We want to know why the scholars of the world say so and so. I have tried to look into their reasonings in my own study and am frank to say that much of it seems absolutely idle and foolish, mere leaps in the dark, and yet I doubt not that to many as good minds as mine or better this is not so. I am persuaded that an elementary course in criticism in the columns of The Christian Century would be of service in letting us know where we are "at."

Walla Walla, Wash. S. G. FISHER.

[Certainly our correspondent is in error in attributing to us the statement that "it is not the consensus of scholarly opinion that baptizo means in the New Testament 'immerse,' 'dip,' 'plunge,' and never 'sprinkle' or 'pour.'" The Christian Century holds the contrary opinion.—Editors.]

Baptism and Salvation

Editors Christian Century: Some years ago, during the continuance of a series of revival services that was being conducted by the Disciples in the little Ohio town in which I lived at the time, the pastor and evangelist called on me. Our conversation turning on the subject of baptism, and not being able to reconcile my views on the subject with those of the evangelist, I asked the pastor whether in his belief one whose conscience recognized and who accepted sprinkling as baptism would be lost because he had not been immersed. His answer was: "No. My good old grandfather and grandmother were Presbyterians; They were sprinkled, lived Christian lives and I expect to meet them in heaven as surely as I expect to go there myself."

A year or two later, another series of meetings was held in the same church during which, in the course of a conversation with the evangelist, I asked him, in substance, the same question I had previously asked the pastor. His reply was: "I don't know. Such an one might be saved through ignorance."

Is the quotation of Burn's familiar lines,

"O wad some power the giftie gie us
To see oursels as ithers see us" out of place in this connection?

I believe that a good work is being done in the agitation of the baptism controversy in the columns of The Christian Century, and that ultimately Colonel Church's position on the admission to full membership in our congregations of members of other churches, regardless of the mode of their baptism, will be sanctioned by a large majority of our churches. A STORY OF THE TRUSTS

BY JANE RICHARDSON

CHAPTER XXIV.

Affairs at Clark's Home.

There was wide-spread suffering and demoralization throughout Wakefield, and nowhere had its results been more disastrous than in the home of Tim Clark.

Men who were sober and steady so long as they were employed, now despondent and idle, finding time heavy on their hands, began to lounge at the new saloon—"The Bird-cage,"—wasting there the last remnant of their savings—losing the last vestige of their self-respect and pride.

"Well, thank God, poor Lon aint goin' there squanderin' what little there's left, 'a drowndin' his troubles!" Susan said severely. "I reckon the men's wives has troubles too, but I take notice, they're expected to drown theirs in the wash-tub!"

At this propitious time Gates re-appeared, and he was hailed as a prophet. Now, sore, despondent, helpless, the men listened with avidity to his diatribes against capital, and still excepting Randall,—were solidly and inveterately arrayed against capitalists and corporations. They could realize that capital had created the works which, in return for unflagging industry on their part, had supported them and their families for twelve years; but they had learned now that a greater aggregation of capital—men with millions where Randall commanded thousands—had power to shut down the works in the face of the owner's protest, and plunge a whole community into misery and penury.

They were, under such circumstances, easily and naturally influenced, wrought up to the pitch of justifying almost any violence, but less through the harangue and cant of the professional agitator than by what they had been made to suffer. The mischief-making delegate would have argued in vain, but that those against whom he inveighed had, themselves justified his utterances.

Clark was one of the most regular of the habitues of the "Bird Cage." He had a place as assistant janitor at the Court house, where he earned a few dollars a week doing the most menial work. It seemed a hideous degredation to the morbid, half-crazed man, after the responsible position he had held. He had become so fierce and surly that the men agreed, that "his room was better than his company." The slightest contradiction threw him into a violent rage. When he came into the saloon the talk ceased by degrees and the loafers slipped out, one by one, until he was left alone. The proprietor complained that Clark "hurt his business," yet he had not the courage to order him to stay away.

At home where there was no restraint, he had become an ever-present dread to his family. The children were beaten and kicked upon the slightest provocation; even Jessie, a woman grown, bore the marks of his cruel hand. The younger ones shrunk out of sight when they heard his footstep, although now and then they were detected and called back, only to suffer the worse for their attempted escape.

"That's the way you treat your father, is it?" he raged, siezing Tom, the eldest boy, by the throat, because he protested when the half-crazed creature's brutality was directed against Jessie.

"Get out of here, if you don't like it! Go—and don't come back!" And the boy was pushed out into the darkness, the door shut and locked after him.

"There," he said with a bitter curse, "that's what'll happen to the rest of you, if you give me any more of your talk! I'll let you know, if I'm not much account any where else I'm boss of my own house yet!"

With the loss of his wages his old fear of poverty was intensified. He watched Jessie ceaselessly, and even in her stern economies found cause to complain of reckless extravagance and waste. They were slowly starved; the small allowance of the coarsest food, the meal and potatoes to which they were reduced, was doled out with niggardly hand by Clark himself, who kept the supplies under lock and key, though it was bought for the most part, with the pittance Jessie earned by sewing, and he prowled restlessly around the house, searching every nook and corner for the stores he suspected she was buying and concealing.

The poor girl kept all her troubles to herself, but finally, through Susan, Eleanor learned their desperate straits and came to the rescue. Mrs. Randall also volunteered assistance which Jessie could not refuse, the boys being given such work as could be invented for them, by way of repayment, to satisfy Jessie's pride. The baby had been ill and required nourishing food, and this with other comforts her friends provided regularly. These delicacies were secreted, as Clark suspected, and after long searching he came upon them. He was beside himself with fury and he crushed and stamped them under his feet. He struck Jessie in the face shrieking:

"I knew it—I knew it—You lying, sneaking—! You have ways of your own of gettin' money, and I've thought so all along. You hypocrite! I can't help what you do, but you shan't stay here and ruin my children—You'll leave!"

The children began to cry piteously, and they gathered close around the girl that had been both mother and sister. The baby also frightened, put out his little lip, ran to her and hid his face in her skirts.

She had hardly felt the blow that left a livid mark, but she turned like an animal at bay, defending its young. She stood erect, white and determined, her stern and unfaltering voice subduing the irresponsible wretch. Lifting the baby in her arms, pressing his head against her bosom with one hand, she said:

"I have borne from you all I mean to bear. You are not yourself. You've not been for sometime and you're growing worse and worst. I would not stay here one minute but for the children, but so long as they need me, as they do now, I shall stay!"

"Not if I put you out!" growled Clark.

"I shall not be driven away," she went on firmly. "They need me now as they never have since mother died. And you shall not lay your hand on me again. If this goes on—the next threat,—the next blow—I shall complain to the police, though you are my father.

Clark sank weakly into a chair and stared at her in silence.

"As for your suspicions of me, she continued calmly,"—your insults, I do not care for them at all. Whatever you may think or say, does not make me what you have called me. But I warn you I'll bear no more of it."

The girl's sudden access of courage, so unlike her customary submission cowed the man. He broke into wild weeping and loud and loud protestations:

"I wish I was dead,—that I'd never been born! O, if these miserable pauper children had only died with their mother!" He rocked in the excess of his trouble, which was aggravated by the fiery whiskey which he now drank habitually.

Jessie, exalted above fear, took the children upstairs and put them to bed. Then she went to her own room and raising the blind, sat by the window, wondering—wondering what she could do—the eternal unanswered question of the helpless and broken-hearted.

She sat there long, deriving neither hope nor consolation in her weary vigil, until the east began to brighten with the coming day; then she threw herself upon her bed and slept the heavy, unrefreshing slumber of misery.

From that night Clark's manner changed. he kept them to himself. He said nothing when poor Tom came creeping back humbly in the morning. He searched no more for Jessie's hoarded supplies, nor objected when now and then she made some trifling change in their poor fare. He rarely looked at the children or spoke to them, and sat for hours plunged in gloomy silence which Jessie had no wish to disturb. But this strange apathy gave her new cause for anxiety, that never left her.

A Real Hunter

He never shot a lion,
  He never hunted bear;
He never chased a glub-glub
  Or a boojick to its lair;
He never tamed a snortle
  Or laid a yapper low,
And yet he is a hunter
  Whom it's worth your while to know.
In breathless expectation
  He creeps on hands and knees,
On unfamiliar pathways,
  Afraid to even sneeze.
He is indeed a hunter,
  A martyr of the chase,
Who hunts his collar button
  Underneath the dressing case.

Not the Best of It

By Sydney Dayre.

"Grandpa," said Fred, "don't you want to see my new knife?"

"I think you showed it to me last week," said his grandfather.

"No: this is another. The one I showed you then only had two blades. This one has four, and a nail file besides."

"That looks like a good knife," said grandfather, examining it.

"That's what it is. It's tiptop steel and not a bit damaged except a nick in the smallest blade and that little crack in the horn on the handle. But the best part of it is how I came by it. It really scarcely cost me anything."

"There are few things in this world we get for nothing," remarked grandfather. "We pay the price in some way."

"Well, the price I paid for this was small, and you'll say so when I tell you the whole story. First, I had a gimlet with the point broken off. Little Jack Deems wanted it because he's fond of working with tools, and the little goose didn't know enough to see the point was damaged. He wanted it, and wanted to trade me a knife for it, for his uncle had given him a new one and he was willing to let the old one go. It wasn't much of a knife, but it was worth twice as much as the gimlet."

"So you traded?"

"Oh, not even, grandpa," said Fred with a laugh. "I'm a little too sharp for that. As he was so anxious about it, I told him I'd do it for five cents to boot. And he did it. Why," Fred laughed louder, "he could almost buy a gimlet for five cents."

"Is this the knife?"

"Oh, no! I haven't finished the story. This was Rob Hill's knife. I've wanted it for ever so long, for I do like a four-bladed knife. I happened to know that Rob was pretty hard up for money. He couldn't go over to the Fourth of July celebration at Radnor with the rest of the boys because he couldn't get hold of a quarter to pay his fare. So I offered to trade knives with him and give him a quarter to boot. He hated to, but he wanted to go, so he gave in. This," Fred snapped the blade, "is worth at least a quarter more than I gave for it. So, you see, I've got the best of it in both my trades."

"I don't know about that," said grandpa gravely.

"Why, haven't I been telling you exactly how it was?"

"Yes, but it hurts me to think of your paying such a price for your knife."

Fred's face fell. "I wonder if I could have got it for less? Perhaps he would have taken twenty-cents, or fifteen. But it's no use trying to undo it now, for we both said 'done.'"

"I don't think you take my meaning, my boy," said grandfather gently. "You tell me that you believe that you got more than the worth of your gimlet from Jack?"

"Yes, five cents, and a better value in the knife."

"And that this knife is worth more than you gave for it?"

"Of course, grandpa. I always get the best of it in a trade."

"Then you got a quarter's worth of Rob and five cents and more from Jack without their getting any equivalent. Did you say to them, 'I know that what I am getting is worth the most'?"

"That would be queer kind of trading," said Fred with a laugh. "I tried my best to make them think they were getting the best of it."

"Was that true?"

"Ho! You take such a serious view of it, grandpa," said Fred.

"What do they call it," went on the old gentleman, without noticing the remark, "when one person takes from another something for which he does not give a fair and honest price?"

"Why—grandpa," Fred hesitated a little, still attempting a laugh, "they call it—trading."

"But what is it? What is its real name?"

"Well, I suppose that depends on how you look at it," said Fred a little unwillingly.

"Yes, on how you have been told to look at it when you think seriously of it. One name for such transactions is cheating. An ugly word, isn't it? Another name is still uglier, but we won't apply it here, for I know that through your love of a trade you have allowed yourself to do things of which you have failed to see the true significance. Now, my boy, when it appears that you have sacrificed truth, honor, and honesty for your knife, I think you have paid too high a price for it."

Color rose to Fred's face. "Then, it seems, I haven't got the best of it, after all," he said slowly.

"Now, Listen Here!"

Mr. Sanderson sighed when the voice of his daughter floated into the library. She was bubbling out her good news at the telephone to her most intimate friend.

"Listen here, Ruth," she was saying excitedly, "father has decided to take mother and me to Europe!"

"Sudden? Yes. We will sail next week. Now, listen here, we take the Mediterranean trip!"

"Yes, all winter. Italy most of the time; and, listen here, we'll be in Rome for Christmas!"

Mr. Sanderson looked at his wife with a whimsical expression of despair. "Do you realize that Gertrude scarcely makes a remark without first commanding some one to 'listen here'?" he asked. "Do you ever hope to break the child of using that disagreeable expression?"

"My labors certainly seem in vain. All the high school girls say it. Perhaps, when we get Gertrude away, she will overcome the habit."

There seemed to be little promise of this hope being fulfilled, for as Mr. and Mrs. Sanderson, snug in their steamer chairs, watched their more energetic daughter march up and down the deck, they frequently overheard her, as she passed them with a smile or wave of the hand, telling the companions of her walk to "listen here!"

"I think I have found a treasure of a guide," said Mr. Sanderson, the first day in Rome. "He seems very intelligent and he says he has been in America. He is quite an archeologist and he speaks English well enough to tell us all he knows about these old ruins."

"Oh, that's fine," said Gertrude, "for, now, listen here, father! my history teacher suggested that I make notes about the Forum for a graduating essay."

"That's a good idea." Mr. Sanderson's eyes twinkled mischievously. "It will be very impressive when you unroll your paper, and begin to read, 'Now, listen here! the Forum Romanorum'——"

"O father," pouted Gertrude laughingly, "in our school we don't read the graduating essays."

"Well, if it were the custom, I know one sweet girl graduate who would surely begin by saying, 'Now, listen here!'"

When, a few moments later the guide arrived, the little party, at Gertrude's request, went at once to the Forum, where Luigi Pelagi proceeded to explain the wonderful relics of Rome's past. To the intense amusement of Mr. and Mrs. Sanderson, he placed his finger on the side of his nose and began almost every sentence by saying, "Now, listen here!"

"He has certainly been in America," remarked Mrs. Sanderson, in an aside to Gertrude, who, catching her father's eye after one of these oft-repeated phrases, colored with discomfiture and lifted her head with a little defiant air. But that evening, as they sat together, she turned to her parents with a droll imitation of the guide's gesture and accent.

"Now, listen here!" she said, "henceforth I am going to let Signore Luigi Pelagi have a complete monopoly of a certain English phrase which I have just used for the last time."

"Foreign travel is remarkably educational," remarked Mrs. Sanderson, with a loving smile at her daughter.

Eating Between Meals

'Twixt breakfast and dinner,
  And dinner and tea,
A boy may get hungry
  As hungry can be.

But if he's impatient
  And eats right away,
His apeptite's gone
  For the rest of the day.

Whereas by just waiting,
  This fact I assert,
His bread and potatoes
  Will taste like dessert.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, APRIL 10.

Theme for the Day—Prayer and good will.

Scripture—See that none render unto any evil for evil; but always follow after that which is good, one toward another, and toward all. Rejoice alway; pray without ceasing; in everything give thanks.—I. Thess. 5:15, 16.

He prayeth best who loveth best,
All things both great and small;
For the dear God, who loveth us,
He made and loveth all.
—S. T. Coleridge ("The Ancient Mariner")

Prayer—Inspirer and hearer of prayer, Thou Shepherd and Guardian of Thy people, we rejoice in the glory of this new day of rest and worship. Safely through another week Thou hast brought us on our way. May our prayers rise like incense to Thee, and find access to the ear of Him who never slumbers or sleeps. Most of all, may our lives so manifest the love that knows no evil, that our prayers shall be no mere form of words, but the expression of spirits that are in love with Thee and intent on helping all the world. Grant us a day such as shall send us forth strong for the duties of the coming week. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

MONDAY, APRIL 11.

Theme for the Day—The fall of Satan.

Scripture—And he said unto them, I beheld Satan fallen as lightning from heaven.—Luke 10:18.

And he laid hold on the dragon, the old serpent, which is the devil and Satan, and bound him.—Rev. 20:2.

Him the Almighty Power
Hurled headlong flaming from the etherial sky,
With hideous ruin and combustion, down
To bottomless perdition; there to dwell
In adamantine chains and penal fire,
Who durst defy the Omnipotent to arms.
—John Milton ("Paradise Lost" I.)

Prayer—Our Father, we rejoice in the knowledge that Thy will is at last to prevail in all the world. To Thee every knee shall bow one day, and every tongue confess Thy glory. To that time we look forward with expectancy and joy, for then all Thy foes shall meet defeat, and the kingdoms of this world shall become Thine own. May the knowledge of this good day to come dispel our doubt and hesitation, and arm us with courage for the daily contest with evil. Cheer us evermore with Thy presence, and may our hope grow brighter as we journey toward the end of the way. For Christ's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY, APRIL 12.

Theme for the Day—Longing for the heavenly rest.

Scripture—I would not live alway.—Job 7:16.

For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain, ... having the desire to depart and be with Christ, for it is very far better.—Phil. 1:21, 22.

Who would wish back the Saints upon our rough
Wearisome road?
Wish back a breathless soul
Just at the goal?
My soul, praise God
For all dear souls which have enough.
—Christina Rossetti ("Heavenly Homesickness.")

Prayer—Loving Father, we give Thee praise for the glorious hopes that inspire our hearts. We are happy in our daily work and in the love of our homes and friends. But better than all we look forward with eagerness to the rest and the service of our "house not made with hands." As time goes on it grows dearer to us, for those we love leave our side and enter into the true life. We would not call them back. They will not return to us, but we shall go to them. It is this confidence in which we labor and wait, for Thou wilt bring us to our own in the aftertime. Amen.

WEDNESDAY. APRIL 13.

Theme for the Day—Glory and the grave.

Scripture—At rest with kings and counsellors of the earth, which built solitary piles for themselves, or with princes that had gold, ... the small and the great are there.—Job 3:14-19.

Here are sands, ignoble things
Dropped from the ruined sides of kings;
Here's a world of pomp and state,
Burned in dust, once dead by fate.
—Francis Beaumont ("Lines on the Tombs in Westminster.")

Prayer—Our Father, whose providence supplies our needs, we thank Thee that life is made rich not by what we have but by what we are. When we realize how little joy there would be in a life full of luxury but empty of holy purpose and Christlike living, we thank Thee afresh for the limitations in which we are placed, and the simplicity to which we are kept. Teach us the art of right living, so that we shall be above envy, distrust, worry and fretfulness, and so prepare us for the better life that is to be. Amen.

THURSDAY, APRIL 14.

Theme for the Day—"Down to the sea."

Scripture—They that go down to the sea in ships, these see the works of the Lord. He maketh the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof are still; then are they glad because they are quiet; so he bringeth them to the haven of their desire.—Psalm 107: 23-30.

God guides across the trackless sea
The children of his love;
The mild winds gather round the ships,
The clouds are dark above,
But He keeps watch through all the night
And they are safe as in the light.
—Marianne Farringham ("He Bringeth Them.")

Prayer—Ruler of Nature, Thou God of power, we thank Thee that sea and land are alike in Thy keeping. The call of life takes some of those we love into distant waters, and we tremble at the passing winds lest they should bring them harm. But Thou, O Father, art the Master of the storms. The sea is Thine, and Thou hast made it. Calm the violence of all rough waters where our fellowmen fare forth, and bring all souls in safety to their journey's end. So will we praise Thee for Thy mercy evermore, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

FRIDAY, APRIL 15.

Theme for the Day—Domestic Love.

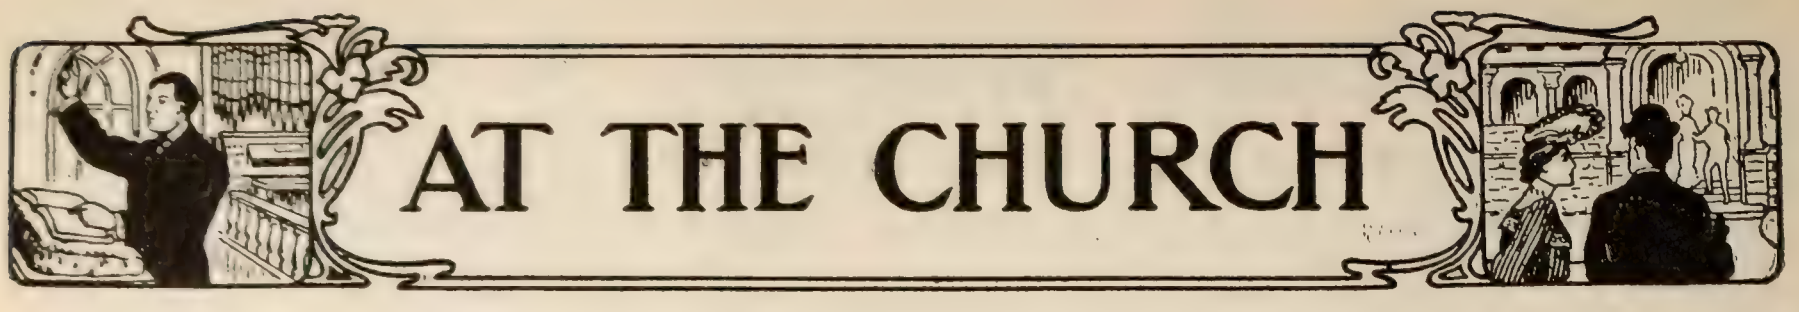
Scripture—Therefore doth a man leave his father and his mother and cleaves into his wife; and they become one flesh.—Gen. 2:24.

Yet in the long years liker must they grow;
The man be more of woman, she of man;
He gain in sweetness and in moral height,
Nor lose the wrestling times that throw the world;
She mental breadth, nor part in childward care,
Nor lose the childlike in the larger mind;
Till at the last she set herself to man
Like perfect music unto noble words.
—Alfred Tennyson ("The Princess.")

Prayer—Dear Father, we owe Thee our unfailing praise for the loving provisions Thou hast made for our happiness. Thou settest the solitary in families, and teachest Thy children to honor domestic love, to choose with discretion and forethought those with whom life is to be spent, and to set up the altar of worship in the new-made home. Protect and bless our households, we beseech Thee. May husbands and wives live together in love and fidelity; may children answer to the summons of love, and grow to strength and beauty in the atmosphere of homes where Christ abides. Thus fit us all for the fellowship of the divine Family above, through Christ our Lord. Amen.

SATURDAY, APRIL 16.

Theme for the Day—The Touch of healing.



Scripture—And behold a woman which had an issue of blood twelve years, came behind him, and touched the border of his garment; for she said within herself, If I do but touch his garment, I shall be made whole.—Matt. 9:21.

The healing of his seamless dress
Is by our beds of pain.
We touch him in life's throng and press,
And we are whole again.
—John G. Whittier ("Our Master.")

Prayer—Father of help and of mercy, we contemplate with joy our Saviour's career of healing and friendliness among the poor and afflicted of old. We would learn the lesson of his life, and though we have not his mysterious and convincing power, yet we have our own, and can do much in his name. We would not shut up his works of mercy to the distant past, but seek to diffuse his spirit of sympathy and good will, which is better than any healing, and may often work even the return of health. Endow us with his spirit of love, his touch of helpfulness, and his yearning for kindly activity. Amen.

The Grace of Gentleness

We must not confuse the "grace" of gentleness with that sort of gentleness which some people are born with, and which is no more a virtue with them than a hot temper would be a blame to one with a different inheritance. Gentleness as a grace which comes through the crucifixion of passions in us, and indicates self-control, and restraint for Christ's sake is worth infinitely more than any inherited mildness of disposition. Gentleness has a hard time making headway in the world because of the mistaken ideas which many good people have held concerning it. It is astonishing how many Christians there are who regard real gentleness as a weakness, a kind of soft sentimentalism which in some way interferes with thorough integrity and righteousness. Now no one who labors under that mistake will ever know true Christian gentleness, for gentleness is a grace which will never come to us unless we desire it, and make up our minds to pay the price for it, but it is worth the price.—Central Christian Advocate.

Sunday School Lesson

Voice from the Prison*

The relations between John the Baptist and Jesus were always intimate and sympathetic. They had grown up in different localities to be sure, but they were related and probably met on several occasions before they began their public work. John's home was in the vicinity of Jerusalem. Tradition still insists that the little town of Ain Karim, a short walk from Jerusalem, was his native place. His retirement to the desert was doubtless the result of those absorbing meditations which grew out of his studies of the Old Testament and his observation of the degenerate life of his age. Somewhere in the rough region which lay between Jerusalem and the trench of the Jordan he passed months, and, perhaps years, in quiet preparation for his work.

The Call.

After all that human institutions of education can do for a man there is a certain graduate school of silence and of prayer into which God seems to take the choice and elect souls whom he destines for special work, and of these John was one.

John at Work.

When he came back to undertake that task whose call rang in his soul, he did not re-enter the populous districts about Jerusalem, but remained at the Jordan between the desert and the town calling the people to alignment with the new enterprise that he felt sure was about to be launched. To him thus dowered with strength of body, clearness of mind and passion of soul there came the throngs of his fellowmen attracted by the wonderful reports that reached them of his message. As long as it was possible, Jesus remained in the shadow cast by John's spectacular and tremendous work. The Savior's plan was to make his campaign as early as he could in the vicinity of Jerusalem, and if possible to win its rulers and its people by his message. Failing in this he would have to choose a group of interpreters who could carry on his work after his departure and to spend all the time that he could command in the education of these men. For this purpose John's attraction of the crowds to the Jordan region was propitious. It left Jesus to pursue in quietness his earliest period of public work.

In Prison.

John's arrest, the result of Herod's fear lest he should meet assassination at the hands of emissaries sent by the angry Herodias, abruptly changed all the plans of the two great teachers. John was now the victim of solitude and inaction. Like an eagle immured in a cage, all his soul demanded the freedom and activity which his splendid ministry of repentance had hitherto supplied. Now in the dungeon at Machaerus he was compelled to meet with what patience he might the slow dragging days whose gloom hardly differed from that of night.

John's Message.

Any careful study of John's nature and message will show how full he was of the hope and expectation that the one who came after him, the greater preacher into whose hands he stood instantly ready to surrender his work, would be a stern and relentless foe of every form of iniquity such as was flaunted by the rulers in church and state. All those rugged figures of speech about the threshing shovel, the wheat and the chaff, the ax lying at the root of the fruitless tree of Judaism, the offspring of serpents and the wrath to come were taken by him from the stirring words of prophecy. He himself was a prophecy, an apocalypse composite of earthquake, lightning and eclipse.

The New Teacher.

When, therefore, the reports of the quiet work that Jesus did reached him through his devoted disciples in the dungeon among the cliffs east of the Dead Sea, he grew perplexed as to whether the seeming inoffensiveness of Jesus was not the mark of failure to fulfil the great Messianic hopes that John had cherished. Shut away from the world, he could know but little of the effect that Jesus' work produced. But even in its most aggressive form that ministry never matched what he anticipated was the work of the great prophet who was to come.

The Messiah?

His question then was quite natural. Was there still another to appear? He felt sure that Jesus would at least know the answer to his question. The irrepressible character of his own work and expectations demanded some satisfaction as compensation for the dreary months he was wasting when there was so much to do.

Jesus' Answer.

The disciples of John found Jesus in one of the towns where he had been preaching since he sent the twelve out on their evangelistic mission. When John's friends presented their question Jesus did not answer it at once, but bade them stand near him and take note of the things he was doing in the regular process of his ministry. That day they saw his works of healing, they heard his message to the people, and they marked that for the first time in their lives they saw rich and poor treated alike. Here was a democracy of love and sympathy, a new order of life in which healing and uplift went hand in hand. To be sure there was nothing of wrath or of vindictiveness in the work of Jesus, yet it more than satisfied them even though they were not without a certain jealousy for their imprisoned master. Let us hope that as they returned to John in his cell they were able to comfort him by the report they brought, and that from that moment on till the tragic day when John came forth from the prison to enter into the wide liberty of the eternal life, he found peace of soul in the words of his disciples.

Jesus' Tribute.

After these friends had left, Jesus' used the opportunity of emphasizing the greatness of John's character to his audience. They had gone out eagerly into the desert to hear and see him. Had they really understood how great a man he was? To be sure he had none of the outward trappings of royalty. He did not live delicately nor was he clothed in purple, but of all who had lived none had compared with John in true greatness.

John, than which man a sadder nor a greater
"Not to this day has been of woman born,
John like some lofty peak by the Creator
Fired with the red glow of the rushing morn."

They might look down the entire list of New Testament heroes and no such man as John would be found. Above Moses, above Elijah, above Isaiah even he towered in majesty and grandeur. Truly he was the prophet of the portal opening the door by which the world passed from the old to the new, and like a porter he caught glimpses of the glory yet to be revealed which he could not tarry to enjoy. So those who came after him, though only of slight moment in the new society of righteousness which Jesus was establishing were none the less greater than John in the privileges they enjoyed and the visions of services which opened before them.

False Hopes.

They had been looking for the Elijah promised in the prophecy of Malachi. If they had only possessed the wisdom of discrimination they might have known that John himself was that expected prophet, for in the spirit and power of Elijah he came. Something of John's fiery nature the men of the age possessed, for they too expected that the kingdom would come with military power and some of them even tried to force this militant side of Jesus' work. And this has always been the misfortune of Christianity. But there were those who understood, and to them Jesus had to trust the end of his plan.

Death of John.

Thus with a eulogy such as few men have merited or received John the Baptist passed from the scene of New Testament story. One other brief and lurid moment there was of which those same friends of John told in later days. But John's work was over and a greater than he had entered upon the task of revealing God to the world.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

Topic April 17: Good Cheer in Dark Days. Acts 27:20-36.

Dark days come to the lives of us all, but most of them are not so dark as we make them, and many of them are only creatures of our own imaginations. Indeed for the most part we are the creators of both our joys and our sorrows. The gloom or happiness of our lives depend, therefore, largely upon ourselves.

But we must not be believers in a blind optimism. There is such a thing as trouble and it is not always under our control. No optimism could ever have warded off the days and weeks of gloom which followed the earthquake and fire of San Francisco, or the burning of the Cherry mine of last autumn, or the Iroquois Theater disaster in Chicago. But even in these calamities the gospel of good cheer has its indispensable mission. In those times of terrible calamity, of such unspeakable horror, it was no time for the survivors to sit and wail or to escape from the scene. The words of cheer and consolation from the leaders and rescue workers in the midst of those frightful scenes, not only strengthened their own hearts and nerved them for their task but they eased the aching breasts of the victims and the grief-stricken relatives and friends.

Elijah is a splendid example of the cheerless man and how helpless he is when the tide of battle goes against him for a time. He was resisting the encroachments of Baal, as it threatened to displace the worship of Jehovah. He had declared a drought, he called and conducted a successful contest against this strange worship, and ordered that its prophets be slain. But when the news was taken to the king's wife who was the promoter of the foreign worship and when she swore that she would make Elijah's life like that of the prophets he had slain, he forgot all about the power of Jehovah and ran for his life. Nor did he stop until he was safe under a juniper tree in southern Judah, where he implored Jehovah to take away his life. So far as he was concerned the cause of the worship of Jehovah was lost and he wanted to die and end all his troubles. This too when success had attended his efforts. Such a spirit never wins great victories after prolonged efforts.

When Washington assumed the position as Commander-in-Chief of the American Army it had less than 15,000 men, many of whom were untrained, some already weary of the hardships of war, all poorly clothed and half armed. But his words of cheer, and his sublime faith in a cause which he believed to be just, enabled him to keep the fires of patriotism burning brightly in the hearts of his shivering, unsheltered, hungry troops at Valley Forge, to resist the intrigues of selfish and jealous commanders and the unjust censures which were sent by Pennsylvania and Massachusetts to Congress, to win the freedom which we all enjoy.

In our lesson it remained for the cheering counsel of Paul in the midst of a prolonged storm at sea when experienced sailors had lost all faith in any possible hope of salvation of all on board, to call them back to their senses. For a fortnight they had foolishly fasted and their strength was gone. He besought them to take food and giving thanks to God, he himself partook of it and gave it to them saying, " for this is for your safety." With the further reassurance that not one should perish they partook of food. These words of cheer not only dispelled their fear but restored them to their senses and saved a ship load of nearly three hundred souls.

Rest

My feet are weary and my hands are tired,
My soul oppressed,
And I desire what I have long desired,
Rest—only rest.

'Tis hard to toil, when toil is almost vain,
In barren ways;
'Tis hard to sow and never garner grain,
In harvest days.

The burdens of my days are hard to bear,
But God knows best;
And I have prayed, but vain has been my prayers,
For rest—sweet rest.

'Tis hard to plant in spring and never reap.
The autumn yield;
'Tis hard to toil, and 'tis hard to weep,
O'er fruitless field.

And so I cry a weak annd human cry,
So heart-oppressed;
And so I sigh a weak and human sigh
For rest—for rest.

My way has wound across the desert years,
And cares infest
My paths, and through the flowing of hot tears
I pine—for rest.

'Twas always so; when but a child I laid
On mother's breast
My weary little head; I then prayed,
As now—for rest.

And I am restless still; 'twill soon be o'er,
For down the west
Life's sun is setting, and I see the shore
Where I shall rest.

REV. FATHER RYAN.

AMERICA'S ANSWER TO HER WORLD-OPPORTUNITY

By J. Campbell White, General Secretary Laymen's Missionary Movement.

The most important thing in American history this year is the changing conviction of the nation concerning its religious obligations to mankind. In this process the very character of American Christianity is being radically changed. When a man or a nation becomes conscious of world-relationships and responsibilities, a new life has begun.

From Maine to California, at seventy-five main conventions and thousands of related secondary meetings, American Christian men of all churches have been rising up to endorse a comprehensive and adequate plan for making Christ known to the whole world in our generation. The men of every state in the union have expressed themselves on this issue with a unanimity and depth of conviction that could never be called forth apart from a tremendous cause, and the mighty working of the spirit of God. There has not been a note of failure in the entire National Missionary Campaign. With scarcely a single exception, the seventy-five main conventions have brought together the largest and strongest assemblies for Christian men ever gathered together for any purpose in these cities. The addition of some millions of dollars annually to the missionary treasuries of the churches will not be the only chief result. This is but one evidence of altered life-purposes on the part of multitudes of men.

The National Congress, May 3-6.

With only another month intervening until the National Missionary Congress meets in Chicago (May 3-6) it is most important that a great volume of prayer be poured out continuously for overwhelming blessing upon that gathering. Without doubt it will be the most representative and potential convention ever assembled on this continent. The forty-five hundred available seats in the Auditorium have been allotted to the evangelical churches of the United States in proportion to their membership and missionary contributions, thus guaranteeing a proportionate representation from every church and from every part of the nation. It will be the privilege of a lifetime to be a member of this Congress. All desiring to attend should apply first to the secretary of their own foreign missionary board. In case the seats allotted to that church have all been taken, application may be made to F. J. Michel, executive secretary of the Congress, at 108 La Salle street, Chicago, in case any church fails to use all the seats allotted to it. Applications should be sent in at the earliest possible moment. Tickets of admission will be transferable, in case delegates are unavoidably hindered from attending.

A National Missionary Policy.

Special railway rates of one fare and one-half have been granted from all parts of the country.

Not only will the leading missionary speakers of North America be heard at the Congress, but more important than that in many respects will be the framing up and adoption of a worthy National Missionary Policy. It is already clear that the churches of North America are responsible for reaching about 60 per cent of the non-Christian world. The National Missionary Policy adopted at this Congress should mark a new era in the history of Christianity.

The Association quartet, which sang with such acceptance at the Canadian National Missionary Congress, and at the Student Volunteer Conventions, will sing at each session of the Congress. The concluding feature of the Congress program will be the "Hallelujah Chorus," rendered by the Apollo Club of Chicago.

Prayer for the Congress.

In view of the vast issues involved, will not pastors and Christian people everywhere make this Congress an object of habitual prayer during the next few weeks, that the will of God for the church of our day may be both clearly understood and completely obeyed? A conquering Christianity abroad will be the surest guarantee of a dominant and regnant Christianity at home.

Tails and Their Uses.

A cat never actually wags its tail. Why should it when it can purr? But, nevertheless, it seems to serve the same purpose in permitting a temporary expenditure of excessive nervous energy when the animal is under great strain. For instance, when carefully stalking a bird or man, as is the case of a kitten or a lion, the tip of the tail is never still for a moment—ever curling and uncurling. We may compare this to the nervous tapping of the foot or fingers in a man. When an angry lion is roaring his loudest, his tail will frequently lash from side to side, giving rise among the ancients to the belief that he scourged his body with a hook or thorn which grew from the end of the tail.

When a jaguar walks along a slender bough or a house cat perambulates the top of a board fence, we perceive another important function of the tail—that of an aid in balancing. As a tightrope performer sways his pole, so the feline shifts its tail to preserve the center of gravity.

The tail of a sheep seems to be of little use to its owner, although in the breed which is found in Asia Minor and on the tablelands of Tartary this organ function has a storehouse of fat, and sometimes reaches a weight of fifty pounds. When viewed from behind, the animal seems all tail, and when this appendage reaches its full size it is either fastened between two sticks which drag on the ground, or it is suspended on two small wheels.

Take another of our animals, a fierce little weazel, clad in summer in a coat of brown, in winter turning white, but always with a jet black tip to the tail. The er- ?? ?? ????

Church Life

The convention of the fourteenth district of Indiana was held at English, April 28, 29. F. F. Porter is secretary.

C. O. Reynard, pastor of the Second Church, Warren, Ohio, occupied the pulpit of the First Church the last Sunday in March.

Oscar Ingold, evangelist, Oklahoma City, has been chosen pastor of the church at Hobart, Oklahoma.

S. W. Nay, evangelist, and R. C. Davis, singer, are in a meeting with the Broadway Church, Sedalia, Mo.

Linwood Boulevard Church, Kansas City, becomes living link in Foreign Society. Burris A. Jenkin, pastor.

There were two confessions at the service of the church at Bloomfield, Iowa, Easter Sunday morning. F. D. Ferral is the pastor.

The Independence Boulevard Church, Kansas City, has just closed a contract for a $29,000 organ which will be installed at once.

There have recently been four confessions at regular services of the church in Rochester, N. Y., where Robert Stewart, is pastor.

C. H. Mattox has closed a good meeting with the church at Bedford, Iowa, and accepted a call to the pastorate of the church.

The church at Ames, Iowa, has just paid off a debt on their building and are now giving more to missions than at any time in their history.

Miss Florence E. Lanham, Indianapolis, spoke at the First Church, South Bend, Ind., March 28, in the interest of the work of the Christian Endeavor Society.

H. O. Breeden, California, will hold a meeting with W. S. Lockhart and the church at Fayetteville, Ark., during the early days of this month.

There were seven confessions at the regular services of the church at Danbury, Conn., Easter Sunday. E. J. Teagarden is the pastor.

The church at Lakeport, Cal., is in need of a minister to succeed U. S. Johnson, who has accepted the call extended him by the church at Healdsburg.

At London, Ontario, where B. H. Hayden is the pastor, there were eight confessions Easter Sunday, making a total of fifteen in the past three weeks.

John P. Sala, pastor of the church at Elyria, Ohio, writes that he will attend the Men's Missionary Conference in Chicago, May 3-6.

J. Durham, one of the pillars of the work in California, says that the prospects are for the best year's work in the history of the Golden State churches of Christ.

Thompson, the Egyptian, is at Plymouth, Ill., but has been unable to preach because of ill health, and Mrs. Thompson has supplied his place. W. H. Wellcome leads the singing.

The quarterly assembly of the Disciples of Chicago was held at the First Methodist Church, April 3, at three in the afternoon. Dr. Arthur Holmes, of Philadelphia was the chief speaker.

After a six weeks' trip through the northwest, J. P. Myers, pastor of the church at Shelbyville, Ind., writes enthusiastically of the prospects for a great work on the part of our churches there.

W. B. Clemmer is in a two weeks' meeting with the church at Rockford, Ill., of which he became pastor in February. Since that time there have been fourteen accessions to the church at regular services.

C. C. Morrison, Herbert L. Willett, E. S. Ames and Alva W. Taylor were among those attending the Disciples Congress at Bloomington, Ind., last week.

George L. Snively will assist George B. Stewart and the church at Colorado Springs in a meeting next November. Mr. Snively was with Mr. Stewart in a like service in Warrensburg a year ago.

After six years of labor with the First Church of Christ, Tonawanda, N. Y., where there have been ninety additions in the past six weeks, Edward F. Randall has resigned the pastorate owing to climatic reasons.

The Central Church, San Diego, where W. E. Crabtree ministers, stands among the ten leading churches of the brotherhood in the amount of its offering for foreign missions. Last year the offering was $827.40.

Large audiences, fine music, two confessions and seven hundred dollars contributed for paying the debt on the parsonage, was the record made by W. H. Bagby and the church at Missoula, Mont., Easter Sunday.

There have been nine additions to the church at Santa Maria, Cal., since January 1. J. Charles Rhodes is the tireless pastor. Willis S. Myers, Southern California State Evangelist, is to begin a meeting there April 10.

All indebtedness of the Magnolia Avenue Church, Fort Worth, Texas, was cleared up on the day of dedication, under the leadership of F. M. Rains. The church raised during the day $5,700. E. M. Watts is the pastor.

S. Grundy Fisher, Walla Walla, Wash., writes of his work: "Work here goes well. Eleven added the Sunday following the Hilton meeting. One confession Sunday last. Sunday-school near the 300 mark all the while."

J. J. Handsaker of Arleta, Ore., is helping organize a $6,000 co-operative printing plant to flood Oregon with "dry" literature for "Oregon Dry 1910." D. Errett of Salem, president of O. C. M. C. is one of the incorporators of the company.

The Ninth District of the Indiana Christian Missionary Society will meet at Greenwood, April 19 and 20. The district includes all churches in Johnson, Monroe, Morgan and Shelby counties. J, P. Myers, Shelbyville, Ind., is president of the district.

Richard W. Wallace, pastor of the First Church, Valdosta, Ga., is preaching a series of Sunday evening sermons on "Old Testament Characters." The first of the series was entitled: "Joseph—The Man Who Conquered His Environment."

The Evanston, Ill., church has begun the erection of its new house and is occupying temporary quarters in the Y. M. C. A. building, at 1621 Orington avenue. The total offerings of this church for Easter Sunday amounted to $210—largely on the fund for the new building.

J. N. Crutcher, pastor of the church at Sioux City, Iowa, who has been with his wife in the Ozarks, whither Mrs. Crutcher went seeking to improve her health, has returned to his pulpit and Mrs. Crutcher who is much improved in health will return to the home in Sioux City in a few weeks.

The church at Davenport, Iowa, is progressing in all branches. There are good audiences. The Sunday-school attendance is making an average attendance of 250, with 340 Easter Sunday. Under the leadership of the Y. P. S. C. E. the church has opened a mission school in the business district.

O. C. Bolman, secretary, announces that the place of holding the Fifth District Convention has been changed from Latham, Ill., to Petersburg. The date is June 14-16. The officers of the district are: C. H. Metcalf, president; O. L. Read, vice president; C. W. Ross, evangelist, and O. C. Bolman, secretary.

The men of the church at Galesburg, Ill., recently dined together, and were addressed by David H. Shields, pastor of the church at Eureka, Ill., on the subject, "Patriotism and Good Citizenship." An address was made also by J. A. Barnett, pastor of the Galesburg church, and C. W. Cummings of Knoxville, acted as toastmaster.

A commendable thought for Easter was that of the church at Connellsville, Pa. The members of the congregation were urged to buy carnations for the Easter decorations of the church, and it was systematically arranged for these to then be taken to those who on account of ill health were kept indoors on that day.

C. R. Wolford has been the force at Blandinsville, Ill., in forward movements and growth. Since he began work there the Sunday-school attendance has increased from eighty-five to 215, and Mr. Wolford teaches a men's Bible class which started with a membership of seven and now enrolls 107, with an average attendance of seventy.

S. O. Landis, Chicago, has just returned from a successful meeting with the church at Washington, Pa. Under the work of Mr. Landis the church was brought into fine harmony and spirit and there were ten accessions the second week. The church extended Mr. Landis a call to the pastorate, but he has not yet accepted.

The church work at Dorchester, Neb., is moving forward at a good pace. The foreign missionary offering this year was more than $40, as compared with $10 last year. The Sunday-school is growing rapidly, and there are frequent additions to the church. An offering was taken Easter Sunday for the National Benevolent Association.

The Christian church at Paris, Ky., gave between $500 and $600 for foreign missions the first Sunday in March. Carey E. Morgan, the minister, has gone for a trip to the Orient, and enroute delivered an address at Boston. R. H. Crossfield, of Transylvania University, is filling Brother Morgan's pulpit in his absence.

W. C. Hull of the First Church, Pasadena, Cal., addressed the first of a series of noonday meetings March 20 in the Board of Trade rooms there. These were arranged for by the united efforts of all the churches of the city, the object being a general moral uplift. His subject, "The Kind of Men Needed," was well received.

J. K. Shellenberger, field secretary of the Brotherhood, was chief speaker at a banquet of the men's clubs of the Douglas Park Church, Chicago. On the following Sunday evening he spoke to a large audience in the church on "The Masculinity of Jesus." Pastor Vaughn Dabney says of his visit: "He left our church brotherhood greatly strengthened by his messages."

The church at Weatherford, Texas, held a recent open business meeting in which every member of the church was asked to tell of some definite thing which he thought the church should do to increase its usefulness in the community, and ways in which the Sunday service could be made more attractive and helpful. The meeting was planned and directed by the pastor, Owen Livengood.

The Sunday-school at Canton, Mo., has been unitedly at work to bring their standing up to the highest and have made good. The pastor, G. W. Buckner, says that much credit is due to Miss Mattie Hedges, the Sunday-school superintendent, for the district, who is a student in Christian University, and a teacher in the Sunday-school at Canton. Miss Hedges will graduate in June.

The Indiana State Convention meets in Anderson, May 16-19, and plans are for a convention of unusual significance. Several questions of greatest concern will be presented to the convention for its consideration, among them a plan worked out by the newly elected secretary, E. M. Barney, for getting the literature of the Brotherhood into the homes of the people of the churches.

In Waterloo, Iowa, there has just been concluded a successful effort to unite the Central Church and the Church of Christ, East. This east side church has been meeting in the library building for the past year; but now abandon their separate organization and unite with the Central Church. It is a happy culmination of an effort to restore a united force in the work in Waterloo.

John P. Sala, who has recently accepted a call to the church at Dayton, Ohio, writes of his belief that the prospects for the church work there are most encouraging. This is indeed a fine old church. Dr. Herbert L. Willett, of the Christian Century, was at one time pastor of the church, and the Christian Century feels an unusual interest in its work, and a satisfaction in the thought that Mr. Sala has accepted the call of the church.

Dr. Herbert L. Willett is announced for the following series of addresses before the Bible Study Section of the Men's League of the Memorial Church of Christ: "Man and the Social Order," "The Individual and the State," "The Liquor Traffic," "The Home," "Marriage and Divorce," "Social Morality," "Business Ethics," "Recreation," "The Press and the Man," "Patriotism." This class meets in the church auditorium every Sunday morning from 10 to 10:45 a. m.

The church at Auburn, Neb., will erect a new house this summer at an expense of about sixteen thousand dollars. The plans as adopted provide for a building of the temple style, with Sunday-school rooms, and fully equipped basement. The membership of the church is liberal, willing, earnest and enthusiastically hopeful. The pastor, G. J. Chapman moves confidently forward in his leadership with the hearty support of the congregation.

The announcement has reached us of the calamity that has befallen Texas Christian University, Waco. The main building of the school, used for lecture rooms and dormitories, has been burned to the ground. The fire started on the fourth floor, and completely destroyed the building. The young men who were rooming in the building all escaped uninjured. The trustees were called into session the following day, and purpose to rebuild at once.

James Burkhardt, pastor of the church at Connersville, Ind., has accepted a call to the pastorate of the church at Frankfort, Ind., and will begin work with his new charge about the first of July. Mr. Burkhardt's work in Connersville has been unusually successful, beginning there in 1902 with only a small congregation poorly housed, one of the first things he did was to lead the church in a building plan which was completed in 1906, giving the church a house of worship which with the parsonage is valued at $40,000.

The church at New Paris, Ohio, has just closed a short meeting under the leadership of I. J. Cahill, during which there were twenty-one accessions to the membership and the attendance of the Sunday-school greatly increased. C. G. Baker, the pastor has accomplished a good work with the church, and has brought the work in the entire country to a degree of vigor it has never known in the past. The church in Paris is now the strongest in the town and has every promise of moving on to even greater strength.

Tht annual convention of the Christian churches of the Third District, Missouri, will be held at Aurora, May 2-5. Addresses are to be made by A. P. Finley, Springfield; F. L. Moffett, Springfield (district president); Mrs. M. E. Harlan, J. H. Jones, Ashgrove; Prof. J. R. Roberts, Springfield; W. F. Richardson, Kansas City; R. W. Blunt, Marionville; J. H. Bryan, Kansas City; J. B. Hunley, Neosho; George L. Peters, Springfield; Barclay Meador, Lebanon. Joseph Gaylor is district secretary.

H. W. Hunter, Higginsville, Mo., has displayed no mean ability at advertising in his announcement of the missionary rally which was held in his church March 31. He first sent an announcement to the membership, and then followed this with a postal headed S. O. S. (wireless Distress Signal). This signal must not fly Thursday, March 31, at the Christian Church, for every member and all our friends will come to the missionary conference. Business ability counts in the work of the church as in the work of the world.

A splendid meeting of two weeks has just closed at Mt. Zion, near Hannibal, Mo., in which there were 32 added. The preaching was done by F. W. Allen, of Paris, Mo. It was one of the very best meetings held with this church in years. During the last eight months the Sunday school has more than doubled its membership and progress is everywhere in evidence. Two new rooms have lately been added to the equipment and other improvements are to follow soon. Dean C. A. Lockhart, of Canton Bible College, preaches for this congregation.

Greencastle, Ind., March 26, 1910.—Have just returned from assisting Brother J. C. Todd of Bloomington, Ind., in a revival. Brother Todd and his good wife are very greatly beloved by the people of Bloomington. The church is one of the best in the state, and God has greatly blessed the work there. I have never met a more loyal people in their love for their pastor. It was a great pleasure to labor with them. Miss Una Dell Berry led the singing and her work gave great satisfaction. She is one of our noblest and ablest leaders of song.—J. M. Rudy.

Pastor George C. Ritchey of Newberg, Ore., recently closed a meeting with home forces which resulted in forty-eight additions. twenty-seven being by confession and baptism. Following the meeting the Ladies' Aid Society gave a very enjoyable reception to the new members. Although only about three years old, this congregation now numbers about 200. The Bible-school has an attendance of upwards of 100, and they have a teacher training class of sixty. From now on the "merger service" is to be used. Miss Ellen Flook, of Portland, led the music in the meeting, to the delight of all.

W. W. Burks, Nevada, Mo., says: "We have been having a week's rally, F. F. Walters of Joplin, assisting us. Our board had recommended to the church the plan of becoming a living link and we used the rally week to carry out the plan. The result of the offering is about $700 and we are very happy. We were at Joplin Sunday, March 20, at the First Church, filling Brother Walters's pulpit, while he was leading our people at Nevada in their campaign. He is doing a faithful work at Joplin in the face of difficulties that are not easily overcome, and his people greatly appreciate him. The Nevada church expects to lead all others this year in South Central Missouri in missionary work."

The following note from O. F. Jordan, secretary of the Chicago Christian Missionary Society tells its own story of the spirit with which the Disciples of Chicago are approaching their task: "We have put a Russian at work in Chicago this week. He is to investigate for two months and if the favorable opening exists, he will be put to work permanently. He was a priest in the orthodox church but was banished for leaving the church. He has worked for the British Bible Society in the Orient and was educated in this country for the Lutheran ministry. He is the most alert foreigner I have met in Chicago. He has been with us only a few months, but has the lingo all right, though he has along with it the modern idea of how to work in the city. I am going to run around with him tomorrow and photograph some of his subjects. He has a most thrilling story to tell of his experiences, which has the ring of the genuine with me."

From the News-Messenger of the South Broadway Church, Denver, we take the following note about the work of the Central Church: "This church has taken on new life under the inspiration of George B. Van Arsdall, the new pastor. There is a genuine revival in progress; the audiences are very large, attentive, sympathetic, and enthusiastic; from a hundred to a hundred and fifty men and women attend the midweek service. Nine persons confessed Christ last Lord's Day. Forty-five have united with the church, in various ways, during the last two months. Today the annual missionary offering will be received, the pastor hopes that a thousand dollars will be contributed. The old church falls into line as a living link church. It is safe to predict that before many months, new churches will be planted, churches of "our faith and order," in two or three places in Denver. Brother Van Arsdall is making good. The Lord be praised."

Monterey, Mexico

There have been sixteen additions to the Mexican church since the first of October. They have now about 250 members. I say "Mexican" church, for many of the brethren in the homeland do not know that we have an English speaking congregation here, to which J. H. Fuller ministers along with his superintendency of the evangelistic work, teaching in the Bible department, and editing the English edition of the Via de Paz. There have been eight added to this congregation since the first of October, all by baptism with the exception of my wife and I. We have not only an English speaking church, but also an English department in the Christian Institute. It is the desire of the Mexicans and especially among the higher class, to speak the English language. We have therefore three departments, one of which is strictly Spanish, another in which English only is used, and a third presided over by Miss Irelan, where the Mexican children are taught English. Just as soon as they are able to do their studying and reciting in the language they are enrolled in the English department. The teachers in the English school are as follows: First, second and third grades, Mrs. Alderman: fourth, fifth and sixth grades, Miss Orvis: seventh, eighth ninth and tenth grades, Miss Boyd. Nearly every room is filled to its full capacity. I have spoken this time of the English department only. Later I shall write concerning the Mexican teachers, eight in number. Shall also have something to say concerning the evangelistic department and the printing department.

The Central Church at Dayton, Ohio, has extended a call to John P. Sala who recently resigned at Elyria.

E. C. Harris has accepted a call to the church at Bedford, Ohio. Mr. Harris is a brother-in-law of W. J. Wright, former secretary of the A. C. M. S.

The Masillon Messenger is the new push paper of the church at Masillon, Ohio. It gives evidence of a useful career in its live editorials and pointed announcements.

V. G. Hostetter is holding a meeting at Cygnet, Ohio. After this he will become pastor at Charleroi, Pa. He was pastor for three years at Fostoria, Ohio.

Marion Stevenson, national superintendent of Bible-schools, will spend a few days in Des Moines, April 17-22. His work will be largely at Drake University, though he will be heard in the churches of the city.

Charles Darsie of Uhrichsville, Ohio, will preach Sunday evenings during April on the following "Questions of the Day": "The Fool's Question," "The Young Man's Question," "The Skeptics Question," "The Faith Cure Question."

H. B. McCormick has resigned at Lexington, Ohio, to take the church at Norwalk, same state. The church at Norwalk was organized by J. L. Deming who was working under the Clark Fund. The church has been pastorless since Mr. Deming went to Yale last fall.

The Bible-school at Millersburg, Ohio, where C. A. Freer, ministers was the largest Easter Sunday in the history of the school. The offering for foreign missions this year is 60 per cent above anything the church has ever made. A mission study class of about thirty-five has just been organized.

At the Jefferson Street Church, Buffalo, N. Y., there were twenty confessions on Easter Sunday and two the previous week. The Bible-school is a constant joy to the heart of the pastor, although it demands much time and pains on the part of many. There were 556 present March 27. B. S. Farrell is pastor.

J. S. Raum, state evangelist of Montana, preached for the church at Helena, Mont., during the week preceding Easter, and in the brief meeting twenty-five persons were led to make a confession of their faith. Charles W. Barnes, pastor of the church, says he will gladly answer inquiries about a position for a first class superintendent of city schools, at a salary of about $3,500.

H. G. Connelly, Ardmore, Okla., gave a sermon in the Episcopal church on Good Friday, his subject "The Atonement." He was also one of the speakers at the Easter service Sunday afternoon. The Ardmore church began the tithing system the first Sunday in March, and during the month the treasurer received more than $300. The experiment was so successful that many members decided to continue the plan. The church has been able to cancel all indebtedness and will soon begin to build.

L. E. Murray, acting pastor of the Vermont Avenue Church, Washington, D. C., preached on the following themes during passion week: Palm Sunday: Morning, "The Triumphant King"; Evening, "The Weeping Prophet," and "Nothing but Leaves," "What Think Ye of Christ?" "The Alabaster Box," "Gethsemane," "Calvary." Easter Sunday Morning, "The Resurrestion"; Evening, "An Honest Doubter." Easter Sunday there were three confessions at each service. The Sunday-school made an average of 100 more attendants during March than any preceding month.

Larned, Kans., March 21.—We continue here with immense audiences and seventy added in two weeks. Brother Small is giving us some great sermons. His sermon on the plea for the twentieth century ought to be published in the Christian Century. That one sermon will do us good here for ten years to come. Brother McKinney is leading a large chorus.—W. H. Hoff Hines.

Cincinnati, Ohio, March 21.—Pittsburg great foreign offering. East End may reach twelve hundred dollars. Ewers, pastor.—S. J. Corey.

Cincinnati.—Wonderful news from stubborn Tibet. Dr. Shelton and Ogden write nearly one hundred have burned idols at Batang and asked that Christian worship he established in homes.

Denver and Vicinity

Easter was a great day with us. The missionary offering in the Central Church was $1,090, with $150 more sure to come in. There were eight or ten additions to our church. Brother Van Arsdall has gone to Cedar Rapids, Iowa, this week to bring his family and goods to Denver.

J. H. Mohortor is in Colorado for a month, in the interest of The National Benevolent Association. He delivered a moving address in the South Broadway Church Easter Sunday morning to a congregation that more than filled the audience room.

The Colorado Christian Home was dedicated in the afternoon. Brother Mohortor delivered the address. This property has cost $20,000. There is room in the building for fifty children. This is the first of a group of buildings. "Warren Hall" is the name by which it will be known. The name is given in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Warren, who started the work by the gift of 200 acres of land. The location of the Home is ideal. Life is worth living in such days as these! Things are coming to pass! B. B. Tyler.

A Historic Occasion

The meeting of the Boston Baptist Ministers' Conference for last week was held on Wednesday, March 23, instead of Monday, in order to receive the delegation of the Pittsburg Centennial Convention of the Disciples of Christ. A large party of the Disciples sailed from Boston, Thursday, March 24, for the Holy Land, and this brought an unusually large delegation of Discipes to the meeting Wednesday morning. It was a representative gathering of the Disciples and of the Baptists of Boston and vicinity. Rev. L. A. Clevenger, D. D., President of the Conference, presided, and Rev. Gilbert L. Harney, of the Disciples, conducted the devotional services. Dr. A. McLean, President of the Christian Foreign Missionary Society, was the first speaker. He expressed the great appreciation of the Disciples of the courteous and fraternal act of the Baptist Conference in sending representatives to the Pittsburg Centennial Conference, and also for the invitation to hold the Convention of the Disciples in 1911 in Boston. "It was an act unprecedented in the religious history of America. Baptists and Disciples ought never to have separated. Eminent men of both bodies have always regretted it. The points of agreement are far more important and numerous than the points of division. On all the great principles of the Christian faith we are identical. There are but three points of difference, the meaning of baptism, the name, and communion. There is no difference on these points which cannot be overcome. The separation has lasted long enough. We should labor and pray for the union of these two great bodies." The views of Dr. McLean were fully indorsed by Rev. C. H. Watson, D. D., Baptist, of Arlington. He found himself entirely at home in the Pittsburg Convention, and received a distinctly new Christian attitude toward Christians of other names. The new relations between Baptists and Disciples will surely ripen into a bond. Dr. William R. Warren Editor of the Christian Evangelist, of St. Louis, said, "It is of vital importance that these two bodies come together. The continuation of the division is having far-reaching and unfavorable influences. The future Christianity of America is to be a high church Baptist church represented by the union of the Baptists and Disciples." Rev. O. P. Gifford, D. D., Baptist, of Brookline, Mass., said, "The Baptists have changed since the Disciples separated. They had to change to live. We must come together some way. By agitation we will start a movement which will compel union of Baptists and Disciples." Rev. S. T. Willis of New York City, Disciple, heartily indorsed the movement for union. "We can hasten the day by working together wherever possible." He proposed that where an existing Baptist church could adequately minister to the wants of a community, no new Disciples church should be started, but the Disciples should be recommended to unite and work with the Baptist church, and vice versa. He also suggested that it would prove the reality of the unity between the two bodies if Disciple ministers were occasionally called to pastorates of Baptist churches, and Baptist ministers to Disciple churches. Dr. L. A. Clevenger, President of the Boston Baptist Ministers' Conference, and Dr. A. McLean, President of the Christian Foreign Missionary Society were authorized to select a committee of six, three Baptists and three Disciples, to help on the movement toward fraternity and ultimate union, by all suitable means and on all proper occasions. It was stated that The Baptist Congress and the Disciples' Congress will meet biennially together, alternately in Baptist and in Disciple churches. In the evening of Wednesday there was a reunion and banquet of Baptists and Disciples in Lorimer Hall, Tremont Temple. After an hour of social intercourse in Gilbert Hall, the company adjourned to the banquet hall. Rev. A. Judson Hughes of Everett, Mass., happily presided, and pleasantly welcomed the representatives of both bodies. Rev. M. A. Levy of Newton Center, Mass., said he did not know whether to address the company as "Disciples and other Baptists" or "Baptists and other Disciples." He advocated getting together in faith in the common Lord Jesus Christ. Dr. Carey E. Morgan, Disciple, of Paris, Ky., presented an impressive scriptural argument against Christian divisions, and in favor of return to the primitive church unity. Creeds are divisive. We must unite in the Lordship of Christ. Rev. L. A. Clevenger, D. D., Baptist, of Somerville, Mass., said we must unite as Protestants or we shall be destroyed. Loyalty to Jesus Christ is our ground of union. Rev. H. H. Moninger, Sunday-school Representative of the Christian Standard, of Cincinnati, Ohio, said, "Only names hold us apart." He is teaching the Bible to great companies of both Baptists and Disciples. The significance of this reunion of Baptists and Disciples in Boston was acknowledged to be very great. The speaking was fraternal but frank, and not a single note of real discord was sounded during the day. It was evident that the two bodies as represented in this meeting are really one, and as Dr. Gifford said, they must come together, and such progress toward fellowship and better acquaintance is being made that they will come together. A case of denominational union cannot be forced, but suitable efforts may aid in bringing a state of things which will make it inevitable.—The Watchman (Boston).

fect, between which there is no impassable gulf, but only a straight and narrow way.

It was a kind of greatness which he would go in search of if he should come again to earth. If he should come again he would be the Good Samaritan that he was before, if there was a single man in need. It is inconceivable that he would accept exemption from the common human lot and ask to sit in ease upon a splendid throne. Did he tell men that it was more blessed to give than to receive, better to lose life than to save it, better to serve than be served? Did he say that that was the eternal order? Then why should we suppose that he would be any different if he came again? Did he cease to be servant when he became chief servant?

After twenty centuries of worship of him as Lord of Lords, and King of Kings, Very God of Very God, he has all but lost his human form. There has grown up in the church a latent conviction that he has risen above service and lowliness, and now sits among the great ones who scorn the lower seats; that being worshipped is better than serving, and that the one condition cannot be exchanged for the other; that he went through it that he might escape from it, and earned, as a reward, exemption from the law of service and humility. No wonder the church has preferred to worship, rather than to serve.

Jesus nowhere presented his person for men's worship; it was always his spirit and life for men's imitation.

This has been the worst effect of the Greek and Roman deification of knowledge and power in the realm of the spirit; the emphasis has ever since lain upon creed and government. If instead of that early equation—The Logos is the Christ—this other equation had been made, which the modern church is trying to establish—the ethical is the divine—how different would have been the history of Christianity. How hard it is to return to the most primitive kind of Christianity—the gospel of the Kingdom.

In that fatal equation Jesus lost his human serving form in the glory and splendor of the more exalted occupation of ruling. We are trying to make ourselves believe now that Jesus really meant what he said, and loved what he did,—and that there is no greatness, no Godlikeness, above the life of self-giving service. That is not divinity enough for our Christ, for we doubt whether he would assume it again.

Modern religious thought declares that that is divinity enough, and that it is the only divinity that can do the world any good. It is the only kind of divinity man can understand or respond to; and it is the one he needs. He needs to be made to feel that God really has his dwelling place in the life of humble human service; and that to find him one does not need to ascend into the heavens above, or descend into the depths below, but to enter, with clean hands, and pure heart, and loving sympathy, into the house of need next door. There, by the bedside of affliction, at the table of hunger, filling the empty chair of loneliness, where little faces peer wistfully into the night without father or mother to guide, there is where God has bestowed the secret of his presence, and there he can most quickly and surely be found by those who seek him. Surely the Lord is in this place, and we know it not; this is none other than the house of God and this is the gate to heaven.

The ancient equation—the Logos is the Christ—which, as Harnack says, "drew him into the domain of cosmology and religious philosophy," took away our Lord from human affection and helpfulness for long ages, and men knew not where they had laid him. But the new equation—the ethical is the divine—is drawing Jesus once more into the realm of human service, and is putting infinite leverage underneath the burden of the world's woe. From walking the aisles of marble temples, or sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up, Jesus has descended, and is now seen walking the dusty way where men come and go bearing their daily burdens, one with them, in toil and sorrow. At evening he may be found, as long ago, in the home of Mary and Martha; in the morning out on the highway where lepers meet him, and blind eyes strain eagerly for the shadow of his passing, and cry out, "Thou Son of David, have mercy on us."

"Behold him now where he comes!
Not the Christ of our subtle creeds,
But the light of our hearts, of our homes,
Of our hopes, our prayers, our needs;
The brother of want and blame,
The lover of women and men,
With a love that puts to shame,
All passions of mortal ken."

Missions and Benevolence

"The Ainslie-McCash Parliaments"

The president of the American Christian Missionary Society hitherto has filled the office of presiding officer for the day of the convention, or fraction thereof, announcing committees and delivering the annual address. It has been thought that a larger service could be rendered by the man selected by the great Brotherhood for such a position than that usually rendered. In keeping with that idea, arrangements have been completed by the secretary, by which President Ainslie obtains leave of absence from the Tabernacle Church in Baltimore, Md., to deliver addresses in a series of "parliaments" preparatory to the annual May offering.

This itinerary will begin at Lexington, Ky., on April 12, and will be in the nature of a "parliament," concluding with a banquet and inspirational address. The "parliament" will deal with the practical phases of the establishment, extension and maintenance of the Churches of Christ in our homeland. The difficulties involved in the city and rural churches will be considered. Pithy, pointed, practical suggestions will compensate all who attend.

The second meeting will be at Louisville, Ky., April 13, followed by St. Louis, April 14, Kansas City, April 15; Lincoln, Neb., April 16; Cedar Rapids, Iowa, April 18; Springfield, Ill., April 19; Indianapolis, April 20; Cleveland, April 21; Cincinnati, April 22, and Pittsburg, April 23.

A widespread interest already awakened in the plan betokens a large attendance and greater things for the home missionary work.

Now for a Large May Offering

We ought to have a great May Offering for Home Missions this year for the following reasons, at least:

1. The whole work of our American Christian Missionary Society needs to be enlarged. The opportunities are nation-wide.

2. We ought to honor this great Society for what she has done. Many of the most splendid churches of our brotherhood were planted or helped by her. Cities like Topeka, Wichita and Lawrence, Kansas, for example, and hundreds of others in the East and West and South have received timely aid. Let us show our appreciation of what she has done by helping her royally now.

3. This is the time to cheer the hearts of our new secretaries. I. N. McCash and Grant K. Lewis are names that stand for the best things among us. Let us make their hearts glad by our loyal and enthusiastic support.

4. If we are interested by a world-wide proclamation of the gospel, we can demonstrate that interest by helping our Home Society. The way to the ends of the earth is by way of America. If we can not or will not save open-minded, large-hearted, cheerful-faced, bright-eyed Americans, how can we hope to reach ignorant, superstitious, sad-faced, down-trodden Asia? If we will not save this land, we can not save other lands.

5. This is the nick of time. There never was a day before like this for Home Missions. The whole situation is unique, and the field is wide-open for us. The people hunger for the gospel! There is a growing desire everywhere for Christian union,—nothing like it ever before in this land. Our success is a constant inspiration to all good people, and almost a wonder to ourselves.

Let all as one man strike now.

F. M. Rains.

Something New for Our Colleges

A new and larger vision of home missions has come to our colleges and universities. A practical plan has received the unqualified endorsement of presidents, professors and enthusiastic acceptance by bands of students in all the educational institutions where proposed.

The plan was suggested by Secretary I. N. McCash, and presented by him to the following schools, where bands are organizing, —Valparaiso, Eureka, Christian University, Mo., Transylvania and Bible College, Lexington, Ky., Johnson Bible College, Milligan College, Virginia Christian College, Bethany College, Hiram College, Drake and Cotner Universities and Butler College. To our other schools the same will be submitted as rapidly as opportunity permits.

The plan in brief is this. A definite territory, state or province, unoccupied, or partially occupied by the Disciples of Christ, is assigned to each school, and the students who will pledge themselves to make that assigned region their field of life labors, form a band under the name of their chosen territory. They will study the climate, geography, history, resources, strategic points, present and prospective government, educational system, and prepare themselves to do pioneer work. A chosen field will give definiteness and adaptation to the students' preparation.

The bands are composed of seniors and lower classmen, so that all of a band may not go to a field this year. Those who go first will be able to open the way for the coming of their comrades in service, in later years. This band is not a colony, but permanent workers in strategic parts of each state. They are sentinels of the Lord's army; scouts of a conquering host.

Some of the advantages of such a plan are apparent, and commend themselves as being far-reaching in their results.

1. This plan will shape the career of many young men.

2. The colleges will be enlisted, as never before, in the evangelization of our homeland, and from the territory of their bands will be drawn an increasing college patronage. Graduates everywhere will feel a personal pride in an enterprise carried forward by alumni of their alma mater, and will help support those engaged in it.

In order to meet the great demand for Sample Copies of the Bethany Graded Lessons the publishers have decided to send out Returnable samples of the complete line of supplies—Beginners', Primary and Junior—(excepting the large Beginners' pictures). Accompanying the samples a bill will be sent for $1.09, the regular price of the set. The recipient may do one of three things: (1) He may return the samples uninjured after examination. (2) He may remit $1.09 and keep the samples. Or (3) he may return the bill with his Sunday school's order for supplies and the publishers will mark it "paid." In writing for sample copies please say "Returnable."

3. The coming of such a band of workers to live, love, labor and die with them, will hearten struggling congregations and give great joy to the scattered sheep of His field.

4. They will be helpers of each other in the hardships of a new country, and become part of the religious, civic and educational life, and shape its laws. Among such bands will be founders of new colleges,—Milligans, Carltons, Lasuses, Vawters, Carpenters, with Drakes to endow them.

The territories assigned to the various colleges for which bands of students are being formed, are as follows:

Valparaiso,a North Dakota Band; Eureka, an Idaho Band; Christian University, Canton, a Saskatchewan Band; Lexington, an Alberta Band; Johnson Bible College, an Arizona Band; Milligan College, a New Mexico Band; Virginia Christian College, a Utah Band; Bethany College, a Wyoming Band; Hiram College, a Michigan Band; Drake University, a British Columbia and West Washington Band; Cotner University, a Minnesota Band; Butler College, a North California Band. The other colleges have not yet been visited by the Secretary.

In the same colleges visited there are bands being organized for Georgia, and the great body of students is considering the Eastern and Southern States as well as the Northern and Western. The newness of the Western field calls loudly for pioneer work in order to secure property advantages before lands and lots become so expensive as to prohibit entrance into the growing cities. The Secretary has exercised impartial interest in all parts of our lands, and urged the students to prepare themselves with the probable territory of their life work in mind. The above list expresses the definite preparation on the part of groups organizing.

Such an aroused interest in home missions has evolved definite work, and a specific proposition to the churches and disciples of our Lord who are blessed with means. Three hundred thousand dollars are needed to protect what has been already created, and to inaugurate what duty and opportunity demand shall be undertaken. Let "all come up to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty."

The Greatest March Yet

The receipts for Foreign Missions during March were the largest the Foreign Society ever received in that month. They amounted to $57,730.41, a gain of $3,807. The gain was not as much as was expected, but it is the highest mark ever reached for this month.

Already twenty-two new Living-link churches have responded and more are expected.

The churches are requested to forward their gifts as promptly as possible. No doubt April will be a great month. Send to F. M. Mains, Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Notes from the Foreign Society

B. F. Clay secured $1,385 from special friends in Kentucky for the school building in Shanghai, China.

A friend in Indiana turned over $3.000 to the Foreign Society on the Annuity Plan.

The Linwood Boulevard Church, Kansas City, Mo., B. A. Jenkins, pastor, enters the Living-link column this year.

The church at Lawrenceville, Ill., continues the support of Mrs. F. E. Hagin in Japan. H. C. Holmes is the minister.

A. F. Hensey and wife returns to Bolenge, Africa, May 28.

Dr. R. J. Dye and other missionaries are making active preparation to rebuild the mission steamer, the "S. S. Oregon." The steamer has reached the Congo by this time. It will be floating on the Upper Congo within a few months.

G. M. Brooks, Carlesle, Ky., a live "layman" is working industriously to secure $600 from the churches in Nicholas County towards the support of the work of J. C. Ogden at Batang, border of Tibet, who was raised in that country.

At a recent service on Sunday morning at the Bethany, Nebraska, Church, H. O. Pritchard called for volunteers for the mission field, and thirty-three young men and women walked to the platform and offered themselves for foreign service.

That the spiritual awakening created by the union evangelistic meetings, which ended three weeks ago, remains unabated is evidenced by the fact that since that time large and enthusiastic audiences have been in attendance at each meeting, while the number attending each weekly prayer meeting has doubled. Over thirty persons have been baptized since the great revival was brought to a close.

One of the most eventful periods in the history of this church was Wednesday evening, March 23, the occasion being the formal opening of the new pipe organ recently installed. The program opened by prayer by the Rev. L. N. D. Wells, pastor of the church, following which Mr. L. Carroll Beckel, the organist, rendered several choice selections, much to the delight of all who heard him. Mrs. Beckel, soprano, sang three solos. Sufficient money has already been subscribed to nearly offset the cost and installation of this instrument.

The Men's Club of Ampere (which is an offspring of the Park Avenue Church of the Disciples of Christ) held its first public entertainment at this church on March 16, when Booker T. Washington delivered a lecture to over 1,000 people. The subject of his talk was "The Progress of the Colored Race," and in the course of his remarks, he gave a brief history of the Tuskegee Institute, of Tuskegee, Ala., of which he is the founder. The large audience was most generous in displaying its enthusiasm and delight in the philosophy and devoted purpose of this great leader of the black race. L. M. BREWER.

Texas Christian University at Waco Burned

The main building of this university burned last Tuesday night. It was by far the largest college building in the southwest and the largest in the brotherhood. It cost about $130,000, and contained a library worth about $15,000, laboratories about $4,000, pianos and organs about $3,000, and furniture about $20,000. Total insurance, $29,000.

The building had four stories, including classrooms, chapel, library, laboratories, administration rooms, society halls, business college rooms, museum and about sixty student living rooms. It was located upon an eminence in the edge of the city and was visible for fifteen and twenty miles around.

Some students saved most of their belongings, but some students and teachers lost everything. The university records, safe and business papers were all saved by the presence of mind and earnest efforts of the business manager, Professor J. F. Anderson. The Waco fire department rendered valuable assistance in saving two other large brick buildings that stood near by. Fortunately the wind was favorable. President's home was saved only by hard work, as it stood in the path of a rain of fire from the burning building. One frame house was set on fire twice, four blocks away.

The fire occurred at 8 p. m., when most students were at their studies; they worked manfully to save their own property, that of fellow students and of the university. No lives were lost and only slight injuries were sustained in handling furniture. All the buildings were vacated immediately; but those that remain were reoccupied as soon as the fire had wrought its work. The girls' home, the dining hall, music building, the gymnasium, the printing house and the president's home were practically uninjured.

While the fire was raging the announcement was made by the president and business manager to the people on the campus that work would be resumed at once in the buildings that stand. Next morning chapel was held in the dining room, with all students, teachers, and many citizens of Waco present; and it was there announced that no department nor class would be discontinued, but that arrangements were being made for all classwork to resume next day. The gymnasium was partitioned into classrooms, and all available rooms in other buildings were utilized for classes. No students left on account of the fire. Real enthusiasm prevailed. The citizens of Waco assured the university that the building should be reconstructed and highly complimented the wonderful spirit of the institution in the hour of deepest discouragement. Later many thousands of dollars were pledged in the city for a new building. The Waco baseball league played two benefit games with the T. C. U. team, netting about $500. The college team had lost nearly all of its property, but in borrowed clothes and unused gloves, right out of the excitement of the fire, outplayed the city league, composed of some of the best players, gathered up from all over the land. T. C. U. teams have been doing the like of that for years. The same spirit prevailed in all other forms of university work and life. A spirit never dies; and the falling of brick and mortar cannot extinguish it.

A meeting of the friends of the university is called for the 29th in Waco to consider the next important steps. While Waco will put up probably nearly $100,000, it is probable that other cities will bid heavily for the university. Waco is a fine city, and students and teachers are much attached to it; yet all feel that the best thing for the university should be done. The trustees are disposed to act advisedly for the future good of a great cause. They fully realize the crisis that the fire has brought to them. They are asking the advices of thoughtful brethren from all over the state before making any decisions. If the subscriptions recently made to the debt fund will be paid unconditionally, the university, with certain other assets, can clear all indebtedness. The property today is probably worth $135,000, insurance $29,000. Other assets will just about balance liabilities except the incalculable fund of friendship that the institution has won in all the southwest. It is known as one of the most vigorous, enterprising, scholarly and progressive universities in the southland. Its reputation is rather astonishing when it is considered that it has only four hundred students. In large measure the scholarship and push of its faculty have won the place it has in public confidence. Students quickly catch the spirit of their teachers.

It may be some time before definite plans can be announced for the future, but the brotherhood will be kept advised regarding these matters. I beg to express thanks to scores of good people who have sent letters of sympathy and hopefulness. We appreciate the generous feeling toward us rising up all over the country. Some of these expressions are assuming a very real form, the promise of liberal gifts when we are ready to rebuild.

Why Depart?

To a Young Man Contemplating Departure from the Ministry of the Disciples of Christ to Another Religious Body

Dear Brother: We have learned with some concern that you are inclined to believe that you could find a more congenial field of activity in the ministry of another denomination, and that you are about to resign your work with this brotherhood and betake yourself elsewhere. Will you permit us to talk with you quite frankly regarding this plan of yours? We are sure that you will not misunderstand our concern in the matter. We have no feeling of resentment or chagrin that you should take this step. We recognize your entire freedom to choose for yourself the path which seems most likely to bring you to usefulness and true success.

More than this, we are genuinely anxious that every young man in the ministry should work in congenial circumstances as far as possible, and we believe it his duty to discover the place where it seems to him as he prayerfully considers the matter, he can render most efficient service in the task of proclaiming the will of God. In this feeling we are not willing to be biased even by any denominational desire that all men of your type should consider relations with our own people the most desirable in which they could be placed. We have a not unnatural pride in our own brotherhood, but we are not without the knowledge that other Christian bodies have associations and friendships of the same sort, and that to participate in the traditions and privileges of several of these great organizations is no small satisfaction.

We should even be willing to go further than this. So confident are we that one who has seen something of the glory of that plea which the Disciples make for the oneness of the people of God can never quite release himself from its spell that we are quite content that a reasonable number of our young men should go into the ministry of other churches, there to interpret the principles which they have learned with us. Particularly are we hopeful that a considerable exchange of this character can be practiced between the Disciples and the Baptists, leading to closer unity and ultimate union. And within wide limits we believe that just such exchanges between ourselves and other Christian bodies will not be without excellent results in bringing about a better understanding of our relations one to another and to Master of us all.

It is because of these inclinations to approve a certain amount of interchange of this character, and the confidence it gives us that we are not influenced by merely selfish considerations, that we are the more concerned to point out to you some of the factors that seem to be involved in your departure from the fellowship of the Disciples, and your contemplated relationship with another people. We have reason to believe that you have been led to this step by some of the difficulties you have encountered in your ministry among the Disciples, and your belief that these difficulties would largely disappear from your personal ministry if you went elsewhere.

You have found the Disciples of Christ largely an unorganized people, in comparison with the centralized and efficient Christian forces around us. You have felt that we are losing a large amount of our power in those spaces that lie between pastorless churches and churchless pastors. You have felt that the looseness of our organization permits the depredations of unworthy men to go unrebuked. You feel that we have been too frequently disgraced by ministers who escaped the indignation of one church only to impose themselves on the credulity of another.

Again you are discontented with the conservatism which too many of our churches and ministers exhibit. You have become impatient when you have seen newspapers filled with controversy over evolution and biblical criticism and you knew that most intelligent people have passed out of that initial stage of modern religious life and are making constructive and inspiring use of these great disciplines. You are wondering whether you will not have a life-long struggle to preach a gospel which is intelligent, fresh and effective if the churches are to be controlled by men of the reactionary type. And perhaps there are other problems that have given you concern. Perhaps you have come to feel that the debate over baptism is fruitless and trivial, that it partakes too much of the spirit of tithing mint, anise and cummin, and forgets the weightier matters of the law, mercy, justice and truth.

But will you not stop to consider some of the other elements involved in your decision? You are proposing to go out from a company of people, young in years, buoyant in spirit, intensely devoted to the cause of the Gospel, full of the passion to win the world, not simply to themselves, but to Christ, and entering upon their second century with a deepening sense of responsibility and a wider vision of their powers.

You are proposing to leave a fellowship such as we confidently believe you will find nowhere else on earth. We do not mean alone that other religious bodies have not something of that warmth of appreciation, that devotion to their own people, which the Disciples have, although from a fairly wide acquaintance we have reasons for believing that the appreciation of the brethren one for another, the sense of interest in each other, and the devotion to all things that represent the cause, is keener with the Disciples than any people we know. But what is more, you are going out from your own people to those who can never know you as we do. You will never find elsewhere, believe us, the same sentiments of good will and appreciation that you may here enjoy. We know the story of many who have taken the step you now contemplate, and we believe that we are speaking with awareness on this point.

If it is the conservatism of the Disciples that concerns you, we have two things to say. The first is that we know of no religious people with any convictions worth mentioning that does not have the same problem of a reluctant and hesitant, perhaps even a polemical, conservatism. This is true not only of the denominations that have a name for rock-ribbed orthodoxy, but it is also true of those who pride themselves on their liberalism. The man who wishes to be a free man in the service of Jesus Christ has problems to face wherever he may go. But the second thing we wish to say is that if you are seeking a place where the work of leading men out of twilight into the day has already been accomplished, and you have only to enter into the fruits of other men's labors, your going will be no loss to the Disciples, and your coming will be a misfortune to any who may welcome you.

The ministry is no place for seekers after easy tasks. Rightly interpreted, it takes as much heroism to be a minister today as in the times of the martyrs, and this we believe is the chief attraction the ministry has for young men of the type we have believed you to represent. If you want a place where you can prosper without hard labor and can preach a full gospel without danger of hurting anyone's feelings, you may find it elsewhere, though we doubt it this side of the millenium. Take your path, and the Lord be with you. But if you want a place where every power you have can be utilized in the development of a great, a growing, a noble-hearted and an appreciative brotherhood, then stay where you are, plan the greatest things of which you are capable, accept the humblest tasks that fall to your hands, and count upon the divine blessing which comes without measure to those who help to bring in the kingdom of God.

Baptism and Dogma

Editors The Christian Century: If I get your view on the baptism question, it is that you would treat a candidate for baptism just as Methodists do, except that whereas they suggest and urge affusion, you would advocate immersion, the principle of freedom of choice being the same in both cases.

You assert, if I understand, that to act otherwise would be to affect dogmatism, and this you reject, at least with reference to baptism. Now a question. If we should not be dogmatic about baptism, why should we be so about the divinity of Jesus? Why not allow the candidate for church membership freedom of choice in his view of the nature of Christ?

I shall be glad to have an unequivocal reply from you, through the paper, on this matter. Fraternally,

B. H. CLEAVER.

Lewiston, Ill.

It is clear from the above letter that Mr. Cleaver entirely misconceives The Christian Century's view of baptism. If so clear-headed a reader as he has failed to understand our utterances, it calls upon us to present a resumé and restatement of our position not for his benefit alone, but for those who read with less discernment. We shall try, therefore, to be as "unequovical" as possible.

The Christian Century adheres to the accepted custom of the Disciples of Christ in the practice of immersion only. How the conception implied in Mr. Cleaver's first paragraph above could be deduced from any of our statements we cannot imagine.

We see reasons enough why no other form except immersion should be administered. Among these reasons the only one that we have felt it necessary to state is the fact that the practice of any form except immersion is divisive and is bound to continue to be divisive as long as there is an immersionist conscience in Christendom. The practice of immersion only, is not divisive; it is unifying; all evangelical churches already practice it; it is the common denominator of the baptisms.

Apart from other reasons this one consideration alone is decisive with us because of our conviction that there should be no divisions among God's people. Pleading for union as we do we would be inconsistent if not dishonest were we to do those things which have been and still are the occasions of division in Christ's church.

If any reader will point out how a Baptist church and a Congregational church, for example, in a local community can unite, without the sacrifice of conscience, upon the practice of any other form of initiation than immersion only, he will make a distinct contribution to the problem of Christian union.

In its adherence to the prevailing practice of the Disciples of Christ on the baptism question The Christian Century is not guided by dogmatic considerations. We do not believe that immersion is essential to salvation. Neither do we believe that it is an arbitrary test of faith. Nor do we believe that immersed Christians show signs of having been buried with Christ and rising with him to walk in newness of life, which sprinkled Christians do not show.

To our mind the immersion dogma is pure fiction, as most dogmas are. It is based upon a literalistic method of reading the Bible. It assumes a legal relationship of God to man which is to us, intellectually unthinkable and morally repugnant. It makes God finical. It puts Christ in the attitude of contradicting in his great commission what he had been teaching through his entire ministry.

It is not dogma, therefore, that is decisive in our advocacy of the Disciples' position, but the love of Christ. We believe that the unification of the forces of evangelical Christianity is the immediate, imperative and most conspicuous duty that fronts the church today. To allow the scandal of sectarianism to continue while we argue longer about the immersion dogma, or any other dogma, is a sin against Christ. His prayer for the unity of his disciples constitutes the most mandatory commandment which rests upon the church.

Our decisive, if not supreme, reason, then, for practicing immersion and immersion only, is not that Christ commands it—that is a point in dispute among Christ's followers, with a probable great majority denying that he does command it—but that Christ's prayer commands Christian union, and the practice of any other form save immersion hinders and indefinitely postpones the answer to the Master's prayer.

As to the candidate's "freedom of choice" in his view of the nature of Christ we have only to say that we do allow such freedom, and the Disciples have always allowed it and taken pride in the fact that with them no particular theological classification of Jesus was regarded as prerequisite to church membership. Probably it will be difficult to find two independent minds among us who agree in their conceptions of the nature of Jesus. Faith in Christ, the Disciples have always taught, is not an intellectual classification of him, but a personal acceptance of him as divine Leader, Lord and Savior.

The one thing which, from the very start, the Disciples of Christ have opposed is the setting up of a human creed or dogma as a test of fellowship.

Whether that dogma is on the subject of future punishment, eternal predestination, the so-called Trinity, the nature of Christ, immersion-baptism, or any other subject—the essential principle and true spirit of the Disciples' movement for Christian union will not tolerate that it be made a cause of division among Christ's people.

The visit of Mr. Roosevelt to Rome developed even more plainly than that of Mr. Fairbanks the intolerant attitude of the Vatican toward all who are not the open adherents of the Roman Catholic faith. It was a semblance of excuse for the conduct of papal authorities in declining to have Mr. Fairbanks presented to the Pope after he had made an address before the Methodist church in Rome. It is, of course, well-known that the relations between the Pope and the Protestants in the Eternal City are exceedingly hostile. Protestantism has been making so many inroads upon papal authority that the Vatican is unwilling to grant the least recognition to any who represent Protestant interests. But Mr. Roosevelt had made no arrangements of any sort to address the Protestants, nor did he intend to do so. He came as a visitor of note, the most distinguished American of his time, and the conduct of the Pope in refusing to receive him unless he put himself under bonds to keep the peace, as it were, was an affront so unwarranted as to make impossible any interview. The Christian churches throughout the world will be thankful that Mr. Roosevelt preserved the dignity of an American citizen and a Christian in an incident which so thoroughly illustrates the spirit of medievalism in the Roman church. Those most humiliated by the incident are the Roman Catholics themselves, many of whom, if their own expressions are to be trusted, feel that a grave and unwarranted mistake was made by the Vatican authorities by their conduct on this occasion.

The Central Young Men's Christian Association of Chicago is engaged in a heroic effort to greatly increase its endowment fund, which received new impulse a year ago, when the association celebrated its fiftieth anniversary. At that time steps were made to increase the endowment by a fresh gift of $1,000,000. Nearly three-fourths of this was raised. During the present week the effort is being made not only to complete this subscription, but to add about $150,000 more, so that several of the departments of the association may share in the benefits along with the central department. It seems almost an impossible thing to accomplish, yet with 100 canvassers the daily work is being pushed with such persistence that the promise of success within the brief period planned is excellent. A great dial has been placed prominently in the business section of the city, on which the moving hand indicates the growth of the subscription towards the sum total of $1,150,000. When this immense task is achieved it is probable that the largest single endowment for religious purposes ever made will have been completed.

The question of the unification of our missionary work continues to receive increasing attention. The examples of most of our religious neighbors would seem to show the advantage of such a combination of executive action. It is the feeling where the plan of unification has been tried that much friction between the various missionary interests is avoided, and many economies are rendered possible that hitherto were beyond reach. The Disciples need to reduce their missionary machinery to a businesslike and satisfactory method by such a unification of their forces. People need to be educated to missionary and philanthropic work, rather than to some particular form of missions and philanthropy.

We are very glad to note the fact that the American Christian Missionary Society is pursuing the plan of organizing a campaign for its president, Peter Ainslie of Baltimore. Arrangements have been made for him to address representative gatherings of Disciples in quite a number of the leading cities of our brotherhood. We are certain that his message will emphasize the great issues now before the Disciples, and put appropriate insistence upon the work of this decade, the first in our second century. This campaign is in harmony with a suggestion made by The Christian Century some weeks ago, and it is our conviction that the results will be of immensely valuable character.

The Suffering of the Righteous

In the first chapter of Job the suffering of the righteous is a test of sincerity and disinterestedness. It is boldly asserted that Job fears God because it pays in worldly possessions and that if prosperity forsakes him he will renounce God. Job, however, holds fast to his integrity when he knows that all his property is gone and his children are dead. This test of faith is of immense practical use today. Every disciple of Jesus has a chance to meet it. There is no need of creating arbitrary tests of men's integrity; those who do this get for themselves the reputation of fanatics and fools. The work of the world compels good men to suffer if they are loyal to their convictions. The man outside the church believes in the church when churchmen have sensible plans for the betterment of the world and are willing to sacrifice for the sake of the gospel.

The great, original thinkers of religion have endured much. Not out of the study of the philosopher, but out of the hard experiences of common life have come the satisfying interpretations of experience. Why this should be so we may not be able to understand, but that it is so hardly admits of doubt. It was Jeremiah, the persecuted prophet of Judah's last days, who saw the truth of individualism in religion and created an epoch in the history of faith. The author of our salvation was himself made perfect through suffering. The insight of the easy-going man is never profound. His thinking is of the surface variety. In our more serious moments we have no confidence in his judgment. His statements about spiritual matters are usually sheer nonsense.

The road to freedom is through suffering. If we make it the first and most important rule of our lives to avoid pain, we shall be the slaves of animalism. Of course it is our duty to fight pain. The bodily afflictions of men challenge us to the warfare against disease. There is no virtue in a high death rate. We have no right to feel pious because we are sick. We ought to be ashamed of ourselves for violating the laws of health. Nevertheless, they are slaves who seek nothing larger than personal comfort. The world does not seem to be constructed for the benefit of men and women who choose to live without taking thought for anything except their own convenience. Extraordinary stupidity may keep such persons from discovering the slavery of this sort of life.

The friends of Job reasoned that sin had brought upon him his troubles. It was the common opinion of the day that all suffering was due to sin. The extreme misfortune of Job was accepted as evidence that he was a great sinner. He was merely experiencing the punishment merited by his wickedness. There was, then, no problem of the suffering righteous in Job's day. The righteous man was supposed to be prosperous and happy. The favor of God was manifested in the warding off of ruin to his property and of disease that threatened his body. The man who experienced trouble regarded himself as a sinner. But Job was unwilling to deny the testimony of his own conscience and submit the judgment of his conduct to external circumstances. Since he could not see any reason in his past life for the calamities with which he was afflicted, he stoutly refused to admit that they were due to his sin. He declared himself free from the prevailing opinion and he won the freedom of all men who receive instruction from him.

If we wish to have fellowship with the benefactors of the race, we must not shun the painful tasks. The book of Job does not give us the final word on the problem of suffering. When we read its last sentence, we have not had our questions answered. Jesus reminded his disciples that when they were persecuted they ought to rejoice, for so were the prophets of old treated. We estimate ourselves by the company we keep. The deserter from the army finds himself put in a class that he abhors. The satisfaction the old soldier has in looking over his army record is in a very large measure due to the feeling that he belongs to the company of patriotic men of all ages. He likes the company in which he is placed. We may not be pleased with the way this world is run and we may say what we think are wise things about the laws to which we are compelled to submit, but unless we endure hardness neither we nor anybody else will be ignorant of the fact that we belong to the class of parasites. Suffering is redemptive and the real benefactors of the world are giving themselves for its redemption. We cannot be of much use in relieving distress and in turning men from sin if we stand in a sheltered and comfortable corner and watch the weak and ignorant and sinful as they struggle against evil conditions and evil passions.

Rome and Politics

The Roosevelt incident in Rome illustrates the persistency with which the Roman church clings to its ancient ecclesiastic privileges and attempts to enforce them in matters of modern times. American politicians are careful not to offend the Catholic vote, for there is yet an awesome regard for the power of the priest to influence his people in any matter that impinges on the welfare of the church.

The chief political interests of Rome today center in France, where an election is coming soon and the Briand Ministry has the enmity of Rome for having made the schools state instead of church institutions. The ecclesiastics are centering all power for its defeat and the restoration of education to the church. It is a safe prophecy that France will never give up her schools to Rome again.

To Pension 17,000,000 Workers

The French Senate has passed Premier Briand's bill for the pensioning of the working aged. It will benefit some 17,000,000 people. Those who are sixty-five years of age and have been working for thirty years will be eligible to its benefits. The law will obligate workingmen to contribute $1.80, women $1.20, and children 90c per annum. The employer must make an equal contribution. The state will contribute about $36,000,000 per year, the remainder of what it is estimated will be necessary to meet the obligations involved. The pensions will run from $83.00 per year up to about $140.00. The benefits are thus fairly comparable to those of the British law.

The Deputies will doubtless pass the measure substantially as it came from the senate. It will add greatly to the popularity of the Briand Ministry and bring great relief to the aged poor of the republic. With the economical habits of life and the lower cost of living in France, what would seem a small sum to us will prove a great boon and relieve much distress as well as largely abolish the expenses of poor relief.

Mr. Carnegie's Belated Ethics

Mr. Carnegie says many wise and wholesome things. His advocacy of peace and his ideas on many economic issues have marked him for a man of large and generous nature, possessing the true spirit of the statesman and philanthropist. But his lament over the Pittsburg grafters is pathetic, not so much because of the weeping of the Laird himself as for the fact that he would weep over self-confessed looters of public confidence and traders in public trust. "He gave money for the vacation of that street," says the tearful millionaire, "and he thought it was alright, no doubt. I am sure he thought it was alright and if I were a member of that committee up above I would pardon him sure. He didn't know the rascals he was dealing with." Who were the rascals? None but the men St. Andrew's virtuous friend bribed and whose greater crime must have been that they afterwards confessed that he bribed them. Poor, honest millionaire who "gave money for the vacation of that street" and who "thought it was alright, no doubt"! Diabolical deceivers who took that honest money and then confessed that they took it and so involved the good man who gave it to them! Surely our aged, canny Scot has suffered from a revival of some old time ethics of the Homestead days. It is a sad moral lapse for one of his eminent preaching ability and unusually high civic standards.

What Massachusetts Thinks of the Tariff

It will be recalled that the Republican majority of 60,000 was reduced to one of but 8,000 last autumn, while Mr. Foss, candidate for lieutenant-governor, was defeated by but 5,000. This was no doubt because one of the great manufacturing states of the union was not pleased with stand-pat tariff leaders. This same Eugene B. Foss has just recently been elected to Congress on the Democratic ticket by a plurality of over 5,000, in a district that is Republican by more than 14,000. His campaign was an avowed attack on the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill.

There were doubtless other considerations entering into the campaign, but no minor considerations could account for a total turnover of nearly 20,000 votes. Mr. Foss was once a Republican, but his radical tariff reform ideas drove him into the ranks of the opposition. His whole political career has been one of radical protest against high tariff, therefore his victory is all the more signally a defeat for the Payne-Aldrich law.

Massachusetts is the most nearly an exclusively manufacturing state of any in the union. A larger percentage of her people live in factory towns and by factory work than any other. Her tendency toward tariff reform shows that she is not convinced that the present high tariff is fulfilling its functions as even a protective measure, but has come to be the means of defeating the small manufacturer by increasing the power of the trust, and instead of helping the workingman, hurts him by raising the cost of living, taxing out the raw product, and making the trust so powerful that his wages are lowered, while the larger profit goes into the pocket of the monopoly. In other words, the tariff principle, enacted to increase the workingman's wages, has run to seed and become the entrenched privilege of corporate monopoly.

Chicago's Saloon Fight

The invalidating of the Chicago local option petition reveals the size of the scare thrown into the saloon crowd by the effort to take a vote in that city. It is now revealed that the decision of the election commissioners that a man was not a registered voter within the meaning of the statute was only a part of the means used to get away from the consequences of a vote. The fact seems to be that the commissioners had no right to so much as examine the petition at all or to pass upon the question of what constituted a valid petitioner under the statute. If this be so, their offense was not in ruling the election out on a technicality alone, but in usurping judicial powers and making any examination of the petition.

The same contention was made before the commissioners at Springfield, Ill., and a judge of the Circuit Court cited the opinion of two previous test cases in ruling that the commissioners were not the proper authorities to examine the petition. The Attorney General of the state gave the same opinion. A few days previous to the Chicago decision by the commissioners, the Supreme Court of Michigan decided a like case for that state and denied that such a power existed. It will thus be seen that there was plenty of precedent for the election commissioners to refuse to go behind the face of the petition, and none for their action in usurping judicial powers, let alone in the giving of an unjudicial decision after usurping them.

Illinois Local Option Elections

The liquor interests profess great satisfaction with the result of the local option election in Illinois. They won back several of the larger cities and lost but one or two. Among the smaller towns, the great majority are yet with the "drys." Clinton, Decatur, Dixon, Mattoon, Rockford, and Pontiac went back to the "wet" column. In three cases the majority was much smaller than that of the "drys" two years ago, and in no case was it large at all. Canton and Monmouth went "dry," while Galesburg, Carbondale, Champaign, and Urbana remain in the "dry" column. Springfield, Bloomington and Lincoln remain "wet." The net results are that the "wets" won in 111 towns and cities, while the "drys" won in 131. The vote for the "wets" in the larger places gives them a majority of the total vote cast, but it must be remembered that few of the safe "dry" towns voted, while many of the safe "wet" ones were put to the test, and the fact that the "wets" may claim the majority testifies to nothing more than that the "drys" dared most where doubts were greatest.

Is the election a reversal? Not at all. Anti-saloon gains are to be always counted net. That all the remarkable gains of two years ago could be held, even the most sanguine never expected. That the final settlement is more nearly effected now than two years ago, none will conclude. Two years hence several of these cities and many of these towns will be won back, while others will be lost, but the net victory will be increasingly for the "drys" as time goes on. With a county option law it is safe to say that 90 per cent of the state outside the larger cities will go "dry" and stay "dry." Without a county option law, thousands are practically disfranchised from voting on the question in the towns and villages where the only saloons that affect them are conducted. A Search and Seizure Act will make the law effective and it is safe to say that the reversals are more due to lack of enforcement than to any other cause.

Socialist Victory in Milwaukee

The most surprising city election in the country on April 5 was that in Milwaukee. The Socialists won the election by a plurality of 8,000, the largest ever given any party in the city's history. In round numbers their candidate, Emil Seidel, received 28,000 votes, while the Democratic candidate received 20,000, and the Republican but 11,000. The entire Socialist ticket was also elected. They elected all six of the aldermen-at-large, and carried fourteen out of the twenty-three wards. This will give them absolute control of the municipality and prove an interesting experiment in American city government for the next two years at least.

Milwaukee is practically a German city. A majority of its population were either born in Germany or are of German parentage. Fully one-third of its population were born abroad. Its type of life is Germanic and its politics is now such as that of most German cities would be if every man had a vote and there was no coercion in the Fatherland. Its socialism is also of the same brand. The nervous need not be alarmed. Milwaukee Socialists do not carry firebrands nor decry all property holding. The new administration was elected on a platform that was practically the same as that upon which both the candidates of the old parties ran. It demanded the Initiative and Referendum, an eight-hour working day, three-cent car fares with a seat for every passenger, municipal ownership of such natural monopolies as light, telephone and transportation, clean street cars (by the Glasgow plan), municipal ice plant, and that the corporations be compelled to pay taxes equitably with other property. Both the old party platforms demanded practically the same items.

It seems the people wanted the Socialists to have a try. The other parties had made and broken promises until they had forfeited any right to confidence. Thus it is that the people of one of the most misgoverned cities in the country turn to the most radical party for a solution of their perplexities.

The Children of the Poor and the Death Rate

The Milk Committee of New York City has finished a canvass to determine the relative death rate for children among the rich and the poor. They found the birth rate to be approximately one to every two hundred per annum among the rich, and one to every eighteen among the poor. The death rate for children under one year was practically a negligible quantity among the rich, while among the poor it was one out of every twenty-five.

These figures are hardly conclusive, however significant as they are as an index. They covered too short a time, and being made in characteristic districts only, have not the scope that other investigations have given.

In Erfurt, Germany, an investigation covering twenty years showed that the death rate for infants under one year was eighty-nine to the thousand among the rich, while among the poor it was 505 per thousand and 173 among the middle working classes. A general summary has estimated the rate to be 8 per cent for the rich, and 40 per cent for the poor. Germany shows the largest mortality of the three nations, including that empire, Britain, and the United States.

The effect of tenement life is shown in the following table. Where the tenement was one room the death rate was found to be 219 per 1,000; where two rooms it was 157 per 1,000; where three rooms it was 141, and where four rooms but 99 per 1,000. The effect of tenement life is shown by the fact that while the general death rate is decreasing, that of infants is increasing, owing to unsanitary conditions, malnutrition and neglect through mothers being compelled to work. In the New York Hosptial for Children, 75 per cent of the deaths are due to malnutrition.

In London statistics have been collected for the three classes. It was found that among the rich, 18 per cent die before five years of age, while among the poor, 55 per cent die in the same period, and that among the middle class 36 per cent are lost for the same period.

A century ago one-half of London's population died before they became twenty years of age. Today one-half live to the age of fifty-four. In Prussia, two-thirds of the children died before reaching the age of ten, while now less than one-third go to their graves at that tender age. Fifty years ago twenty-seven out of every 100 children in New York city died in their first year, while today the average is but sixteen.

The infant mortality is yet great among the colored folk of the southern cities. It totals about thirty-nine out of every 100 before the first year of life is gone. In Charleston it was found to be forty-two. In the country districts of the south the rate is twenty-two per 100 for the colored people.

A high infant mortality demonstrates either a low state of civilization and intelligence or an environment that is disastrous to life. In the Philippines and among the negroes of our southern cities it is the former more than the latter. In our crowded tenements it is the latter more than the former. The fact that the cities show greatly increased mortality for infants over the country districts in all countries shows conclusively the effects of crowding among the poor and the need of governmental supervision of living conditions.

The Gospel and High-Churchism

Use and Abuse of Ritualism in the Church

By Rev. Orvis F. Jordan

Editors' Note: Mr. Jordan has appeared in the columns of The Christian Century so many times as a practical worker and administrator of Chicago missions that our readers who are not acquainted with him personally or with his specifically religious ministry in Evanston may not know of the richer notes that enter into his preaching. We have asked him to interpret the Gospel in the light of present day tendencies in a series of four articles. He has chosen as the typical and characteristic movements in today's serious life the following: High-churchism, Revivalism, Christian Science and Liberalism. The present article on the Gospel and High-churchism will be followed by similar articles on the other topics.

The nineteenth century will doubtless be known in the history of the church as the age of criticism. Among the forces that have been counter to this critical movement, none will be accorded a more important place than the high church movement. In its fundamental premises, it stands across the path of the modern movement at almost every important point. While the modern has been exalting the new, the high church theologian has pleaded for the medieval and has brought to light many forgotten virtues of the past.

The Tractarian Movement.

The Tractarian movement in England began early in the thirties of the last century. It was a time of spiritual deadness in the established church. Non-conformity had made great advance and the Establishment had come to be wholly under the domination of Low Church tendencies. It was at this time that a group of pious men found each other at Oxford, the mother of religious movements, and planned for a spiritual revival in the church through a new appeal for the church and her sacraments. Foremost in this brilliant group was Newman who later became a Romanist. We are all indebted to him for his beautiful hymn, "Lead Kindly Light." Another of this group was Keble. We are still singing his hymn, "Sun of My Soul, Thou Saviour Dear." In his utter self-abnegation, he retired to a country parish and lived his beautiful life in the service of people who probably never realized what a treasure they had in their parish priest. In this group was Dr. Pusey who had recently returned from a German university. He brought the tidings of the rise of the school of criticism in Germany and the prophecy that it would invade Anglican territory. He prepared himself to meet this school with the best scholarship that he could command. There were other younger men who later gave their names to fame. Great preachers arose advocating the return to the medieval conception of the church. Obscure scholars came into public attention through the translation of the writings of the fathers into English. Such novelists as Scott helped them in making the middle ages to stand no longer as the symbol of cruelty and superstition but as the ideal era of faith. Later, great statesmen like Gladstone gave them prestige with the powers that be, until, today, the high church movement is the dominant tendency in the Anglican church.

The movement made its first public appearance through a series of tracts that were scattered all over Great Britain and put especially into the hands of every Anglican clergyman. These tracts advocated the return to the ancient practices of prayer and fasting. They took the point of view that baptism was for the remission of sins in the catholic sense. They insisted upon the real presence in the sacrament. They thought it advisable to encourage celibacy among the clergy, though it should not be required. They advocated a greater freedom of the church and looked with jealousy upon the usurpations of power by the government in church affairs. They laid especial stress upon the apostolic succession of the Anglican church, insisting that the bishops of the church had an unbroken succession from the apostles which gave validity to the priestly orders.

As these tracts burst upon England at the time of prevailing low church and broad church opinions, the effect may well be imagined. The new party was accused of being in league with Rome. Newman was censured by the bishop and went into the Roman church, from which vantage ground he fulminated against the English church. This but deepened the conviction that there was treachery. In such books as Walsh's "Secret History of the Oxford Movement," the movement is interpreted entirely from this point of view. It is only fair to say, however, that Newman was the only great leader who ever left his church.

Revival of the Liturgy.

The originators of the movement had done nothing to change the liturgy. It was entirely logical, however, that a reversion to the medieval point of view should carry with it a revival of the liturgy and customs of that period. The saints' days were kept with new interest. The priest adorned himself with more care as to his robes and vestments. There were now candles before the altars and the people were encouraged to pray before the crucifix. This change in the forms of worship widened the breach between the three parties of the church until only the advantages of the establishment kept them all in the same ecclesiastical body.

As the movement is now at its full tide, it is time to undertake some valuation of it. We must admit first of all that it has done more to revive vital piety than anything in the religious world since the days of the Wesleys. If the high-churchman prays before a crucifix, he prays, and that is more than can be said of many evangelicals. Worship is one of the great and permanent elements of religion. Indeed some would not make religion anything other than worship. When the instinct for prayer dies in a religious body, the organization is nigh unto death. The Anglican church, which came to this country among the first of the religious bodies and which has been outstripped here by almost every competitor, is now growing with a rate of gain that has great significance. There can be no doubt that this growth is in the high-church dioceses and is the direct result of the revival of vital piety.

Another important service of the movement has been to direct attention to the value of the church as a social institution. Under the individualism of the French Revolution, men came to question the utility of every social institution. Our age, however, is sounding another note. We have labor unions and trusts. These are signs of the times, when we are organizing a new society every day and continually emphasizing the value of organization. It is quite as absurd for a man to say he will get an education without schools as to speak of living a religious life without the church. In all ordinary cases, the institution is essential to the accomplishment of individual aims.

Nor need we deprecate the revival of interest in form and ceremony. All churches have forms of some sort. Some have haphazard methods. It has not been unknown for a Protestant church to start worship by ringing a Sunday-school call bell. In most cases, no attention has been given to the aesthetic side of the ordinances. All this has created disgust in men who are used to beautiful ritual in the lodges and who like to see things done decently and in order. The men have never been made to see the value of mob methods of conducting worship and they are to be found in Episcopal churches in larger proportion than in any other church.

It has been good, too, that the consciousness of historic continuity has been revived in the church. It is a consciousness that does not depend after all upon so mechanical a matter as the laying on of hands by bishops. It is a consciousness that all of us can have. It will greatly dignify our work and our message, and we might all preach more from the lives of the saints without taking any risk of reviving the worship of the saints in our churches. It is only fair, however, that we should square up this movement with the earliest ideals of the church's life. Do high-churchism and the gospel agree? There is no more abused word in our vocabulary than the word gospel. Every one with a hobby to ride speaks of his "full" gospel. Whether it is the holy jumpers, or millennial dawn, or Dowie—all claim to have the "full" gospel. It is no difficult matter, however, to find in what sense Jesus and Paul employed this good word. With Jesus it was the "gospel of the Kingdom." He believed that the new order that was imminent would bring great blessings and that the announcement of the kingdom was good news. Paul spoke of the Kingdom but far more of the King. Jesus of Nazareth was the fulfilment of Messianic hope. He was to return soon to complete his work. Through his resurrection, all his disciples had hope of eternal life. This was indeed gospel. The emphasis upon the importance of the King led the church finally to call everything gospel that in any way related to the life and words of Jesus, and the narratives of his life were called gospels. In comparing any modern party or tendency with the exponents of the gospel in the early church, we must ask not only as to the content of their teaching but also as to their distribution of emphasis. Does the high-church movement teach the same things and give the same emphasis as Jesus and his apostles?

The high church movement has no New Testament authority for the spiritual power which it claims flows from the sacrament. Nowhere in the New Testament is there anything that looks like the sacrifice of the mass. Jesus' whole point of view was radically opposed to the sacramental view-point. These high-church brethren have sometimes told us that they believed that the Disciples held their view of baptism. A few Disciples perhaps do, but these also have been guilty of a perversion of the emphasis of the New Testament in talking a great deal on a subject which receives but scant attention in the early church.

We find also a difference in the view of the church as taught in the New Testament and in the writings of these modern theologians. Both emphasize the importance of the church but in different ways. The New Testament makes the church in a mystical sense the body of Christ. The high-church sees not the spiritual church, but the visible historic organization and tries to idealize an organization that has made many mistakes. The New Testament shows the evolution of the officers of the church and leaves no word indicating that any system of officers is essential to the life of the church. The high church movement insists that where there is no bishop, there is no church, ruling out all the earlier churches of the New Testament period, and really breaking their own historic succession.

The high-church movement has looked for the wrong evidences of the Christian life. With them it is confirmation by a bishop. With Paul it is the graces of the spirit. The early church had parties. The most radical was the one at Jerusalem as opposed to the more liberal churches founded by Paul. These two different tendencies worked together with mutual understanding and sympathy, however, as contrasted with the bald proselyting campaign carried on by the present high church movement. Paul recognized goodness wherever he found it. This movement must first have the imprimatur of the bishop before it will recognize goodness.

There are not lacking signs that the high-church point of view is invading other bodies. Any church that claims to be the only apostolic church has already started on the road. Some of the southern Baptists have claimed apostolic succession. Need we say that a few closer home have taken a somewhat similar position?

Workingmen Look to Church for Help

An Address Delivered at the Chicago Sunday Evening Club

By Charles Stelzle

Rev. Charles Stelzle, superintendent of the Presbyterian department of church and labor, representing the general assembly of the Presbyterian church in America, speaking recently before the Sunday Evening club at Orchestra hall, declared that the modern church must adopt new methods and agencies if it desires to win to its support the laboring men of America. He spoke on "Capturing the Labor Movement."

"Twenty-five years ago," said Mr. Stelzle, a famous French statesman said that the social problem is a fad upon which serious minded statesmen should waste no time. To day no serious minded man will question the fact that the social problem is the most important that confronts us.

"This awakening has come none too soon, for already the horizon is dark with clouds of social unrest, which may either distill into blessed showers, or break upon us in a storm of fury. There are thousands of people who are being deluded by the vain hope that if they can abolish the labor union they will have solved the labor question. These men forget that the labor union is not the labor question. If every labor union in existence were wiped out today the labor question would still be present, and I sometimes think, in a more aggravated form than we have it today.

Industrial Democracy is Coming.

"There are forces organized and unorganized which are comprised in the labor movement. It includes the 25,000,000 socialists of the world, 9,000,000 of whom have cast their ballots for socialist candidates. It embraces the 9,000,000 trade unionists from every land. It includes that movement among the Russian peasantry, 20,000 of whom in a recent year suffered martyrs' deaths because of their befiel in the ideal which somebody had given them.

"It includes the movement among the working people in Germany, 40 per cent of whose entire population are working and voting for the success of the social democracy in that country. It embraces the movements among the working people of England, in Italy, in Austria, in Australia, to say nothing about the social unrest that exists in our own country. In view of this it does not require a very wise man to say that this is the era of the common man.

"Slowly but surely the masses of the people are coming to their own. For long years they fought for the religious democracy—and they won. Then for 400 years they shed their blood upon the battlefield in the struggle for the political democracy—and they conquered. Today they are fighting for the industrial democracy, and no human power can stop their onward march. This, then, is the labor movement, and we dare not be sidetracked in our discussion of it by a specious argument against the labor union. Important as the labor union may be, it is a mere incident in the industrial evolution through which we are passing.

"There is so much religion in the labor movement and so much social unrest in the church that some day it will become a question as to whether the church will capture the labor movement or whether the labor movement will capture the church. We hear a good deal in these days about the church saving the masses, but some day the masses and they will agree in this—all of them will and spiritual vision the people are bound to perish, but without the rugged strength that comes with and through the common people the church is going to fail.

Christ is Honored by Labor.

"The great mass of working people almost universally honor Jesus Christ as their Friend and Leader, and most of them believe in His divinity. The average workingman is naturally religious, although that religion may not always be expressed in the accepted orthodox manner. The labor question is fundamentally a moral and religious problem. In the end there will be not simply one answer to the social question, but many, but they will agree in this—all of them will be religious. History has prophesied it. The best labor leaders have come to recognize it. The social reform measures that workingmen are hearing most about today indicate it.

"Socialism, communism, and anarchism, stripped of their practical programs, are moral and religious problems, and before any one of them can be successfully introduced there must first of all be a radical change in the naturally selfish hearts of men. Josh Billings once said, 'Before you can have an honest horse race you must have an honest human race.' Workingmen are today responding to the appeal of the church as they have rarely done during any time in the history of the labor movement in this country.

"The tendency of the American workingman today is toward the church rather than away from it, and this statement is based not merely upon a local experience, but upon an experience which is as wide as America and comes as the result of a study of practically every industrial center in the United States.

Church Must Use New Methods.

"For these reasons the church is already supreme in the matter of capturing the labor movement. Unfortunately, however, the vision of the church has been too narrow. When the church has thought of the great mass of the people outside of its doors, and when it has planned some method whereby it might reach them, it has usually planned simply for an evangelistic campaign.

"I believe in evangelism, but I would say very amphatically that no amount of evangelistic work engaged in for the purpose of reaching the masses can ever take the place of some other things that the church must do if it would capture the labor movement. What must the workingmen find in the church, and what must the church do in order to permanently retain its hold upon workingmen?

First, the workingman must find in the church an absolute sincerity. Betrayed so often by those who have posed as his friends and made to believe that all business is a trick of which he is the victim, it is not surprising that the average workingman has come to be suspicious of every movement which pretends to be in his interest. Sometimes the very men who have betrayed him in political life and in economic life have been prominnt in the work of the church.

"We forget sometimes that the church is simply a means to an end in itself. Let us talk less about building up the church and more about building up the people. Jesus did not heal the sick in order that they might come to hear Him preach. He healed them because He had compassion on them and because they needed healing.

"The workingman must find in the church a greater democracy. There is nothing that he resents quite so quickly as the spirit of patronage or paternalism. The spirit of democracy is found in the organizations with which he is now identified—the trades unions, the lodge—and even in the saloon, where a single 5 cent piece places a man on

The Apollo Club of Chicago will render "The Hallelujah Chorus" at the closing session of the Congress.

Our Readers' Opinions

Baptism and Fellowship

Another question has been thrust upon the Disciples relating to baptism and fellowship. In his recent book, "A Comprehensive History of the Disciples of Christ," Dr. W. T. Moore says: "While the Apostle Paul distinctly asserts in his letter to the Ephesians that there is one baptism, it is highly probable that there were at least three elements connected with this one baptism, viz., water, spirit and suffering. The action performed is immersion and if we should say that this one action takes place in at least three elements "it is more than probable that this view of the matter would be not far from the truth."

This is a new thought evidently springing from a desire to treat this mooted question comprehensively. Such probabilities are not convincing and the attempt to put three such diverse conceptions as an immersion in water by a man, an overwhelming in the Holy Spirit by Christ and the submergence of the same human spirit at the same time in suffering by the devil into "one baptism," is repugnant to clear thinking.

He repudiates this confessed notion when speaking of the baptism in the Holy Spirit and referring to an alleged specific "habit of language," he says: "It is highly probable that the meaning is that, in all subjective uses of the Holy Spirit, reference is made to Spirit as an element, or as an essence, and that for the time being the personality of Spirit is distinctly suppressed in order to make the indwelling of Holy Spirit a thinkable reality. With this idea before us it is not difficult to understand Paul's statement to the Corinthians when he says, that 'in one Spirit were they all baptized into one body.'"

Such an indistinct suppression of the highest conception of Spirit for such a purpose is not considered with the dignity and candor that characterize the holy scriptures. That it is easy "to understand Paul's statement," means that the baptism that brings believers into the one body of Christ is the baptism of the Holy Spirit. If this be Paul's meaning in this passage (I. Cor. 12:13) the Disciples have been wrong in all their history as baptism in water is not the initiatory ordination, and "the vexed question" should be eliminated.

Dr. Richardson, in his work on the Office of the Holy Spirit, says, in substance: "John and the disciples of Jesus baptized in water. Men can fulfil such a ministry. Christ alone can baptize in the Holy Spirit, hence he baptized no one in water. Baptism performed by men was an overwhelming of the person baptized by a submerging in water. Baptism performed by Christ was an overwhelming of persons baptized in the Holy Spirit which was poured out, shed forth, or came upon them in such fulness and copiousness as brought their own spirits into a position within the Holy Spirit so as to be in its power or under its direction. The recipients of the Spirit were said to be filled with the Spirit and the act of receiving it is described as drinking of the Spirit." Dr. Richardson shows that the baptism of the Holy Spirit is not limited to the Apostles on Pentecost, and Cornelius' household at Caesarea, and adds:

"It was the simple fact of the impartation to the Gentiles of the Holy Spirit by which unity was to be established in the body of Christ which at once removed all doubt. Unless this had been first done, they would not have been received to baptism or admitted to fellowship in the church. The fact undoubtedly shows furthermore, that God did not formerly forbear to give his Holy Spirit to those whose hearts were purified by faith, even without baptism, and that a want of faith, therefore, is the only insuperable obstacle to the reception of the Holy Spirit. It is, then, a just conclusion that he does not now withhold this precious gift from any true believer, even though he may, from ignorance of his duty, have remained unbaptized, in this age of religious error and confusion. This is a corollary, indeed, which necessarily follows from the concession that God has a people scattered among all religious parties." P. 116.

The Campbells discriminate between the essential and the formal in religion and the inward and the outward Christian. They reasoned on baptism under this dispensation of grace as Paul reasoned on circumcision with the Jews under a dispensation of law. (Rom. 2:25-29.) They regarded baptism as an immersion in water of a penitent believer into the names of Father, Son and Holy Spirit. If anything can be settled by the New Testament and the consensus of scholarship, they were unquestionably correct. They regarded it also as the first formal act of the obedience of faith. But they did not make this act or any other specific act, a standard of Christian state or character. Since the world has for a long time been misled about baptism, they regarded an intelligent and consistent profession of faith in Christ as the formal reason for religious communion in all acts and ordinances of gospel worship. This has been the position and practice of the Disciples in all their history with few exceptions.

If then we bear faithful testimony on this as on other themes, and practice according to our conscientious convictions, we may contistently welcome to our fellowship all believers who bear the fruits of the Spirit even though we regard them defective in their formal, initial obedience.

As to the small matter of entering their names on church records, this, like the record itself, is a matter of order, or of expediency, to be determined by each local congregation, without prejudice, in view of local conditions and as to whether or not it will be to edification, according to Paul's law of expediency and the higher law of love.

"The Road to Yesterday"

Editors Christian Century: Believing that you are open to friendly criticism, and that you stand for the freedom in Christ, I offer these words regarding your editorial, "The Road to Yesterday," in current issue of your paper. I do not offer these in defense of the Christian Evangelist. Too many are alive to the defense of men and papers; but rather, I am dead in earnest in defending my Master and His word. Now to the point at issue: I am in the third year of my ministry with the church of Christ at Nickerson, Kansas. The work when I came was comparatively young and unorganized. A small house costing about $1200—seating capacity 150—had been erected three years previous to my coming. This was done by about thirty members traveling "the road to yesterday." In our labors together with Him, we have outgrown these former conditions. Today we have a splendid workshop costing $15,000, with seating capacity 750, a membership of 250—many of them coming from the denominations—and are thankful for the light and freedom which they now enjoy, and are loyal to the one Lord. At the time this work began there were already seven denominations at work in a town of 1,500. How foolish it was for these brethren with no "vision" to insist on starting the work here, where already there were too many churches in a town of this size, and these were most bitterly opposed to having another work started. Now the question that arises is this: Have I done wrong and wasted my time and opportunity in leading the faithful band in the building of our new house of worship, and receiving many from denominationalism as a result of a plea for unity? We have here not only the scriptural plea for unity, but the practice of it, for many of our constituency came from the denominations. They have come from the Baptists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Methodists, United Brethren, Dunkards, Adventists and Universalists, having laid down all the things which divide for the Christ. If this sort of work is wrong here it is wrong everywhere, or at least throughout Kansas, because of the fact that the denominations have been the first upon the field—"enough to supply Christian leadership and employment for the people." Is this not the case throughout our land? In Kansas we are in the building period—entering new fields and building new houses of worship. This is the slogan of a faithful ministry in a great state: "Kansas for Christ and the unity of all Christians." Have we any reason to go on with the work so well started? If a denomination, or "the Church of the Disciples,"—No! But if simply Christians—giving all authority to the only begotten Son of God—Yes! Pre-eminently then our mission is to go to every town, whether large or small, and plead for unity in the name of Jesus Christ that the world might believe. "The crying sin of our generation" is a divided church, and how shall this be remedied except there be leaders to cry out against this "pathetic spectacle."

If this be not the mission of the Christian ministry and the host which they are leading, they have no mission and no right to exist. As a young man in the ministry, it is the uppermost desire of my heart to be as useful and fruitful for the cause of Christ as it is possible for me to be. First of all I am determined to be loyal to Him who had all authority, and to His messengers who were guided by the Holy Spirit from the Father. As a disciple I am willing to learn from the great teacher of men. In my estimation the man of "vision" is the man who sees the world redeemed through a united church; who preaches Christ, and all things whatsoever he commanded, in the face of all opposition and contention.

Such a one will see the fruit of his labors, and the Christ will be exalted and given a name that is above every name.

Nickerson, Kansas. D. J. Howe.

Scholarship's Increasing Faith

Editors Christian Century: The reading of "Scholarship's Increasing Faith" has suggested the following observations:

1. The history of religious thought is not to be formulated in terms of perfectly balanced, sharp antitheses. "Logic ruled the mediaeval mind; life rules the modern mind," is a typical illustration of a glittering generality. But is it true? Would Mr. Gates have us infer that there was no life in the Middle Ages, and that there is no logic in the thought of the present day?

2. Dr. Gates has worked out the doctrine of God on the basis of a mathematical equation—it is simply a question of more versus less. He has removed an imaginary line, and thereby, transformed a dualistic into a monistic world. Thus he is enabled to substitute immanence for transcendence, and more of God for less of God. But such a solution is too easy. A serious discussion of this problem must seek an answer to the question, What meaning has the concept "God" conveyed to the human mind throughout the ages? Realities are more fundamental than imaginary lines.

3. In the discussion of the christological problem homiletical equivalents have apparently displaced mathematical equations. But such a technique is practically valueless in any scientific study of theological problems. Their academic discussion of christology is due largely to the following facts: (1) the inadequate discussion of the doctrine of God; (2) the non-recognition of the christological concepts in the ages past; (3) the failure to even vitally suggest the relation that now exists between the values of the past which have persisted in modified forms and the new values which are being created in our own day.

Practically, there is no such wide charm between the past and the present as Dr. Gates would have us believe. Psychological insight rather than rhetorical antitheses and mathematical equations is to be desired in the discussion of theological problems.

Isaac Errett on Other Christians

Editors Note: Apropos of the current study of the question of receiving into our fellowship Christians who hold membership in other churches, our attention has been called to the address on Isaac Errett delivered by Prof. C. M. Jefferson at the Pittsburg convention. While Mr. Errett never advocated their reception into formal membership nevertheless our correspondent believes these are more suggestive implications in the statement of his views as interpreted by Professor Jefferson.

"Isaac Errett's attitude towards other religious bodies, especially the great Protestant parties of today, implied in what I have said, deserves more explicit statement. While consistently refusing to recognize them, in their exclusive denominational organizations as realizing the ideal of New Testament churches, he regarded their established congregations, in so far as they are constituted of obedient believers, as real though imperfect churches of Christ, in a fair if not in the full sense of that term. Justly discriminating what is essential to the being of a thing from what is essential to its well-being or perfection, he admitted the real existence of the former even where truth demanded the denial of the presence of the latter. He claimed that all religious parties should abandon whatever in tneir doctrine or practice is inimical to true Christian union and where needful follow the way of the Lord more perfectly. But in view of the Christian character and conduct of their members he did not regard the great Protestant parties at anti-Christian or unchristian sects. Sects in a sense they are; but there is a fundamental difference between them and the sects reprobated in the New Testament.

"The word 'sect' therefore, must be freed from much of its bad meaning before it can justly be applied to them. He esteemed all sincere believers in Christ as brethren beloved in the Lord, and sought for mutual fellowship with them so far as this is possible without sacrificing the principles of the gospel. The sectarian spirit, with its divisive and disruptive practices, the spirit of bondage to party and of refusal to labor for the unity and union of God's divided and scattered people—whether found in the ranks of others or in our own, he denounced as sin and opposed with all his power. But he welcomed in Christian fraternity all who were giving diligence to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace; one body, one Spirit, one hope, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, on God and Father of all.

It was not from lack of love or of liberality, but in humble loyalty that he contended for the one baptism of this seven-fold bond of peace. He would have the church faithful to her commission: 'Go ye therefore and make disciples of all the nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I commanded you.' He would give sinners scriptural assurance of salvation in the words: 'He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved.' But he was too great both in head and heart to convert this affirmative into the proposition, 'All the saved are baptized believers,' or to infer from it that none but the baptized will be saved.

"He often quoted with approval the words of Alexander Campbell: 'Who is a Christian? I answer, everyone who believes in his heart that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah the Son of God, repents of his sins, and obeys him in all things according to his measure of knowledge of his will. A perfect man in Christ, or a perfect Christian is one thing; a babe in Christ, a stripling in the faith, or an imperfect Christian is another. The New Testament recognizes both the perfect man and the imperfect man in Christ. I cannot therefore make any one duty the standerd of Christian state or character, not even immersion into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, and in my heart regard all that have been sprinkled in infancy without their own knowledge and consent, as aliens from Christ and the well-grounded hope of heaven.

Longing for Home

By Anna D. Walker.

A little guest was ours one day,
As happy as a bird in May;
A three-year-old, who laugh'd and sung.
And chatted fast with lisping tongue.
Her cherub face, and laugh and shout
Cheered all the place within and out,
She seemed so bright, so gay, so glad,
That naught could ever make her sad.

But when the stilly night came down,
In blackest robe and starry crown,
And Sol had run his utmost race,
Deep sorrow filled the child's fair face,
And her great eyes were wet with tears,
And her young heart was full of fears;
She cried amid the gathering gloom,
"I long for home, I long for home.' '

Her sorrow we could not withstand,
We took her tiny, dimpled hand
And led her to her own home nest,
Where, safe upon her mother's breast,
She soon forgot her grief and woes
In childhood's innocent repose;
It chased away all shade of gloom,
The going home, the going home.

Life's traveler when his day is past,
And evening shades come on at last,
Has oft a weary, aching heart,
And naught below can heal its smart,
How blessed if he can lift his eyes
Beyond the ether of the skies,
And cry amid the gathering gloom,
"I long for home, I long for home!"

For, lo, the Father takes his hand
And leads him to the better land,
Where safe upon the Savior's breast
He finds a rest, a perfect rest.
No grief can e'er disturb him there,
He knows no want, no pain, no care,
No darkness sees, no evening gloom,
For, like the child, he has reached home.

The Book World

LAGGARDS IN OUR SCHOOLS, by Leonard P. Ayers, A. M. This is one of the series of eight books issued as publications of the Russell Sage Foundation. The Standard of Living Among Working Men's Families in New York City has been reviewed in these columns and three others follow in this issue. It is typical of the thoroughness of the investigations made by the Foundation as well as of the character of the problems studied. It was found that one-third of all school children fall behind their grades. If this could be avoided there would be a saving of some $27,000,000 per annum. Better there would be a saving to society of much good in that one-third of the future citizens who contracted the habit of failure at school and are thus given an additional handicap in the battle for success. It is surprising to find that the children of American parentage furnish more illiteracy than those of foreign parentage. It is also surprising to find that boys fail much oftener than girls, and that the authors conclude that our schools are better fitted to the peculiar needs of girls than to those of boys. The chief causes of retardation are found to be irregular attendance,. physical defect, and defective methods of promotion. All could be met and almost entirely overcome. In Germany but one man out of 2,000 in the army is an illiterate and but one in 10,000 among the volunteers in the navy. Even in the United States they lead all others in the low percentage of "repeaters," i. e., those who have to take work over again. This is due to the strictness of German laws for compulsory attendance. Physical defect requires a great enlargement and strengthening of the powers of the medical staff in the schools. Better methods of promotion as well as improved records could be brought about by a larger general supervision by the state. (New York: Charities Publication Committee. Pp. 236. $1.50, postpaid.)

THE SALARY LOAN BUSINESS IN NEW YORK CITY, A Report Prepared Under the Direction of the Bureau of Social Research of the New York School of Philanthropy by Clarence Wassam, Ph. D., with Extracts from an Unpublished Report, by Julian Warne, Ph. D. This is another of the valuable studies furnished by the Sage Foundation for the sake of improving social and living conditions. It reveals startling conditions in the salary loan business. It defends the need of loans to men who have no property but their salaries only for security, referring to the study on "The Standard of Living Among Workingmen's Families" for proof. It reckons that 75 per cent of all the loans are taken because of need. But four states regulate the interest that may be charged. Several require a license of the loan agent and a number make it compulsory that the employer be notified. This latter but works hardship if the rate be not fixed. The average loan is about $20, and the interest runs from 20 per cent per month up to any figure obtainable. Illustrations of as high as four and five times the amount received being paid back are given. The loan shark makes from 250 per cent up, annually upon his capital. His main hold is the fear of the borrower, that his employer will discover that he has assigned his wages. Where employers refuse to discharge employes who do so the loan agent blacklists the employes and refuses them money. It is simply a business for exploiting the poor and unfortunate as it exists today. Secrecy is its main asset.

The remedies proposed are those of publicity, close inspection by some such officer as the bank examiner, the establishment of a maximum legal rate, and the founding of societies which will loan at a moderate profit after a thorough investigation of the need. (Pp. 143. 75 cents postpaid.)

MEDICAL INSPECTION OF SCHOOLS, by Luther Gulick and Leonard P. Ayers. This is another of the volumes issued under the support of the Russell Sage Foundation. It is a critical study of the theme that gives it title and the account of a thorough investigation of what is being done along the line of publicly supervised inspection in the schools for the prevention and cure of contagious diseases and the care of children with curable physical defects. The fact is revealed that ten per cent of all school children need attention by nurse or physician and that where it is systematically given four-fifths of them are saved from sickness and from absence from school of longer or shorter duration. In the old countries medical care is given by the state, especially where the parents are careless or poor. In this country the parents are strongly urged in all cases but the care is not insured in many places. The authors think the need of compulsory care is even greater here than in most of the older countries because we have much less regard for law and officials and mere recommendation does not bring the results. That we have only begun the work is apparent enough and that the economy and humanity of it will give rapid increase to it there can be little doubt. The employment of the school nurse is one of the most telling innovations. She makes preliminary inspections, keeps card reports of all pupils, visits and gives instruction in the homes, and cares for such cases herself as she finds imperative. (New York: Charities Publication Committee. Pp. 276. $1, postpaid.)

A MODERN CITY, (Providence, Rhode Island,) and Its Activities, by William Kirk, Ph. D. This is a scientific study of a city. It is not clamied that the city is out of the ordinary in any way but rather that it is typical. If it is the study is very useful as an illustration for other cities. If it is not the manner in which the study was made is a model for other students. The Introduction is written by President Faunce of Brown University each of the eleven chapters is contributed by an expert. They treat the Geography, Population, Industry, Labor, Government, Finance, Education, Art, Philanthropy, and Religion. It is well indexed and there are ten illustrations. Such investigations are valuable to more than the student of municipal problems. They are valuable to the intelligent citizen and could be made of great value of high school and college students of civics and government. The historical study with which each chapter approaches its theme is interesting as Providence dates back to the days of Roger Williams. The curious survival of the old colonial fear of democratic suffrage is well described and arouses one's wonderment, for the curtailing of the suffrage by property qualification is not proven to be to the advantage of good government. The religious situation also shows many traditional survivals but the fact is pointed out that there are churches adopting modern means and doing much good among those who need the help. (Unity of Chicago Press. Pp. 363. $2.70 postpaid.)

THE CHURCH AND LABOR, by Charles Stelzle. Any word from this mediator between church and labor-union is a significant one and welcomed by an increasing number of readers. In this little volume, of the Modern Religious Problems series, edited by Dr. Ambrose W. Vernon, Mr. Stelzle fearlessly arraigns the church as the champion of the established order and lacking such an awareness to the rights and needs of the common people as Jesus exemplified. The church does not understand the working people, he declares, and one of the principal reasons why it does not understand is that the ministry is recruited almost entirely from the farming, the commercial and the professional classes. Very few working men, fresh from the ranks of the toilers in shop, mill, mine and factory go into the ministry. Moreover, the seminaries do not prepare men to meet the situation adequately. "Their courses of study are antiquated, and their professors as a class know nothing, and seem to care less, about the questions that trouble the masses. They take refuge behind the worn-out excuse that the simple gospel will solve all these problems, without knowing what the problems are." The church is exhorted to talk less about "helping" and "service," and more about "exchange"—the return to each common helper of the social welfare of his just need of life's goods. A suggestive, untechnical and Christian book. (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Company. Pp. 95. $.50, net.)

REPORT ON THE DESIRABILITY OF ESTABLISHING AN EMPLOYMENT BUREAU IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK, by Edward T. Devine. There are some who do not desire work. There are others who are incapable and cannot work efficiently and so are much of the time out of a job. There are times when there is not work enough to supply all hands. An employment bureau cannot meet any of these conditions. But there is always a considerable number out of work because the man and the job cannot get together. This mal-adjustment an employment bureau can meet. The next question then is as to what kind of a bureau is necessary. There are commercial agencies but they have been generally found inefficient and many of them given over to dishonest methods. The state or municipal agencies have generally been so made into political adjuncts for the party machine that they are not commendable. The charity bureaus are undesirable because it is not a matter of charity, but of economic adjustment and ability to pay its way. Dr. Devine finds the need is great. Even in the most prosperous times there are many in the congested centers out of employment while work is asking for men elsewhere. The means at hand are not sufficient. The "Want Ads" in the dailies do not meet the need and for men to go tramping for a job is both unscientific and unhuman. His recommendation is that some one should establish an employment bureau with a capital of $100,000 and put at its head a man of great executive ability. This bureau would establish branch agencies throughout the country and provide for the transportation of men for which it would receive a fee, to be taken from the wages if necessary. This plan would make the bureau self-supporting and keep the men's self-respect. The whole study is enlightening and valuable to the social student. (New York: Charities Publication Committee. Pp. 238. $1.)

THE CHURCH AND HER PROPHETS, by Dwight Edwards Marvin. A pithy little book that clears away the non-essentials and calls in sententious language for the dominance of the men of vision and the courage of righteousness in the church of today. It can be read and reread with profit and is itself a prophetic little volume. (New York: Broadway Pub. Co. Pp. 94. 75 cents.)

A STORY OF THE TRUSTS

BY JANE RICHARDSON

CHAPTER XXV.

Teddy Looks for Work.

The season was cold and backward. The belated black-birds had not arrived till late If he still harbored his former suspicions, world, swept and harried by the biting east in March, and there was only a tinge of green in the grass by the road-sides. The the lambs and the calves—fretted and shivered, finding it for all the care and solicitude of their tender mothers, an unfriendly morning were still frosty, the roads frozen hard over night, and the willow, whose yellowing boughs heralded the first glimpse of spring, as yet gave little hint that it was near at hand. The new-born creatures,—wind.

In the afternoon, as Susan sat with her head bent over the sewing machine—her usual post now, morning, noon and night. Teddy Wilkens passed the side window with a lightness of step, and a hopefulness of bearing that she had missed for many a day. He came in, full of happy excitement, his eyes sparkling and his cheeks glowing; he did not wait to take off his hat or overcoat:—

"There, Susan," he said delightedly, "No more loafin' for me!"

"What is it?" she asked, looking up, interested in his news.

"A telegram from Jackson—a fellow that used to be in the Works. He's in Chicago now, and he's just sent me this telegram. I wrote and asked him to look out for me, and if he found anything to let me know."

"Susan read on the yellow slip:

"Job in box factory; hustle."

"I am glad, Teddy. An' it'll be good news for Mary too, though she"ll miss you bad! Still, it won,t be for long."

"No; I shall send for her just as soon as I can; or rather, I'll come back for her some Saturday night. We can be married on Sunday so I can be back at work Monday. It don't do to lay off nowadays for anything, even for funerals."

Teddy unconsciously glanced at Alonzo who was dozing on the lounge, but Susan did not notice it. In spite of tearful outbursts to Eleanor, in her calmer moments she tried to persuade herself that her husband was not seriously ill. As often happens, those who are constantly with the sick are unaware how certain is their decline. To Susan, Alonzo seemed only a little more tired, a little more dull. That all he did—and it was very little—now cost him a painful effort, she had not observed. He slept much of the, day, but lay awake in feverish restlessness through the night. He was not disturbed by Teddy's entrance, and apparently did not hear what he said.

Lowering his voice as the sick man began to cough feebly, Teddy went on:

"No; you can't knock off now, for any cause, hardly; so many wantin' work, someone will step into your place before you can turn 'round. With no hope of the Works openin' up again, there's no good stayin' on in Carlinville."

"Do you think you'll like Chicago?" asked Susan, as she left the machine and began overcasting the seam she had just stiched.

"Well, I don't know," he said doubtfully. "But, anyhow, it isn't what I like but what I've got to do. Beggars can't be choosers! Neither can workin'-men. There's a heap of talk about young people crowdin' to the cities, but they're forced to do it. Look at this place,—what is there here for a man like me?"

"Not much, sure!"

"I reckon I'll miss the folks, and feel pretty lonesome, but I'll have to get over it!"

Susan knew that the loss of the five dollars a week he paid her for his board would be severely felt, but she was too unselfish to discourage him.

"You'll have a better chance in Chicago; it's so much bigger, and there's so much more work there for everybody. I would have advised Lon to try it, if he'd been able," she said, sadly, "Mebby I will yet, when he gets better."

There was a moment's painful silence, then she asked:

"Have you told Mary?"

"Not yet; but I told her I'd go if I could get anything to do. She'll think it's all right. She knows it's the ruin of a man to be layin' 'round idle. I mean to tell her tonight."

"Miss Eleanor's just told me some good news about her, too. I'm glad somebody's havin' a little good luck!—it's time, the Lord knows!"

"What is it?" he asked, eagerly.

"The stenographer that's been in Rankin's law office—you know he took Judge Brainard's practice—well, she's goin' to Indianapolis, and Miss Eleanor's got her place for Mary!"

"Well, that is good news!" cried Teddy, elated.

"Yes, it is. Poor Mary's had a hard time with them skinflint Bivenses. They think if they pay a body five dollars a week, they can't wring enough out of them. Mary couldn't pay her board if Miss Eleanor hadn't taken her in."

Teddy looked grave and he answered in a discouraged tone:

"I know it. I've felt mighty bad about Mary's havin' to work so hard. She wasn't home but one night last week before ten o'clock. She's gettin' thin and pale under it. I'm thankful she's got this new job."

"Well, you may be!" assented Susan. "I heard young Bivens had given his wife a diamond ring worth a thousand dollars."

"He can afford to, when he only gives five dollars for a stenographer, typewriter, and bookkeeper, all in one, and works her from seven o'clock in the morning 'till ten at night; and for fear she might think she ought to get more, complains at everything she does!"

"Well, it's over! that's one comfort.—Is there anything I can do for you, Teddy?" asked Susan. "Any mending, any buttons to sew on? Bring 'em down here and me and Eldory'll tend to 'em. She's sayin' her lessons now, with Miss Eleanor, but she'll be through directly. Little did we think when Miss Eleanor moved in here what a friend was bein' raised up for us!"

"She's a friend to everybody," said Teddy, remembering how he, too, had profited by her good offices.—"There are some things, Susan, that need a stitch or too, but I hate to bother you with 'em!"
them right down here, and then go pack your trunk."

Teddy obeyed, and it was not long till Eldora came in:

"Teddy's goin' to Chicago tonight, you must help me get his things ready," said Susan.

Teddy's spirits sank perceptibly when he began to dismantle his plain but home-like room. He was extremely neat and tidy—one characteristic which found favor with Mary—and the little chamber was as bright and fresh as when he took possession of it. How much has happened since then!

His whole life had altered, nothing turning out as he had planned. The place was associated not only with the sweetest happiness he had ever experienced, but also with proportionate physical and mental suffering. This unexpected chance involved separation, exile from al. that made life worth living. Here were loyal friends, the like of whom he could not hope to find in the indifferent multitudes of the great city.

But with determination he threw off this melancholy and Susan heard him singing, as he collected his belongings and packed them. She brought up the mended articles, watched him put them in the trunk, turn the key in the lock; then looking about her at the naked mantel, the table stripped of its papers and inkstand, she put her aporn to her eyes and began to sob bitterly.

"Oh, Susan, don't!" pleaded Teddy, shrinking at the sight of her grief. "I can't bear to see you give up like that! You've kept us all up, and if you break down I don" know what'll happen."

"I can't help it, Teddy," she cried, "I've kept up, an' kept up till I haven't any more courage left. Lon don't get any better. I don't care what the doctor says. Oh, if my man's goin' to die I ain't got nothin' to live for!"

"Why, Susan! Think of the children," said Teddy, pitying her deeply.

"They'll be took care of, somehow——"

"No; they can lose their father better than they can their mother. But we're not going to talk like that. Lon'll be better when the weather gets settled."

"He'll never be any better," sobbed Susan, "and I might as well make up my mind to it, first as last!"

Teddy could not dispute this, he had realized for some time that poor Alonzo was only waiting for the order "to quit for good," which would soon be given.

"Oh, the sorrow and ruin and misery one man can cause!" Susan cried wildly.

"Look at all Wakefield—a year ago everybody was busy and happy. Now see the men that have lost their homes—made beggars and wanderers. If there is such a bein' as a God he'll remember their sufferin', and them that's responsible will be made to pay, I hope, their wives' hearts broke—their children made beggars as ourn have been. I hope it'll come to pass—and it will."

"Why, Susan! Hush—hush—You're not yourself—you don't know what you're saying!"

"I mean it—I mean it—all and more! They'll pay for all—to the very last life that they've crushed out!"

"Don't talk so, Susan! Don't let Lon hear you; it will worry him to see you so distressed," said Teddy, using the one appeal he knew she could not resist. She grew calmer, and went sorrowfully down-stairs.

After supper Teddy went in to break the news to Mary. Luckily, for once, she had not been detained at the office. And while she felt the strain of separation, it was borne bravely.

Eleanor congratulated him on his bright prospects and left them to talk it over.

"It's the only thing that can be done, Mary, but I hate to leave you!"

"It will only be for a little while," she

Rachel Miller's Birthday Gifts

BY A. F. CALDWELL.

The sparsely-settled mining town of Prescott, with its narrow, irregular streets and small, low-posted houses, seemed to Rachel Miller a marked contrast to the bustling, well-laid-out New England city, where she had always lived until her father moved West, three months before. The people, too, were different, and Rachel found it hard to accommodate herself to their ways of living, so unlike the manner in which she herself had been brought up.

There were but two in the little family, Rachel and her father. Mr. Miller would not have selected Prescott as a home for himself and daughter, from choice. He had gone there as vice-president and manager of the Valley City Mining Company; it was regarded by his friends as a splendid opening—a position he couldn't well refuse.

"Will we have to live here—always?" Rachel had asked, shortly after reaching the frontier mining town.

"Why, perhaps—not," replied her father, thoughtfully. "But we'll like it here—after awhile," cheerily, "after we get acquainted."

"I—I hope—so," and there was a touch of uncertainty in the girl's voice. "But it's so different here—from home."

At the end of three months, Rachel had made but few—what she called "really-and-truly"—friends, and her longing for New England was still strong. Nevertheless, she was getting more accustomed to the free and easy ways of the little mining hamlet; and there was much about the life among the mountains that was agreeable—even fascinating to her.

One afternoon, she took her work-basket out on the vine-covered porch, to sew. Before her stretched the narrow valley, dozing in the warm spring sun. Two miles away, were the works of the Valley City Mining Company—"our company," Rachel was growing fond of saying—where her father was directing a force of busy men.

"Thursday is my birthday," and Rachel paused a moment to thread her needle. "But it won't seem like a birthday—not as it did back home—for there'll be no one here to remember it with me—except father. How odd 'twill seem to have a birthday—without any gifts, books and pictures and flowers—from all the girls," and Rachel's face assumed a wistful expression. "It won't seem like a birthday; not—one—bit!"

Rachel looked thoughtfully over towards the mountains, lying there so majestic and tranquil in the afternoon sunshine. Then she took up her work again.

"It isn't that I want the gifts; that isn't it! It's the feeling—the pleasure—that comes in the giving and receiving. That's what I shall miss—not the presents."

Several minutes passed before Rachel spoke and getting ready for Thursday. Some of the gifts were selected from her own things—those which she had bought before leaving home, or which had at some time been given

"Last year I received," and Rachel tried her; others she made.
again. Suddenly she exclaimed eagerly, "I wonder if I can—do it!"

Then she laid her sewing quickly aside, for Rachel couldn't sew and plan at the same time—especially anything that was so unusual and unconventional as what she now had in mind—giving one's own birthday presents.

"They would be birthday gifts—just the same!" And that would bring real pleasure—that which Rachel longed for. "I'll do—it; I'll have a birthday celebration—after all."

That night, Rachel made out her gift list, and the next few days she was busy planning to remember the number of presents that had been given her on her birthday. "I can't tell—exactly—how many—there were. But there's be ten—this year; no matter if it isn't just the same number."

On Wednesday evening—before Mr. Miller came home from the mining company's office—Rachel "went over" her list of gifts, to see that everything was in readiness for the next day. Spread out on the table in her room were the presents, neatly done up, while attached to each was a small white card, on which was written: "Rachel Miller's Birthday Gift."

"What will they think—at first!" smiled Rachel, radiantly. "Perhaps I'll have to explain to some of them; I wouldn't be at all surprised."

In a large hamper, partly hidden in white tissue paper, were two tumblers of jelly—one light and the other dark— two loaves of whole wheat bread, a jar of sweet pickles, a glass of golden honey, a square of pressed meat, and a long pasteboard box filled full of delicious cookies. On the card attached to the handle of the basket was written: "Mrs. Hannah Lufkin."

"I don't believe she's tasted anything like this—since she broke her hip," thought Rachel, replacing around the top of the hamper a clean white napkin.

"Mary Louise does the best she can for her mother, but she can't cook—not according to my notion. But how can she," indulgently, "with those five children to look after; I don't believe I could do any better."

Beside the basket was a black silk apron, very daintily made.

"Grandma Chilton will look quite dressed up—when she gets that on," mused Rachel, happily. "Father thinks it hardly is in keeping with her surroundings; but such folks like pretty things. I know I'd just be hungry for something like this—if I were old—and had no more to make my life bright and cheerful than Grandma Chilton has; I know I should."

Two volumes—one, Eugene Field's "With Trumpet and Drum," and the other, Stevenson's "New Arabian Nights"—were marked with the name of Emily Schmolsmire, who taught the one ungraded school of which the town of Prescott boasted.

"She told me—only last week—that she has never read either one of you," confided Rachel to the little books she herself had so fondly admired. "And I want you to give her just the same pleasure that you've given me; and more—if possible. Don't forget!"

There was a dressing-sack—it had been Mr. Miller's, but was now too small for him—for the frontier missionary.

"It's as good as new," commented Rachel, holding the garment up, to examine where she had refaced it with new black silk. "It looks as though it just came out of the store."

A box of water-color paints, with some "studies" in fruits and flowers, bore a card on which was painted in old English gold letters: "Anna Olson."

There was a bundle of magazines—but very little worn—marked with the name of "Peter Henry Jillson," a man who had been injured, three weeks before, while in the employment of the Valley City Mining Company.

"He is fond of reading, father says, and there are some good stories in them," and Rachel re-tied the string more securely around the periodicals.

Close to the magazines was a plump little book—"home made," to be sure—labeled "The Cook's Treasure House," in which Rachel had carefully copied recipes from her own cook-book, and many of those which her friends had either given or sent her.

This was for Stella Kingman, a young bride who had come with her husband to Prescott, since Mr. Miller had assumed the charge of the mining operations there.

"These will be just what she needs," smiled Rachel, wisely.

"I hope Mrs. Greeley will find these useful," and Rachel took up from the table three neatly made holders. "Anyhow, when she uses them she won't need to burn her fingers, as she did—taking the coffee pot off the stove—the last time I was in there."

Then, too, among the birthday gifts were a Jerusalem cherry plant—which had been "slipped" from the root Rachel had brought from the East—for Lois McCanliss; and a chamois skin case for "Daddy" Patton to keep his glasses in.

"If they aren't very nice—my birthday gifts—they carry a lot of good wishes with them," and Rachel once more looked fondly at the small array on the table, before leaving the room. "And they're better than having no birthday gifts—at all!"

Thursday was an ideal spring day—soft and balmy. Rachel got her work out of the way early, and was ready to direct Oscar Downey—her father's assistant boy—where to take each gift, when he arrived at eight o'clock.

"Just say, when you leave them—one at each place," suggested Rachel, "that it's a birthday gift from Rachel Miller. It's written on the cards, but that won't matter—you'll need to make some explanation."

Before night, Rachel heard from every one to whom she had sent a birthday gift. Some sent notes, written with painful effort—every word expressive of gratitude; others came in person to thank her for "remembering a body so lovely like—and almost a perfect stranger, too."

"It's the most beautiful birthday I've ever had," declared Rachel happily, a tender expression in her deep blue eyes, as she stood on the little vine-covered porch, that evening, in the mellow moonlight. "Of the ten birthday gifts—mine has brought the greeatest amount of pleasure!"

"Yours?" queried her father, setting back his rocking chair.

"Yes; the giving was my gift—this time; and I've found it, father, to be the sweetest gift of all."

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, APRIL 24.

Theme for the Day—Departing Guests

Scripture—To depart and be with Christ, which is far better.—Phil. 1:23.

Be with me, Lord! My house is growing still
As one by one the guests go out the door;
And some, who helped me once to do thy will Behold and praise thee on the heavenly shore.

—T. C. Williams.

Prayer—Our Father, we accept this good day as Thy loving gift to us. It is the memorial of our Saviour's victory over death. It cheers with the confident assurance that those who go out from our fellowship along the dim ways of death are not departed forever, but have only gone a little earlier than we into the Father's house. May our worship today be gladdened by this thought as we miss the friends who once sat with us in the sanctuary. And may we meet them all again in the better home. Amen.

MONDAY, APRIL 25.

Theme for the Day—God's view and man's.

Scripture—Look not on his countenance, or on the height of his stature; for God seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but God looketh on the heart.—I. Sam. 16:7.

Through all disguise, form, place, or name,
Beneath the flaunting robes of sin,
Through poverty and squallid shame,
Thou lookest on the man within.

—John G. Whittier ("Democracy.")

Prayer—Our Father, we give Thee thanks for the gifts of life. Not only do we require the blessings Thou sendest us from day to day, but much more we need Thyself, the source of life and happiness. We need Thy spirit, that we may see things as Thou seest them, not with the partial and imperfect vision of the flesh. And may we tremble yet grow happy at the thought that Thou knowest us completely, and art acquainted with all our ways. Save us from contentment with the second best things of life, and so fit us for eternity. Amen.

TUESDAY, APRIL 26.

Theme for the Day—The Gift of Peace.

Scripture—Because of the tender mercy of our God, whereby the dayspring from on high shall visit us. To shine upon them that sit in darkness and the shadow of death; to guide our feet into the way of peace.—Luke 1:78, 79.

There is a place which no men know
Save those whom suffering hath laid low,—
The peace of pain.

A strength, which only comes to those Who've borne defeat,—greater, God knows,
Than victory.

A happiness, which comes at last,
After all happiness seems past,—
The joy of peace.

—Anonymous.

Prayer—Good Father, we adore Thee for the gifts which enrich our lives. In the contemplations of all Thou sendest us, our gratitude is quickened, our complainings are hushed, and our troubles seem as the fine dust of the balance. Yet we thank Thee even for the difficulties we have had to face, the hardships that have befallen us, and the defeats that seemed at first to crush us. Thou art teaching us that it is not success or victory alone that gives life worth, but that the finer graces of character blossom in the pathway of failure and defeat. Grant us, we beseech Thee, the culture of soul that adversity brings, and may we rise to the joy of Thy companionship, in which alone true peace is found. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 27.

Theme for the Day—In the hour of trial.

Scripture—I was dumb, I opened not my mouth; because thou didst it. Remove thy stroke away from me: I am consumed by the blow of thy hand.—Psalm 39:9, 10.

O teach me in the trying hour,
When anguish swells the drying tear,
To still my sorrows, own thy power,
Thy goodness love, thy justice fear.

—Thomas Chatterton ("Faith.")

Prayer—Divine Father, we seek Thy comforting presence in times when all earthly help seems nothing worth. In such hours we learn how much Thou canst mean to us, and how Thy grace can sustain our souls. Like the psalmist of old, we can find even in sorrow a certain consolation if we can feel that Thou art not far off, and that Thou art aiding us to find the light. Thy love is more than ever manifest in our days of affliction, and Thou waitest only to do us good when we are ready to accept Thy aid. Comfort us by the clear shining of Thy mercy, and give us rest in the after-time. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

THURSDAY, APRIL 28.

Theme for the Day—Too late!

Scripture—But at midnight there is a cry, Behold, the bridegroom! Come ye forth to meet him. Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps. And the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil; for our lamps are going out. And while they went away to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage feast; and the door was shut.—Matt. 25:6.

No light had we; for that we do repent;
And learning this, the bridegroom will relent.
Too late, too late! ye cannot enter now.

—Alfred Tennyson ("Guinevere").

Prayer—Merciful God, Thou art a just and loving Father, and we bow before Thee with deep reverence and daily thanks. Teach us the need of constant attention to the high obligations of Thy will. Thou hast called us into Thy service, and our greatest peril is that we may slight our duty of love and loyalty, and fail of Thy approval. Save us, we beseech Thee, from the sin of neglecting the true means of culture anad usefulness. May we escape the fate of those who too late discover that the summer is past, the harvest is ended, and their work not even well begun. For Christ's sake. Amen.

FRIDAY, APRIL 29.

Theme for the day—The wages of sin.

Scripture—For the wages of sin is death, but the free gift of God is eternal life, through Christ Jesus our Lord.—Rom. 6:23.

Another blow has fallen, Lord—
Was it from Thee?
Is it indeed Thy fiery sword
That cuts our hearts? We know Thy word;
We know by heart wherein it saith
"Whom the Lord loves He chasteneth"—
But also, in another breath,
This: "The wages of sin is death."

—Charlotte Perkins Stetson ("Death").

Prayer—Father of mercy and love, we thank Thee for the words of life and love which fell from the lips of our Master in the days of his flesh. But not less are we grateful for his words of warning against the supreme dangers of sin and stubbornness that so often make ungracious and questionable the lives we live. Thy love is as truly manifested in Thy chastisements of evil as in Thy approval of good. Deliver us, we pray, from deception of ourselves regarding our true standing with Thee, and make us responsive to the call of the Holy Spirit. For Thy name's sake. Amen.

SATURDAY APRIL 30.

Theme for the Day—Contentment.

Scripture—For I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content.—Phil. 4:11.

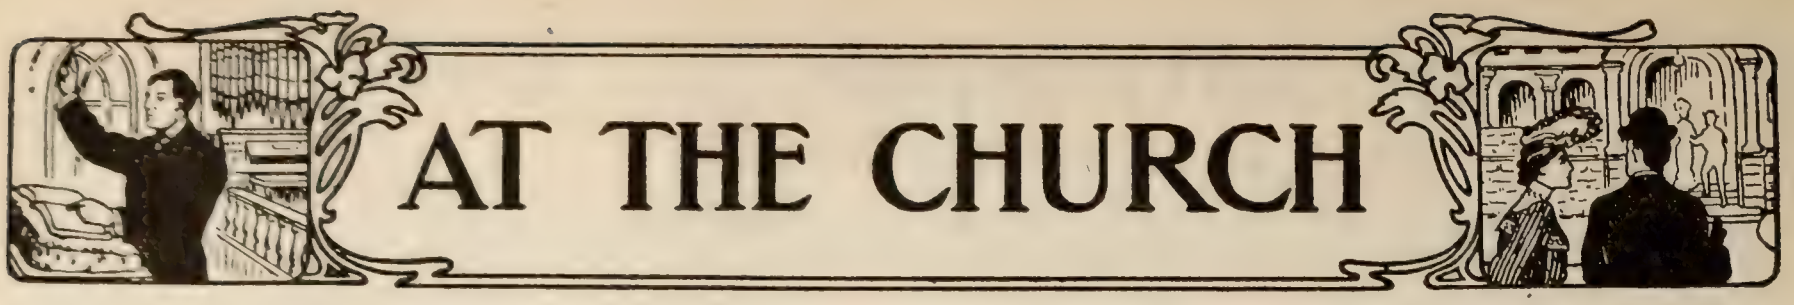
I am content with what I have,
Little be it or much;
And, Lord, contentment still I crave,
Because thou savest such.

—John Bunyan.

Prayer—Gracious God, when we think of Thy daily gifts beyond all counting, we are humbled that any thoughts of discontent should ever arise in our hearts. We crave from Thee more joy in the work of the kingdom, more gratitude for the wonder of Thy love, and more consecration to the holy life to which Thou hast called us in the gospel of our Lord. And may all the experiences of life bring us further on the way to the city of God. Amen.

The Meaning of "Baraca"

C. E. Crossland.



There are a great many people who do not know the unique origin and the meaning of the word "Baraca." Indeed, there are some Sunday-school workers to whom this will be a bit of new information. Since the word "Baraca" is now a most usual one in the vocabulary of Sunday-school workers throughout the entire world, it will be well to know how we came to have it.

In the twentieth chapter of II. Chronicles will be found the story from which "Baraca" is secured. Briefly it is this: The kingdom of Judah was threatened by an army of its enemies. Good King Jehoshaphat prayed unto Jehovah for deliverance, and the Lord answered this prayer by vexing the hosts of the enemy, so that they fell upon and slew each other. Thus when King Jehoshaphat and his people went from Jerusalem out to the scene of the camp of the enemy, they found most of them slain and the remnant fled. They also found so many jewels and riches that they were three days gathering up the spoil.

Then comes the twenty-sixth verse, as follows: "And on the fourth day they assembled themselves in the valley of Berecah; for there they blessed Jehovah. Therefore the name of that place was called the valley of Berecah unto this day." The margin translates this Berecah as "blessing."

When Mr. Marshall A. Hudson organized his first class for young men, he wanted a name for it. In carefully reading his Bible, he came upon this word meaning "blessing," and seized it for his class. The spelling of the word was changed slightly, so as to permit the making of the monogram design which is so familiar in well organized Sunday-schools today.

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

Severity and Sympathy*

It is difficult to conceive of a more radical contrast than that afforded by the two sections of this lesson. The attitude of Jesus in the first part of a stern and uncompromising critic of the popular indifference to his teachings. In the second part his speech overflows with tenderness toward those who are at all appreciative of his mission. In the first the cities which have known most of his work are called to account with caustic and stinging words; in the second part the teachable spirit which he likens to that of little children receives his warmest approval.

Jesus had been long enough engaged in his public work to know the attitude of the different communities toward him. Around the Sea of Galilee there was a circle of cities, all save one of which have so totally disappeared that even the sites of most of them are disputed. Tiberias alone of all this circle of the sea remains, and that had scarcely been built in Jesus' day.

At the northern end of the lake were such places as Capernaum, Bethsaida, and Chorazin, the latter two probably somewhat back from the sea among the hills. On the western shore were Magdala and Tiberias, while on the eastern side the Greek communities of the Pentapolis were to be found. In all of these places Jesus had taught, but particularly in those towns at the northern end of the sea, in one of which, Capernaum, he had lived. These were the places of privilege and opportunity. They had received such gifts of life as fell to few districts.

The Heathen Cities.

Far away on the coast of the Mediterranean there stood the two Phoenician cities of Tyre and Sidon. Only once had Jesus visited that region, and then only for the purpose of escaping the crowds that thronged his path in his own country. Tyre and Sidon were excellent examples of heathen cities, untouched by the messages of prophecy, and characterized by all the elements of heathen worship and immortality.

Far down in the Jordan valley, probably at the northern end of that Salt Sea in which the river Jordan meets its suicidal end, there had once stood the cities of the plain. The catastrophe that destroyed them, and the evil name that they bore, lingered in the mind of the nation as proofs of the chastisement of God upon iniquity. Sodom perished in its sin. No prophet voice had ever warned it against the wrath to come. Even Lot, who dwelt there for a time, seems to have had no influence if indeed he made an effort in the direction of reform.

The Contrast.

How different such cities as Capernaum, Chorazin and Bethsaida ought to have been from the communities of Tyre, Sidon and Sodom! Yet in Jesus' trenchant words they are subjected to even severer condemnation than the cities of the heathen world. To them had come the message as it had not come to the regions beyond. Upon the places where Jesus taught there rested a responsibility far greater than that belonging to the unevangelized. By this striking contrast he must have made his countrymen alarmingly aware of their accountability to God for the gifts of life. We can only make this principle clear to ourselves when we understand that the responsibility of the Christian world is far greater than that of the heathen world.

From him to whom much has been given much will be required. To the complacent and self-satisfied Israelites who prided themselves that because they were the chosen people therefore God was under obligations to spare them from all discipline and hardship, the prophet Amos cried, "You only have I known of all the nations of the earth, therefore I will chastise you for your iniquities." It is the Christian who has most to answer for, because his privileges are so great.

If one wanted to see the chastising hand of God in the ruin which overtook that circle of cities by the sea, certainly the devastation that has fallen upon them might well seem the visible token of divine wrath. But far more certain and disastrous are those moral penalties that fall upon the violation of privilege and the evasion of responsibility.

The Great Quotation.

The words of Jesus in his meditation upon the joy of disclosing the truth to the humble-hearted people who gathered about him is a revelation of his own nature. He delighted to make known to men the great truths that were reserved for no inner circle, but were the common possession of all who gave their hearts to God.

The invitation with which the chapter closes has made its appeal to all the generations. There are no sweeter words in the Bible than those winning sentences which call the weary and the burdened to the heart of Christ. It is to be noticed that the invitation is not to a form of belief, or of worship, or of organization, but to Jesus himself. He summoned men to his position, his point of view, his attitude toward life, his relations toward God, his belief in humanity, his program of righteousness. It is this which makes his invitation so practical and compelling. Indeed it is so simple and workable that men have hesitated to accept it in all of its noble brevity. It has seemed to them that some more formal interest must lurk behind these simple words. But the church is coming to understand Jesus as he intended all men should do. He summons men to himself, not to any belief regarding him, not to any ritual, and not to any organization. He understood that all these would come in their own time and way. Men cannot have religious convictions without organizing some kind of a creed. form of service. They cannot unite in Christian activity without some organization. But these are the incidents and not the end. It is Christ himself, the personal Friend and Saviour, the Teacher and Master of lives, to whom we are summoned.

To accept him as the one whom we serve, to sit at his feet and learn of him, to surrender ourselves to his gracious authority, to study his qualities of mind and heart as ideals to be organized into our own characters, this it is, to be citizens of his kingdom, this it is to call ourselves Christians.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

Topic April 24: Christ Winning the World. John 12:20-32.

Christ winning the world, what a stupendous conception! Not only Americans, North and South; not only Europeans, made up of numerous races and nationalities, but the yellow races of the Orient, the still darker races of Africa, and the cannibals of the islands of the sea,—"all men." Here is an opportunity for us to overcome our race prejudice. If we will take our stand here with the reverent and sympathetic attitude of Jesus, we will cease to talk about the "dago, the pollocks and the sheeney, but we will speak respectfully of the Italians, the Poles, and the Jews."

Christ says, "and I, if I be lifted up, will (tend to) draw all men unto me." Jesus announced himself as the Saviour, and the method by which he seeks to bring about this salvation best reveals its nature. His method was not mandatory. He sought to draw men. Islam used the sword as a means to promote his religion. He compelled men to accept him at the point of the bayonet. Through this physical mastery he subjected his "converts" to a most degrading fear. The same kind of fear which makes the heathen parent sacrifice his child in the firey arms of Moloch, or the muddy waters of the Ganges. This annihilates all self-respect, shuts out all appeal to the finer sensibilities, smothers every ennobling impulse—it blights the soul. But, on the other hand, these are the very things which Jesus seeks to develop. His appeal is from the heart to the heart. His love for us awakens our love for him. His human sympathy which prompted not only his coming, but also his service to the poor in both soul and body, his endurance of hardship in order that he might serve. The whole healing ministry which we have lately been studying in the Sunday-school lessons is indicative. Do you think any one could have come under the influence of that service and not have his own sympathies aroused? Who would not feel kindlier to one who has rendered such a service whether it came directly to him or to some one else? All will the more quickly hear the words of such an one and follow him. Notice he leads and we follow. He does not drive us with a lash like so many cattle. He woos us that he may win us to himself.

Does he do so still? Yes. How? By the great life-ideals which he sets before us. Who reads the gospels and seriously contemplates the life there set forth that he does not feel its attraction and long to live it himself? But most of all we are won to him by his disciples who embody these ideals in their lives and manifest them in our presence. Not only as it expresses itself in the great amount of charity work for the needy and the suuffering, but also in those who seek to rescue men and women from sin. Nothing short of Christian love will induce self-respecting men and women to enter the haunts and dens of vice and filth and literally rescue men and women from a living death, cleanse them and help them to stand on their feet once more.

Again Jesus is winning us by the plane of life to which he has been able to raise mankind. This manifests itself in our refined Christian homes. Their comfort, their joy, their peace, are unimpeachable testimonies of the value of the Christian ideals. The great and growing volumes of Christian literature, the fine arts; drawings, paintings, music, sculpture, etc., all bear record of the true life value of Jesus Christ.

Then we must never forget that in all this we must have a part. Jesus inaugurated his work. Then he gave his disciples a message to live and proclaim to all the world. And that commission has been passed from one to another until now. It remains for us, therefore, in this winning of the world to Christ not only to assume that we have a part but that we must co-operate with other disciples in the great task. Christ is winning the world through us.

an equality with every other man in the place, without any apology. He must find the same spirit in the church if he is to be permanently attracted to it.

"The church must preach a clearer social message. When our young men go to the average theological seminary to study for the ministry they study about the social life of the Israelites, the Jebusites, the Hitites and the Perizites, and when they become our ministers and preach about these very interesting people who lived so long ago, we listen to them with considerable pleasure—but when a minister studies into the social life of the Chicagoites, the Pittsburgites or the Brooklynites, and preaches about it, in precisely the same way that he would preach about the social life of the Amalekites, for instance, some one will remind him that he might better preach the 'simple gospel.' But the gospel is as broad as humanity and as deep as human experience. Any gospel which falls short of this ideal is an insult to Him who gave it to us and a slander upon our Christianity.

"There are thousands of men, women and children who would not listen to the gospel message as most of us understand it—even though it were preached by an angel sent by heaven. With them, to smile has become a lost art. The look of care has come into their faces so frequently and for so long a period at a time, that it now seems almost indelibly impressed upon them. They go through life like lean, warped animals.

"The lack of a living wage, the long hours of labor, the back-breaking toil, the inability to pay for medicine and for doctor's services, their children dying off like files, put out upon the streets because they cannot pay their rent, a hopeless old age—these are some of the things which weigh down the hearts and lives of multitudes in our great cities. Talk about preaching hell-fire to such! What they want to know is how to get out of the hell in which they are now living. No hell in the future can hold as many terrors for them as the hell which they know most about. It is in meeting the needs of such that the church in coming days will be most severely tested.

"If the social vices in Chicago are to be wiped out it must be done by the church and the laboring man working together hand in hand. And if the social vices in Chicago are not wiped out I believe God and man will hold the church and the laboring man both responsible.

Labor Looks for a Prophet.

"The workingman must find in the church more of the prophetic spirit. Too long have we been boasting of our glorious traditions—traditions with which we have had nothing to do because they were created by our great grandfathers. The workingman rightfully wants to know what the church is doing in the twentieth century. The danger is that the church will so long hold herself aloof from the movements being inaugurated by the common people that the day will arrive when the justification for their existence will become so self-evident that there will no longer be any need for leadership on the part of the church.

"Some day God will raise up a prophet who shall again win to himself the common people—those who once heard Jesus Christ gladly. That day shall reveal whether the church will capture the labor movement or whether the labor movement will capture the church. Much will depend upon whether that prophet comes out of the organized church or whether, as it happened 2,000 years ago, he shall come from the ranks of the common people—a lowly, despised, rejected Nazarene."

A Gracious Influence

By Erie Waters.

"It is certainly very beautiful. How it towers above its fellows! It reminds me of Constance."

"A tree remind you of Mrs. Forrester? How absurd!"

"Not so absurd as it seems, Mary. I have known them both all my life. Look at the tree now; not a leaf left, yet it is a 'thing of beauty,' so noble, so lofty, so sturdy and yet so graceful, with those smaller branches and twigs, standing out like a fret-work against the wintry sky.

"It appeared to me at its loveliest in spring time, in its delicate, marvelous coloring. Then, in mid-summer, its deeper greee, its wealth of foliage, its grateful shade, were the very perfection of its life. And, today, with all its embellishments gone, it teaches its lesson still, it gratifies the eye."

"True, every word, Mary,—of a tree; but why is it like Constance Forrester?"

"You must remember, child, I have known her all my life. I remember her a beautiful girl; lovely, unselfish, useful, accomplished. I remember her a wife; a mother, a friend; more beautiful in maturity; gracious in all her ways; a very source of strength to her husband, despite her gentleness. She shared the good things of life with those less fortunate. She drew men, women and children to her. Then the summer of her life passed; the clothes of circumstance, the charm of youth, the advantages of wealth, left her. Her dearest and nearest were taken away by distance or death.

"But, today—wanting all these—she still draws us to her, with invisible cords. Her hair is white; her face is thin; but the beauty of holiness, of patience, of calmness, rests upon her. To us she is a fountain of wisdom, a tower of strength, because the grace, the charm, the beauty, were but the ornaments of a strong character. Firm of will, and steadfast in faith, unshaken has she been by the storms of life; strong through vicissitudes, as is the trunk of the sturdy old tree."

A Little Nonsense

FLETCHERIZING.

A witty woman has coined the word "muncheon" to describe one of Horace Fletcher's feasts.—Good Housekeeping.

WARY.

Thompson—"Suppose a man should call you a liar, what would you do?"

Jones (hesitatingly)—"What sized man?"—Jewish Ledger.

NOT PARTICULAR.

"What kind of a man would you like for a husband?"

"O, either a bachelor or a widower. I'm not particular which."—Universalist Leader.

THE COMPLIMENT FEMININE.

"Do you like my new hat?" asked Mrs. Brooke.

"Yes," replied Mrs. Lynn. "I had one just like it when they were in style."—Lippincott's Magazine.

OVERWORKING THE METER.

Mother—"Come, William, quick. Minna has tried to kill herself by inhaling gas!"

Father—"Good Heavens! Think what the gas bill will be this month!"—Meggendorfer Blaetter.

MORE SUGAR SCANDAL.

The Grocer's Wife—"Ach! no, my child, ve can not to de beach go in de vinter; but ven de gustomers have went away, you may take your liddle pail und shofel and play mit de granulated sugar.——Harper's Magazine.

QUALITY, NOT QUANTITY.

"It's such a small chunk of ice you give me for fifty pounds," complained the housewife.

"But notice, ma'am, the firm and excellent quality of it," said the iceman. "In buying ice your motto should be 'Not how much, but how good.'"—Chicago Tribune.

UNBUSINESSLIKE.

A Berlin financier, who had celebrated his eightieth birthday about a quarter of a year previously, fell very sick. His business friends visited him and tried to cheer him up.

"You, with your strong constitution, will come out of this sickness all right," said one. "God will leave you with us until ninety at least."

The sick financier smiled and said:

"Why should he wait to take me at 90 when he can have me at 80¼?"—American Hebrew.

THE FIRST GARDEN.

"And how are the potatoes coming on?" asked Mr. Younghusband of his little wife.

"Well, dear," began the lady, nervously, I'm rather afraid we shall have to buy them after all."

Mr. Younghusband frowned.

"But, my dear Maria," he expostulated, "I distinctly understood from you a couple of months or so ago that you had planted a whole row!"

"That's quite right, dear," explained Maria, "but I've just remembered that I forgot to open the tins!"—Answers.

NOT RUNNING.

When Senator Vance was running for Congress, he called on an old negro, who had in early life served the Vance family. Asked after his health, the negro replied, "Mighty po'ly in this worl', but it's all right over yander." "Do you believe in the doctrine of election?" asked Vance with great solemnity? "It's the doctrine of the Bible," answered the old man. "Uncle Ephriam, do you think I've been elected?" asked Vance again. "Massa Zeb, I'd a leetle ruther you wouldn't draw that question. I'm too near de grabe to tell a lie, but de fac' am, I neber yet knowed nor hear tell of no man bein' elected what wasn't a candidate."—Christian Register.

Unity Through Love's Regnancy

A Layman's View of the Basis of Religious Fellowship

By F. Trendley

All who are students of God's Word are aware of Christ's injunction to his followers that they should be one. He sought to have them cultivate within themselves peace, harmony, good will, tender affection and power of co-operation. He had had presented to him many proofs that human nature is essentially combative for "Jesus knew what was in man." "The senses divide," said old Parmenides. What shall unite? Our Lord was in the midst of warring forces. Life was tense. It was easy for men to slay their fellowmen and this because of the depreciation of the value of human life by reason of its ability to co-operate on terms of justice and good will, and thus demonstrate its worth.

The leading Jewish sects sought co-operation upon terms of doctrinal belief, an impossibility whose proof the world is ever exhibiting. They would force the intellect, this most royal and independent faculty whose virtue resides solely in its freedom, into ways of thinking foreign to itself. Their methods were the methods of Jason when he sowed the dragon's teeth. It is the method of the inquisition. Galileo's protest is the protest of man's intellectual faculty, the faculty of truth, against any sort of coercion. Indispensable to all progress is the right of the individual to do his own thinking and to take his own place. It is the right of truth also to propagate itself. It is legitimate for it to invade any dominion of thought not in harmony with its belief and try to convert. It is equally the right of any unconverted man to resist, that is, to challenge the argument and appeal, to demand proof, to scrutinize evidence, and, at last, if unconvinced, to reject the appeal. It is also the high duty of the intellect to be open to the truth, to be hospitable to all advances, to be reverent of other's opinions as they may seem to be at least sincere and worthy of consideration.

Christ and Paul.

Our Lord throughout his entire life, and Paul, his great disciple, were ever teaching, ever seeking minds which might be influenced. Both were painstaking in their appeals. They offered their propositions with infinite patience though not indeed in the same way. In small companies, before large multitudes, with twos and threes, one by one, the mission of our Lord and of Paul was to compel belief by the sole method of truth. The argument of Jesus was presented in deed and statement of inexpressible clearness; Paul's by-ways of syllogistic proof. To the open-minded even though dull they were considerate. At no time did sharp words spring to their lips save as against those who knowingly denied truth and resorted to physical force to overcome the spiritual. Every word and line of Christ's teachings indicate a reverence for truth and for the prerogative of the mind to canvass propositions. How patiently he dealt with all, holding no time so valuable, no use of energy so profitable as when he was engaged in causing truth to be recognized and unsealing eyes that were blind. His attitude toward Thomas ought to carry with it a world-wide lesson. An honest doubter was to him more precious than a simply facile believer who could give no reason for the "faith that was in him." Disbelief when sincere was no ground for condemnation.

Our Lord sought the oneness of His people in social service, not in the operations of the intellect. Christ's appeal to life recognizes what all modern psychology teaches, viz., that the central factor because the ultimate and decisive one of the individual life is not the intellect but the will, that a man is not a man because he thinks aright but because he acts aright. Acts of will are the expressions of a man's whole character including his thinking power. His thoughts are but partial expressions of himself. His emotions are but partial expressions. What man does is in a peculiar sense the man himself. Hence the parable of the Good Samaritan and the Prodigal Son. Hence the Beatitudes.

Our Lord's way to the reconciliation of the world was through service, through faith by which the heart could be touched and the deep well-springs of life drawn upon. The Pharisee's method was through the intellect, the most stubborn, exacting and pitiless as respects opposition, of all the elements of man's nature; and truly so, because the guardian of the very foundation of the spiritual life. Ultimately man must know, but the way to spiritual knowledge is through spiritual service.

Truth Infinite, the Mind Limited.

Why impose intellectual tests then upon men when truth is so infinite and divine and the intellect so limited in range? Why denounce men when they cannot see face to face with another? Let us illustrate. Why do I submit myself to baptism by immersion and partake of the Lord's Supper weekly? Can any man demonstrate that in them, per se, there is any saving grace? Why then do I consent? Because my reading of Holy Writ and my knowledge of human nature tell me that these observances are pleasing to God, and I think he saw in them an efficacy into the reasons for which I have some insight. But as between communing at the Lord's table and sitting by the bedside of the sick and dying, one could have no choice. These ordinances are means to an end. The spiritual welfare of men is an end. I wait far more graciously and effectively upon my Lord in loving personal service to his children than in observance of what I deem to be a form of obedience, provided they conflict in time and space. Of course if I believe our Lord imposed any observance upon me, obedience is no longer a mere form. It then becomes a spiritual act. Yet there is here no conflict. First things take precedence and annul secondary things. Always the first things with our Lord were the peace and comfort of his children. In men's hearts is the Kingdom of Heaven, not in their intellects.

When, then, I hear of people appealing for Christian union and observe that they seem to seek it on the basis of the theology our people seem able to extract from our Lord's life and teaching, they seem to me to be having their "labor for their pains." When the appeal is made to our Lord's life and teachings as found in the "Open Book," giving to all the right of private interpretation, but holding that the ultimate interpretation must be in terms of fruitage and not of doctrine, such a position will result in good. "By their fruits ye shall know them." Any man who examines the immense social service wrought by Jews, Catholics, Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists, Moravians, the sects if you please, and does not find his heart warming toward them simply because intellectually he cannot agree with all their teachings, that man is very far from such a co-operating spirit as would realize his Lord's command. Oneness is in life not in doctrine, in service not in commandments, in heart not in intellect, in love not in syllogisms. Love is one, knowledge is of the many. God alone can find the one in the many intellectually, man only through the principle of love.

Men Bound to Differ.

To the end of time men will differ in intellectual thinking simply because the world of truth is infinite. All facts instantly break up into countless forms. But with principles it is not so. Service is the same everywhere and at all times and can be instantly understood and appreciated. Love expresses itself under the same forms everywhere and at all times and so becomes in its expression a universal language. I little care whether my neighbor goes to my church or not, providing he is a true worshiper of God, as shown in personal obedience to God's command to love his fellowmen. Our Lord is the Lord of all men. All creeds, all faiths, all denominations may equally adore him, for the expressed essence of His being is service. We love God because God sent his only begotten Son that through him we might not perish but have everlasting life. We love our Lord for what he did and was. He served and was obedient unto death amidst great affliction. Nowhere do we hear of his tolerating long debates. Nowhere did he exhibit wrath save once, then his thunderbolts were launched against that ugliest of all religions—formal religion; against souls petrified by heartless learning issuing in selfishness. How infinitely tender he was with the erring, the weak, the sinful, the stumbling. How many times shall I forgive him who sins against me?

A man offers a stone for bread who gives to a needy man merely a new doctrine instead of love. True doctrines are good. Truth must express itself. Men must be able to read sign-boards. But truth of intellect in other than abstractions is dependent upon love of the heart. "If a man will to do my will he shall know of the doctrine." Hence Christian union becomes a noble plea only if made upon the right basis. If I can't be loved except my intellectual thinking conforms I do not want to be loved. "I am what I am by the grace of God." And God's wondrous grace has given to me my own powers. He has endowed me with my own gifts. He wants no dull, stolid level. Infinite variety of every sort of wealth is the proof of his glorious nature. He would bind together by but one band, viz., love. "Love ye one another and so fulfill the law of God." Christian union can exist only through love, and such love as Jesus Christ manifested on earth.

A Lonely Day

Yesterday she went away,
Mother did, with Dad;
All her room is cold and dark;
All the chairs look sad.

All the pictures seem to frown;
The bed is cold and high,
There isn't even any lap
Where to sit and cry.

Tomorrow she'll be back again
Mother will, and Dad,
When they see her face again
The mirrors will be glad!

The church at Greeley, Colo., dedicated their new building April 3. Z. T. Sweeney had charge of the services. A. E. Dubber is the pastor.

Lowell C. McPherson is assisting in a meeting at Rochester, N. Y., with the Columbia Ave. Church. C. C. Crawford is the pastor.

There were sixteen additions to the First Church, Davenport, Iowa, Easter Sunday, all but three were by confession. S. M. Perkins is pastor.

On a following page will be found Pastor E. M. Waits description of the dedication of the Magnolia Ave. Church, Fort Worth, Texas.

J. K. Arnot is getting well started in his work with the church at South Chicago while continuing his studies in the University of Chicago.

A. F. Roodhouse, pastor of the church at Santa Ana, Cal., has been assisting G. M. Anderson and the church at Riverside in a short meeting.

F. B. Hoffman, of Winters, Cal., is holding missionary institutes on the coast which receive the highest commendation of thoughtful and informed men.

The First Church, San Bernardino, Cal., has called J. R. Jolly from the church at Huntington Beach, and he is already at work in his new field.

Thomas H. Popplewell had two recent additions to the church in Arkansas City, Kans. One of these was by confession, "and immersed the same hour of the night."

At Connellsville, Penn., there have been twelve additions at regular services in the past ten days. Ten were by confessions, six heads of families. C. M. Watson is pastor.

H. H. Guy, of Berkeley Seminary, who preaches at Palo Alto, and J. R. Perkins, pastor West Side Church, San Francisco, exchanged pulpits the first Sunday in April.

Chas A. Pearce, pastor at West Pullman, has just welcomed the fourth child to his home. He is pursuing post-graduate work in the University of Chicago during the spring quarter.

J. E. Pickett, pastor of the Highland Christian Church, Denver, Colo., who is a Knight Templar, held a service for this order March 27. The entire program was beautifully printed.

The calendar of the First Church, Boulder, Colo., records an offering of $180.00 given to missions by the church during March. The Sunday-school reached an attendance of 469 Easter Sunday, A. L. Ward is pastor.

Under the ministry of A. D. Skaggs all departments of the church at Sunnyside, Wash., are taking on new life. The Sunday-school attendance since January first has more than doubled.

The last church organized by L. L. Carpenter is at Treaty, Wabash Co., Ind. It was dedicated Sunday, April 10, by Grant K. Lewis, Secretary of American Christian Missionary Society.

J. C. Burkhart, pastor at Connersville, Ind., for the past seven years, has accepted a call to the church at Frankfort, Ind., where he will begin work at soon as his successor can be chosen at Connersville.

As a result of the convention of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, the church of the San Joaquin Valley, Cal., will increase their offering to foreign missions from $10,000 to $40,000, so writes C. L. Beal, pastor of the North Side Church, Fresno.

"Man's Need of Immortality" was the subject of the Easter sermon by H. H. Harmon, pastor at Lincoln, Neb. There were four accessions to the church. In the evening the choir rendered the cantata "Easter Eve and Morn."

Jerome Emmanuel began his pastorate with the First Church of Tremont, Nebr., Easter Sunday, coming there from Aurora, Neb. Mr. Emmanuel is a graduate of Oxford University, England, with post-graduate work in Lyons, France.

On the 25th anniversary of their marriage, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Cannon, Pittsfield, Ill., gave a reception in the parlors of the church, when they welcomed about 300 parishoners and friends. During the afternoon the church presented Mr. and Mrs. Cannon with a box containing 100 silver dollars.

The men of the churches of Disciples of Christ of New York City and vicinity met for dinner on Thursday evening, April 14, at the Twenty-third Street Branch of the Young Men's Christian Association. The city mission plans of the Disciples' Missionary Union were discussed.

J. E. Davis, of Beatrice, Neb., made the annual address at the North Side Church, Omaha, L. B. D. C. No. 272, taking for his subject "The Disciples of Christ and the Movement for Church Unity." Splendid committee reports were made and all the old officers were elected.

W. A. Oldham, Kansas City, Mo., while visiting his daughter in Carthage, Mo., was stricken with paralysis, while there is hope of his temporary recovery Mr. Oldham's condition is critical. He has been a teacher and preacher among the Disciples throughout a long life.

The Sunday school of the church at Colfax, Ill., on Easter Sunday made an offering of $83.75 for the benevolent association. The Berean class, taught by the pastor, Norman H. Robertson, made him a life member of the association. The church and school are in a healthy condition.

Dr. W. Bayard Craig, minister of the Lenox Avenue Church of Disciples, 744 West 126th street, spoke on a recent Sunday morning on the topic, "Religious Difficulties and the Remedy." The subject of his evening address was "The Love of Nature and the Love of God." Dr. Craig illustrated his evening sermon with stereopticon views.

Ray O. Miller, First Church, Fresno, Chas. L. Beal, North Side, Fresno, L. R. Clark, Fowler, and A. E. Mackay, Clovis, called a convention of the church of the San Joaquin Valley, to be held at Fresno, April 8 and 9. In this valley there are seventeen churches of the Disciples with about 4,000 members.

The following note from the calendar of the church at Bloomington, Ind., indicates the definiteness of the work of the church and its successful pastor J. C. Todd. "There are three lines of work which we will emphasize in the church for the remainder of the year—religious education, church membership and church finances."

Annual meeting of the Central Nebraska Ministerial Association was held in Bethany the first days of April. I. J. Spencer and W. P. Aylesworth were the leading speakers. The subject of the address of the former was: "The Force of the New Testament Precedent" of the latter: "The Ethics of the Cross."

"Where Does Sin Come From?" was the subject of a recent sermon by Geo. B. Van Arsdall, Central Church, Denver, fully reported in a paper of the city. Mr. Van Arsdall emphasized the truth that most explanations were too easy on the actors in life's drama, and called upon people to face their responsibility in moral action.

Harry G. Hill began his fourth year as pastor of the Third Church, Indianapolis, on April 3. The congregation tendered him a rising vote of thanks and apreciation at the close of the morning service. There were twelve received into the church during the day, a total of 260 in the three years of Mr. Hills pastorate, all at regular services.

C. L. Morrison, pastor of the church at Wellsville, Ohio, preached to a large audience on a recent Sunday evening on "Some Industrial Problems" at the request of the labor organizations of the city who came out in large numbers to hear him. The city papers gave generous space to reporting the sermon.

Tacoma, Wash. Seventy-three today, 116 in four days of invitations. House packed at women's meeting. Hundreds turned away tonight. Scoville a mighty prophet of God. Mrs. Scoville a wonderful influence in song. Each of six helpers are expert. Great shop meeting. Conservative Tacoma awakening to responsibility.—C. A. Moore.

Tuesday, April 19, Home Missionary Secretary I. N. McCash, assisted by Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, Md., will hold a Parliament on American Missions in the church at Springfield, Ill. A banquet will be served at 6:30 for interested men and women, following which Mr. Ainslie will speak on "The Unfinished Task of the Restoration."

The Central Ohio Ministerial Association will meet in the Y. M. C. A., Columbus, Ohio, April 11. The book reviewed will be George Gordon's "Religion and Miracle." Newark's new minister will read a paper in the afternoon session, and Secretary I. N. McCash will make an address. O. P. McMahan is president and T. L. Lowe, secretary.

The church at Centerville, Iowa, J. H. Booth, pastor, raised $800 for missions during the past month, supporting its living-link in Tokyo, Japan. In the autumn the church takes the offering for the support of its two living-links in the home field,—Fort Dodge,

Iowa, and Van Cover, B. C., under A. C. M. S. The churches of Centerville are now planning for a union revival to be held in June under leadership of I. E. Honeywell.

I. J. Cahill, of Dayton, Ohio, is spending the month of April among the churches of Illinois in the interest of the American Christian Missionary Society. Correspondents should note that he does not become secretary of Ohio until June 1. Until that date their work continues in the hands of H. Newton Miller, 864 Rose Bldg.,. Mr. Cahill will be available for a short meeting in May.

The editors were pleased to receive a commendatory letter from one of the fathers of the faith who is now eighty-eight years old and living in Vanceburg, Ky. He preached his first sermon in 1842 and his last in 1906. James F. Carney has thus been a minister among us for sixty-four years, organizing many churches and strengthening many others. The value of such a life to the cause of God and man is inestimable.

The church at Canton, Ohio, P. H. Welshimer, pastor, closed an eight-day meeting recently with a total of 168 additions to the church. P. M. Kendall, Columbus, Ind., had charge of the music. The pastor did the preaching. Mr. Welshimer has served this church as pastor for eight years. During that time 2,400 members have been received into the fellowship of the church, which has a present resident membership of 2,200.

C. M. Watson, minister of the church at Cornellsville, Pa., has announced a series of "Sunday Evening Bright Hour Services." The sermon subjects are as follows: "Keep Your Hands Clean," "Shine as the Stars," "Bear Your Own Burden," "Bear One Anothers Burdens," "Use or Lose Your Talent," "Get the Religious Habit," "Cultivate the Mind," "Forget the Things that are Behind," "Pray Without Ceasing," "Set the Child in the Midst," "Launch Out into the Deep," "Better the Nations Life."

Perry J. Rice, pastor of the church at El Paso, Texas, is spending a few days in Medina, Ohio, where he went to attend the funeral of his father, who lived to round out a long and useful life as father, neighbor, friend, citizen and soldier, and for seventy-three years an influential member of the church. Mr. Rice, Sr., was a man of broad sympathies and was held in highest esteem by the members of other churches of this city.

The semi-annual convention of the churches of southwest Minnesota, was held with the Gordon City church, March 24 and 25. Though not largely attended the convention was a very successful one, in good fellowship, enthusiasm and helpfulness. The central theme was "The Church at Work." State Evangelist Hollingsworth spoke on "Christ the Perfect Teacher. L. W. Porter, of St. Paul gave the convention sermon on: "Christian Loyalty." J. G. Holmstead was leader of song.

Guy W. Sarvis, now under the appointment as living link missionary from the Hyde Park Church, Chicago, is giving the following series of addresses at the Wednesday evening meetings: Missions from the Modern View-point—The Missionary Idea, The Question of East and West, Are the Oriental Religions Sufficient? Religious and Cultural Achievements of Missions, Social Evils of the Orient, Social Amelioration Through Missions, Current Criticisms of Missions, The Missionary Outlook.

J. F. Findley has closed his work with the church at Fort Collins, Colo. His address is now 110 Dillon Ave., Indianapolis, Ind., though Mr. Findley will spend the spring and summer in travel through Europe. The Fort Collins church and people of the city joined in giving Mr. Findley a hearty farewell reception in which the pastors of the other churches of the city were active participants.

C. H. Mattox, Hiawatha, Kans., is preaching and Chas. E. McVay leading the singing in a meeting at Morrill, Kans.

Houston, Texas, April 1.—Breeden-Lintt meeting closed; twenty-five days, 101 additions. Breeden's second meeting. First meeting year ago, 158. Offering for Foreign Missions this year will be two thousand dollars.—A. F. Sanderson.

J. E. Lynn, who recently closed his work with the First Church, Warren, Ohio, is resting a few weeks on a ranch near Greeley, Colo., before engaging in his new work at Greeley. Mr. Lynn was on the ranch in time to assist (?) in a "round up" and is in the saddle every day.

The church at Fitzgerald, Ga., Everett Hollingworth, pastor, has had four additions by letter and statement and fifteen baptisms in the past three weeks. They are now in a meeting with E. R. Clarkson, evangelist, the pastor directing the chorus. Notwithstanding a rival meeting in the most influential church in the city, and another announced to begin in a week, the night audiences tax the capacity of the house, which has been seated for over 600. The church is alive and harmonious.

In the two weeks meeting which J. R. Ewers held with his church in East End Pittsburg, there were twenty-four accessions to the church, making fifty-one since Mr. Ewers began work with this church last October. This church is sane in its temper and does not overestimate numbers, but works for permanent and natural results. Such a church has far-reaching influence even in the large city—indeed it is the only type of church that can have much influence in the city.

Dr. J. H. Ruble, chaplain of the National Soldiers' Home, Johnson City, gave his lecture on "The Character and How to Build It" at Milligan College, Thursday evening, March 24. A large and representative audience was present and gave the speaker close attention. The lecture fairly bristled with humor and good advice. The speaker outlined character as dependent upon three considerations—(1) Energy, embracing industry; (2) Integrity; (3) Religion. Dr. Ruble is an eloquent and forceful speaker and his varied fund of experience makes him entertaining and instructive to an unusual degree.

The Harvey, Ill., Church closed a two weeks' meeting Sunday night, April 3. The meeting was conducted with home forces entirely. There were twenty-seven additions, three of whom were under fifteen yars old. Th remainder were adults. About half the number were by confession. There were seven husbands and their wives in the number. The meeting helped the church a great deal. The Sunday-school is increasing and likewise the audiences at the church. Audiences through March are the largest which we have had. The church is greatly encouraged. This is the second meeting held by the pastor, W. D. Endres, whose meeting a year ago added twenty-eight to the church.

The subject of the sermon at the Hyde Park Church, Chicago, April 10, was "The Place of Reason in Religion." The following note to the pastor, Dr. Ames, regarding the arrangements just completed for sending Mr. and Mrs. Sarvis as missionaries from this church has interest to Christian Century readers: "Foreign Christian Missionary Society, Cincinnati, Ohio, March 26, 1910. Dear Bro. Ames: Let me congratulate you and the church most heartily upon that wonderful victory, for it is wonderful. You have certainly set a standard for giving that leads every church in our brotherhood. There isn't anything in our fellowship that approaches it. It will be an inspiration to everybody and I know will result in great blessing to you folks. Most cordially yours, Stephen J. Corey."

Dr. Clinton Lockhart writing of the burning of the main building of Texas Christian University says the cost of the building was $130,000; with library worth $15,000; laboratories estimated at $4,000, pianos valued at $3,000, and furniture at $20,000. The total insurance was but $29,000. In the building were the administrative officers, class rooms and dormitories. Through the presence of mind of the business manager, Prof. J. F. Anderson, many of the students saved their belongings, but some of them and some of the teachers lost everything in their possession at the university. The university will be rebuilt as soon as definite plans can be adopted. The citizens of Waco have pledged largely for a new building. The service of Texas Christian University are being held in the dining room—the only available place since the fire. Despite this there were 206 in the Sunday-school Easter Sunday. Four young people volunteered for service, one as preacher, three as foreign missionaries. There were three accessions to the church. Colby Hall, the pastor presses enthusiastically forward in face of the difficulties.

The East End Church, Pittsburg, Pa., observed Passion Week, and continued with decision meetings one weekmore. The religious life of the congregation was enriched and twenty-four people were received into the fellowship of the church, nine of these by baptism. Since September 1, when John R. Ewers came to this church, fifty one people, representing much strength, have united with the church,a mong these two great-grandchildren of Alexander Campbell, Alexander and Virginia Thompson, and also one fine young man has entered the ministry, Mr. Ira Boyts, who was baptized in December, and is now preaching at Sweetwater, Texas. It looks now as though the offering for foreign missions would approach $1,200. Mr. Ewers was assisted in the meetings by Mrs. Seth Tuttle of Akron, Ohio, as singer. Mr. and Mrs. Tuttle were baptized by Mr. Ewers during his Youngstown ministry. She has a contralto voice of marvelous richness and sympathy and sings the gospel songs straight into the heart. Many of our ministers should employ her in quiet meetings. Not a single criticism was heard concerning her work.

Chicago Disciples try to maintain a philosophical calm through all sorts of changes in their pastoral leadership. But their purpose almost fails them when they learn of the resignation of A. W. Taylor from the Irving Park pulpit. Mr. Taylor has been called to teach sociology in the Bible College of the University of Missouri. This, of course, is such a piece of work as he is peculiarly fitted to perform, and judged in the light of the years spent in equipping himself for this sort of service all Mr. Taylor's friends and parishioners agree that there is no question as to his duty. He will add great strength to the faculty of the Columbia school, an institution of growing significance in Missouri church life. During the one year of Mr. Taylor's pastorate of the Irving Park Church forty-two persons have been added to the membership, the congregations have increased, and the missionary offerings more than doubled. Mr. Taylor's plans include a trip to the Edinburgh Missionary Conference, accompanied by Mrs. Taylor, whose home was formerly in Birmingham. He will take up his new college duties September 1. Readers of The Christian Century will be glad to know that his pen will continue to interpret to us the social events and currents as he has so admirably done for the past year.

Greeley, Colo., April 4.—Brother Sweeney dedicated yesterday a beautiful house in a beautiful little city of ten thousand, free of debt. Asked for eight thousand dollars, raised fourteen thousand. His sermons were powerful appeals in favor of the divinity of the church and Christianity. A. E. Dubber has done a phenomenal work in the past year here. Seven preachers in the afternoon, representing seven churches made talks. The Commercial Glee Club, T. E. Pitts, director, rendered splendid music. We begin a meeting for Mr. Dubber and the congregation tonight. Brother St. John sings. He has next month, not taken. Address him here. I believe God has an open door here for us and much people in Greeley. Pray for the workers.—James Small.

The Call

By Phillips Brooks.

The while I listened came a word—
I knew not whence, I could not see;
But when my waiting spirit heard,
I cried: "Lord, here am I; send me!"

For in that word was all contained—
The Master's wish, the servant's joy,
Worth of the prize to be attained,
And sweetness of the time's employ.

I turned and went—along the way
That word was food and air and light;
I feasted on it all the day,
And rested on it all the night.

I wondered; but when soon I came
To where the word complete must be,
I called my wonder by its name—
For lo! the Word I sought was He.

Be Strong!

Be strong!
We are here to play, to dream, to drift,
We have hard work to do, and loads to lift.
Shun not the struggle; face it. 'Tis God's Gift.

Be strong!
Say not the days are evil—who's to blame?
And fold the hands and acquiesce—O shame!
Stand up, speak out, and bravely, in God's name.

Be strong!
It matters not how deep intrenched the wrong,
How hard the battle goes, the day how long,
Faint not, fight on! Tomorrow comes the song.

said with a blush. "Of course poor people in Chicago must be satisfied with very little, so far as having friends and a place of their own is concerned. But we shall have each other, Teddy, and if Mr. Randall starts the new works, I know we can come back."

Teddy thought, prophetically,—"They'll never let him!"

He said nothing to discourage her hopes, but kissed her tenderly:

"You're a brave little woman! A man's got something to spur him on to do his best with the chance of a home, and a wife in it like you!—I'll let you know how I'm getting on, and just as soon as I can I'll come back to you."

Teddy left at midnight and spent some uncomfortable hours trying to sleep in the cramped seat of a common coach. He awoke from his disturbed slumbers at daybreak, chilled and discouraged. He saw the sun rise over the dun level prairie. The sloughs were filled with water, which caught the sunshine, flashing back the dazzling reflection. The keen wind rustled the withered weeds, and flocks of wild ducks, sharply outlined against the morning sky, were winging their flight toward some distant feeding-ground.

In every direction long trains were speeding swiftly across the flat, treeless stretches suspended in the heavy morning air, thinning, fading, vanishing—marked their course. Presently, as the train rolled on, the site of the great Babel could be discerned afar off. Over it hung a pall of darkness, through which huge, bald elevators loomed, up, enmeshed in a labyrinth of railway tracks, on one side, bordered by the tideless river on the other.

By the time the train drew up in the great, gloomy, echoing station at Polk Street. Teddy heartily wished himself back in Carlinville. It was like paradise in retrospect. But there could be no going back! his banishment was as final as that of the first parents of the race; and the want and beggary that barred the way of return was a not less potent barrier than the flaming sword.

Teddy did not expect his friend to meet him at that hour in the morning, but he was not altogether unfamiliar with the city, and it was arranged that he was to stay with Jackson until he was fairly settled. Accordingly he took a West Side car and set out for his boarding place. They were delayed at the river by the opening of the bridge, and tugs screamed and panted as they dragged the lumber-laden schooners to their anchorage up-stream.

At the end of a quarter of an hour the cars proceeded on their way; and far out on the West Side, beyond the district of macadamized streets, he found the place he sought.

A slovenly maid of all work answered his ring.

"Mr. Jackson said you was to go right up to his room when you come," she said, staring with impudent admiration at Teddy's handsome face and fine athletic figure.

He had supposed that here, with the wind sweeping over the wide open spaces and across the pure cold waters of the lake, there could be no lack of fresh air. But the dark, dirty hall reeked with the odors of countless "boiled dinners," and he experienced a feeling of suffocation as he followed the girl up three flights of stairs to the top of the house. With each successive floor the carpets were more ragged, the walls more stained.

The girl pushed open a door at the end of the hall on the top floor. "Here's his room," she said with a leer, and shambled down the stairs again.

One glance around the place sickened and disheartened Teddy. It was in the same disorder in which its occupant had left it, with an added accumulation of the dust of weeks. He set down his valise and looked out of the window. Up and down, as far as he could see, there were tiny squares of bare earth enclosed in high tottering fences. In some of the yards were heaps of refuse, in others withered stalks of plants and vines showed that some attempt at gardening had once been made. Dingy cats crouched in sheltered nooks under overhanging roofs, the sole proof at the moment that life existed there. It had suddenly clouded over as it is apt to do in Chicago on a spring morning, and a sudden gust of sleet spattered against the window panes. Teddy turned from the cheerless prospect outside to that no less cheerless within, and he saw on the bureau a note addressed to him in Jackson's illiterate writing. He opened the note, recovering confidence. It ran:—

"I'm awful sorry but your place was took last night by another fellow. He was on the ground, and they thought you mightn't come—don't feel bad; we'll find something else; make yourself at home." Teddy clenched his hands; he muttered between his set teeth: "O, God! Why must men live,—who never asked for life,—when it is a curse!"

He thought of Susan's oft repeated truism: "The destruction of the poor is their poverty!"

Follow the International Lesson Committee

Every informed Sunday-school worker desires to have the graded system introduced into his school. But it seems like too big an undertaking to grade the school all at once. Hence nothing at all is done, and the school goes on in the same old absurd way of teaching the children the lessons provided for grown-up people

The International S. S. Committee has made it possible to bring the graded system in, like the Kingdom of God comes, "without observation." You can have your school graded without any agony—almost without knowing it, except in its beneficent results. Begin at the bottom now—with the elementary grades, the pupils under twelve years old. Provide teachers and pupils with the Bethany Graded Lessons, based on the outlines already authorized by the International Committee. Later on—perhaps in nine month or a year from now—when the Committee authorizes an outline of lessons for the Intermediate grades you will be ready to adopt them and the Bethany Series will be ready with the helps for you. And so on, through the Senior and Advanced grades, follow the International Committee and as fast as they provide the lessons you will be ready to adopt them.

Our advice to all schools, then, is: FOLLOW THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE. No independent course yet devised is better than that provided by the International Committee, if indeed there is one so good in all respects. Besides, there is advantage in the whole Sunday-school world studying together when our leaders really lead—as the International Committee is now doing.

The Bethany Graded Lessons may be commenced at any time. Purchase the main bulk of your supplies wherever you wish, but let us furnish you these fascinating lessons for your pupils under twelve. THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO., 700 East Fortieth Street, Chicago.

Arthur Holmes in Chicago

The quarterly assembly of Chicago Disciples was held Sunday, April 3. Arthur Holmes, of Philadelphia, was the speaker of the day. His splendid message was not received by so large an attendance as usually gathers at these assemblies. Perhaps the glorious weather tempted many people to the parks. There was, besides, some confusion in some congregations as to whether the meeting was to be held or not. Hundreds of our churchmen should have heard the address. It would have put iron into the blood of many a deacon and elder. "Bringing in the Kingdom of God by Ballot," was his theme. He spoke of the great social responsibility of the church. It must exist for ends outside itself, he said. The church's function is not simply to build itself up, but to build up the kingdom of God in the world. With telling illustrations this truth was made plain and applied. Dr. Holmes speaks like a man. He confessed at the start that his address had been prepared especially for men. Upon men lay the proper responsibilities in church life. He argued with great vehemence that the preacher should have his hands freed from the financial duties of the church and the details of administration that he might be a real prophet to his city, leading all good men in the enterprises of God's kingdom. One feels in hearing him that here is a man aware of the great forces that are making tomorrow, a man dealing with realities and pointing the church to a mighty mission.

Notes

A recent meeting at our colored church on Armour avenue resulted in a number of additions.

E. J. Arnot is the new pastor in the South Chicago Church. He formerly ministered at Batavia.

The Chicago Heights Church has extended a call to Mr. Zellers of Cuba, Ill. His decision has not yet been announced.

I. R. Lines is attacking the problem at Monroe street with vigor. The financial burden of the church is the chief handicap.

The Austin church, G. A. Campbell, pastor, had fourteen additions during the Easter season. There is new life in all departments since the erection of the new building.

The Maywood Church is discussing the possibility of a full time ministry. The church has made steady progress through the ministry of Victor Johnson.

A little group of church people has been gathered together at Oak Park through the efforts of A. J. White and constituted into a church. The meetings are held in a fire station.

Three of our Chicago ministers will spend the summer in Europe, A. W. Taylor, C. C. Morrison and Errett Gates. The latter will remain for the winter as well. All will be in attendance upon the Oecumenical Council held at Edinburgh.

The Evanston Church, O. F. Jordan, pastor, is holding services in the Y. M. C. A. while the new building is being erected. The first Sunday at the new place of meeting brought the largest morning audience of the year, demonstrating the value of a central location. There was one addition by letter.

Charles Reign Scoville has written to some of the interested parties favoring a union between Metropolitan Church and Jackson Boulevard Church if conditions are favorable. Nelson Trimble of the Metropolitan Church is said to favor the union also. All Chicago ministers and laymen would rejoice to see this union consummated. The churches are but two blocks apart and should never have been divided.

Chicago Ministers Favor Representative Conventions and Unification

Believing that our great brotherhood should have adequate means for expressing itself in an official manner and that the interests of the kingdom, committeed to its care, demands an organization that shall at one and the same time represent all the power and working force of the brotherhood, be it

Resolved by the Ministerial Association of Chicago that we heartily favor representative delegate conventions and such coördination of our various missionary and benevolent societies as shall bring the greatest economy and efficiency of administration.

By order of the Ministerial Association of the Disciples of Christ in Chicago.

Announcement Extraordinary

The Crescendo Campaign for American Missions.

Unusual interest obtains this year in American Missions. The men in the field report a sympathetic hearing everywhere.

Secretary Grant K. Lewis has called to his assistance such veteran campaigners as B. F. Clay, I. J. Cahill, B. B. Burton, Benjamin L. Smith, S. R. Hawkins, C. A. Freer and others who are out in the field, attending conventions and visiting churches and preachers; while Secretary I. N. McCash is "swinging the circle" of great cities accompanied by President Peter Ainslie, all preparatory to lifting an offering in behalf of American Missions in May unprecedented in the Missionary annals of the Disciples.

On every hand is noted the unfortunate position of the Annual Offering for Home Missions in our Missionary Calendar, and everywhere preachers express a determination to stand for "A Square Deal for Ameri-

A Great Week

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the first six days of April amounted to $15,810, or a gain of $5,149 over the corresponding time last year. This brings the total gain for the year up to $11,721. We are hoping that the churches will be very prompt in forwarding their gifts. We can go up to $400,000 if all will lend a hand. We are hearing from new living link churches right along. Many churches are giving for the first time. Let the old guard stand loyally by the work and a great year's record will be made.

F. M. Rains, Sec'y.
Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Notes from the Feoreign Society

The recipts for March amounted to $57,730.41, a gain over March, 1909 of $3,807.36. The receipts for this month were about as much as the total receipts of the society for the year 1893.

The home of R. D. McCoy, Tokyo, Japan, was recently burned. He lost all his household effects. The insurance on the house was $3,000. The insurance money is already paid into the bank in Tokyo.

The church in Osaka, Japan, had to be moved back on account of the railroad. Some land had to be given up. The Foreign Society receives $1,986.95 from the railroad as damages.

J. H. Banton and S. T. Willis of New York City, were elected trustees of the University of Nankin by the executive committee at its April meeting. A McLean is also a trustee.

The church at Hagerstown, Md., expects to become a living link in the Foreign Society the first Sunday in June. G. B. Townsend is the minister. This church is deeply interested in the work, especially in Africa.

President A. McLean has been in the service of the Foreign Society for twenty-eight years, and longer in this service than any other man now living in this country.

Miss Sue M. Dilts of Kentucky has given the Foreign Society $5,000 on the Annuity Plan with which to erect a hospital at Batang on the border of Tibet in memory of her mother. Two mission homes are also greatly needed at Batang. Who will provide them?

The Foreign Society has just received $1,000 from a friend in Michigan on the Annuity Plan. Also $500 from a friend in Kentucky. This is his fifth gift on this plan. This reminds us that the Foreign Society has already received $32,050 on the Annuity Plan this year, or since October 1, 1909, an increase over the corresponding time last year of $18,530. This is the largest amount ever received on this plan for the corresponding time in the history of the Society. It seems altogether probable that the annuity gifts will reach $50,000 this year. The total gifts on this plan from the first amount to $354,239.

The Nankin Union Training School for Nurses at Nankin, China, was founded in 1908. Of our own missionaries on the board of directors are Mrs. Frank Garrett and Mrs. Lily W. Molland, Nankin, China.

At the last meeting of the executive committee of the Foreign Society Guy W. Sarvis and wife were appointed missionaries. They will not go out, however, for about one year.

The church at Amarillo, Texas, Walter P. Jennings, minister, becomes a living link in the Foreign Society. This is a comparatively young church and has recently dedicated its new house of worship.

The churches at Trenton, Mo., William Shullenberger, minister, and the church at Cameron, Mo. A. R. Liverett, minister, are planning to combine their offering and support a missionary on the foreign field.

District Convention, Tipton, Indiana

The annual convention of the fourth district of the I. C. M. S. was held at Tipton, March 31-April 1. The convention was declared by those who habitually attend the district convention to be one of the most successful in the history of the district. Twenty-four ministers were in attendance, thirty-four of the forty-two churches sent statistical reports showing a substantial growth during the past year, increasing missionary activity, and most of the churches under regular pastoral care. An aggressive line of work was agreed upon for the coming year looking especially toward closer coöperation with the state board and the perfecting of the organization of the district by counties. Those appearing upon the program from without the

A Storekeeper Says:

"A lady came into my store lately and said:

"'I have been using a New Perfection Oil Cook-Stove all winter in my apartment. I want one now for my summer home. I think these oil stoves are wonderful. If only women knew what a comfort they are, they would all have one. I spoke about my stove to a lot of my friends, and they were astonished. They thought that there was smell and smoke from an oil stove, and that it heated a room just like any other stove. I told them of my experience, and one after another they got one, and now, not one of them would give hers up for five times its cost.'"

The lady who said this had thought an oil stove was all right for quickly heating milk for a baby, or boiling a kettle of water, or to make coffee quickly in the morning, but she never dreamed of using it for difficult or heavy cooking. Now—she knows.

Do you really appreciate what a New Perfection Oil Cook-Stove means to you? No more coal to carry, no more coming to the dinner table so tired out that you can't eat. Just light a Perfection Stove and immediately the heat from an intense blue flame shoots up to the bottom of pot, kettle or oven. But the room isn't heated. There is no smoke, no smell, no outside heat, no drudgery in the kitchen where one of these stoves is used.

Cautionary Note: Be sure you get this stove—see that the name-plate reads "New Perfection."

Dedication, Fort Worth, Texas

It was a success—the day, the building, the crowd, the Bible school, Rains' sermon, and the offering.

The Bible school, marching with flags and banners, left the old tabernacle, three blocks from the new structure, at 9:45 a. m. There were 613 in the procession. The primary department led; the adult department brought up the rear.

The new building cost $38,000.00. It is the "Akron plan," seating 1,100; with twenty-five separate class rooms, ladies' parlor, pastor's study, Philathea, Barac and boys' club rooms. Every department of the church is provided for. It is located in the best residence section of the city. The $5,000 indebtedness was soon provided for, and $800 more to be used in improving grounds. The Magnolia Ave. Christian Church was organized last Easter by the consolidation of Christian Tabernacle and Bellevue; both churches dissolved membership charters and began with a charter membership of 250, and the new church now has 515—no packing, no unaccounted for, non-resident membership. We support Mrs. Garret in Nankin, China, as our living link missionary.

The Christian Tabernacle sold its old property for $33,000. The work is prosperous, happy, united. The Lord has done great things for us, whereof we are glad.

EDWARD M. WAITS, Pastor.

Oklahoma Preachers Attention

The State Ministerial Institute of Oklahoma meets with the church at Norman May 2-4, and all preachers and church officers are cordially invited to attend all the sessions. The meeting opens with an address by the president, D. A. Wicker of Tulsa, on Monday evening, and closes with "The Preacher and World Missions" by Professor O. L. Lyon of Oklahoma Christian University, Enid. There will be four helpful and inspiring lectures by Walter Scott Priest of the Central Church, Wichita, Kansas. These of themselves will be worth more than the cost of the trip to Norman. Besides this there will be many important addresses and discussions by able men of our own Oklahoma field on such themes as, "Causes and Cure for Ministerial Desertion"; "The Test of Orthodoxy: What Is It?"; "What Makes a Strong Pulpit?"; "The Department of Evangelism: Its Scope and Worth," and many others of equal importance and interest. In addition to all this is the fellowship with the preaching brethren of which we have far too little and which should lead every preacher in the state to attend the institute. Entertainment on Harvard plan. Send your name to H. F. Reed. Come and let us test the hospitality of the Norman Church. Remember the date: May 2, 1910.

The Fight with Pain

It can hardly be denied that our generation is very sensitive to pain, and is therefore eagerly searching for means of evading the grip of that sullen disturber of our peace. Our fathers lived a hardier, more open, more enduring life than we. They grappled with nature like strong men bent upon its conquest. They went bravely forth to take possession of the soil, the forest and the sea, and to wrest from them the fruits of industry and the reward of patience.

We have entered into the labors of these earlier heroes. For us the forest has been felled; for us the desert has been reclaimed; for us the fields have been made to yield their sixty and their hundred fold; for us the seas have been bridged, the lightning harnessed and the subtle forces of the world subdued and put to task-work.

Our days are spent amid a multitude of conveniences of which our fathers never dreamed. Steam, electricity and other ready servants run for us to the ends of the earth and bring in the luxuries of every land. Our homes, however modest, are almost palatial by the side of the humbler dwellings in which our fathers lived. The hardships of domestic life, the toil, the exposure, the danger of every sort to which the men and women of earlier times were exposed have all but vanished from our opulent and protected life today. Few women would be willing to exchange places with their mothers, much less their grandmothers, when they consider what life cost two or three generations ago. And the men of today look back at the primitive life of the fifties with a sort of mild wonder as to how people ever endured its limitations and hardships.

All this has made us sensitive to inconvenience, exposure and pain. Disease has become a far more troublesome element of modern life just in proportion to the degree in which it has been limited. Our grandfathers had to meet single-handed and without much experience the whole array of maladies of their generation. Physicians were by no means so accessible or skillful. Sanitary devices were few and costly. The conveniences that make the home sanitary and healthful and that make cleanliness of person and belongings the commonplace of our time were almost out of reach in those days. The few remedies possessed by the housewife then were simple, and such as were suggested by common and homely experience. The result was that disease entered far less into the thought of that generation than of ours.

Strange as it may seem, it looks as if the wonderful equipments which modern science has placed at the disposal of humanity in the fight with the ills of the flesh has actually increased these troubles. Of course this is not true, but the psychological effect is almost the same as if it were. We have become so conscious of disease through our greater skill in handling it, and so sensitive to pain through the greater refinements, the more elaborate conveniences and the nervous tension of our modern life, that the fight with pain has taken a place conscious beyond all former experiences in the life of the world.

In this state of alarm resort has been taken to two ranges of activity, in each of which there seems to be the promise of help. Obviously the first of these is medical and surgical science. The triumphs of these professions are beyond adequate record. In spite of all the empiricism which marks the practice of medicine; in spite of all the superficialism which characterizes much of the efforts of proper diagnosis, in spite of the needless and inexcusable cruelties tolerated in vivisectional experiments, and in spite of the well-known tendency of surgical science to over-zeal in hasty and often needless operations, this generation is profoundly indebted to medicine and surgery.

The great plagues have been largely driven out of the world. The cholera scourge, yellow fever, the black death, have been chained by sanitary and medical skill. The white plague of tuberculosis is yielding to intelligent restriction and will one day join the banished host of outgrown evils in limbo. The red plague of venereal infections, which goes on its desolating way partly through the survival of the brute passions of lust in humanity and partly because of an unscientific and unchristian foolishness in the frank and necessary instruction of the public and especially of childhood upon this theme, must be met and vanquished in the same courageous spirit which shall not fear to turn the light upon the facts, to insist upon the quarantining and isolation of the infected precisely as in the case of smallpox and shall demand the rightful price of publicity and condemnation of all who sin against the sanctity of the sexual impulse and the rights of the innocent.

But the other resort of our generation from the dread of pain is the church of Christ. In the effort to find relief from the physical ills of which it has become over conscious, the humanity of our day has become suddenly aware of the healing power of Jesus, of the claims of the early church to such helpful ministries, of the records of the church through the centuries that in the persons of saints and teachers of exceptional power it has always been able to cure the sick, and of the voices of many during the past generation who have insisted that the miraculous gifts of Christianity have come again to vindicate the divine vocation of the church and to relieve the suffering world.

No matter what one's attitude may be toward this remarkable phenomenon of modern Christian life, it is unquestionably true that a large company of people both within and without the church have suddenly turned to this feature of early Christian belief as a means of reaching some satisfying view of the problem of suffering. Multitudes in the church have turned their attention to some form of mental therapeutic as offering them what they describe as "a fuller gospel," and multitudes outside the church are rushing into it, or at least into those portions of it which have concerned themselves with this set of phenomena.

Probably the attitude of most of those in the first class, that is, of those who in the church have turned to some form of Christian healing as offering a better explanation of Christian truth than they have before known, is itself the result of two tendencies. The one is, of course, the search for physical betterment and the conviction that the gospel offers such a relief to the suffering life. But the second motive is almost as strong, namely, a certain resentment against the silence and indifference of the church as a whole upon this question. There are many excellent Christian people who have turned from the evangelical churches to faith healing, Christian Science and the like because they felt that the teaching to which they had been accustomed was hard, doctrinal, legalistic and unyielding, that it had no hospitality to newer disclosures of Christian truth, and that instead of actually inquiring into the validity of the claims made for the healing work of Christ in our generation it set itself with cynicism and contempt to the ostracism not only of such views but even of those who were inclined to give them credence.

On the other hand, many who years ago left the church because they were unsatisfied with its teachings on this point have come with eagerness into those associations that put emphasis upon the healing work, while great companies of people hitherto outside the pale of Christian activity are finding in the new cults, or at least professing to find, a satisfaction which religion has never afforded them hitherto.

In this condition of affairs the wise student of Christian interests comes to understand the duty of the church toward problems of this nature. The attitude of indifference and skepticism is unjustifiable. Is there a place for truth in the claims of those who make up the body of therapeutical adherents under the title of Christians. Do Christian Science, Divine Healing, the Emanuel movement and similar systems offer help to humanity in the fight against pain. If so, then it must be because there is some value in their teachings which the church as a whole has not as yet appropriated. To what extent ought the minister or the layman devote himself to the investigation of these claims? To what extent should he regard it his duty to test the promises of the healers? How far should he go in including in his own program, and especially in his statements concerning Christianity, this factor in which so many intelligent and well disposed people are today finding comfort and reassurance?

The answer to these questions we have not space even to suggest here, but it seems worth while to give the whole subject consideration in some impartial way and this we hope to do.

Denominational Control

The recent rise of such educational funds as the Carnegie Foundation has given motive to earnest discussions pro and con regarding the relation of certain colleges to the denominations which called them into being. Just now the Baptists are struggling with the question as to whether Brown University at Providence, R. I., is to be placed upon the Carnegie list. This means that all denominational restrictions must be removed, and the university must become entirely free in its attitude toward religious matters, rather than to be trammeled by insistence upon denominational standards. By its charter Brown is a Baptist institution, requiring a certain number of Baptists on its Board of Trustees, insisting upon a Baptist for president, and with certain Baptist doctrines as the foundation of its theological department. The officers and alumni of the institution and many broad-minded Baptists are anxious to so change these conditions as to permit the institution to claim the advantages of the Carnegie fund, even though the Baptist denomination may thus lose somewhat its formal control of the institution.

On the other hand, a strong protest is being made by some conservative Baptists. In the Watchman of March 10, there is a long and carefully written article by Rev. Henry F. Colby, D. D., of Dayton, O., protesting against any such change, on the ground that it would remove Brown University from the list of Baptist schools. The question is really whether an institution with traditions of this sort is a denominational possession to be kept in a narrow denominational way, or is to be regarded as a denominational contribution to general education.

This question has also arisen in connection with Drake University among the Disciples, where the total abandonment of all relationship to the formal organizations of the Disciples became necessary before the institution could be placed upon the Carnegie Foundation. But it is easily seen that there is little to be gained by denominational control. It rarely means larger funds for the equipment of the school, and it is certain to imply something of interference with the management and development of an institution by men who have no other right to such interference than that afforded by denominational position. Perhaps the Carnegie Foundation is helping to solve one of the perplexing questions in religious education by making such institutions free of a control that at the best is questionable.

The question of open communion is no longer a very vital one among Baptists. There was a time, not so many years ago, when a man who could not undertake to preach and practice the doctrine of close communion found himself thrust out from Baptist fellowship, and was compelled to betake himself to another religious body. That incident of a dozen years past seems like ancient history today. There is probably not a single Baptist Church in Chicago that practices close communion. The same is true of many northern cities. Recently Dr. Aked, pastor of the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church of New York, expressed himself very vigorously regarding the necessity of an abandonment of close communion practice among Baptist churches. Indeed, many Baptist churches are going far beyond this line. In commenting upon a recent statement by Dr. Robert McDonald, pastor of the Washington Avenue Baptist Church, Brooklyn, who has spoken in the most open manner regarding the necessity of abandoning the practice of close communion in Baptist churches, the Watchman of Boston says, "Open Communion is not a test of denominational standing, since many have practiced it for years without their standing in the Baptist body being questioned, and as a matter of fact there are quite a number of Baptist churches which have admitted, under special circumstances, members who have not been immersed. The closer touch of American churches with English Baptists, and the frequent calling of English Baptists has undoubtedly brought the practice of mixed membership more to notice."

The National Association for the study and prevention of tuberculosis is making an earnest effort to bring its work to the attention of all persons throughout America, and for this purpose has asked the churches and ministers to co-operate by setting apart Sunday, April 24, for some public statement in reference to this great work. It is perfectly clear that a large number of persons are ignorant of the nature of the disease, its predisposing and immediate causes, its early symptoms, its appearance in children, the methods of its prevention and cure, and the imperative duty of all who have any interest or influence in connection with so notable an effort as is now being made to exterminate the great white plague. Even those ministers who are most conscientious in regard to the strictly religious character of their Sunday service may well believe that one important part of the Gospel message is the care of the physical life. Certainly our Master's deep interest in the welfare of the people is an example worthy of imitation. There are probably people in every community who are destined to become consumptives unless some preventive steps are taken by themselves or their friends. Perhaps a word fitly spoken by a minister in connection with the church services might open the minds of such to the facts and point out the duty of the hour. Full literature on this subject may be secured by addressing the association above named at 52 Twenty-second street, New York.

The Baptist World (Louisville) does not take the same unqualified pleasure in the union talk between Baptists and Disciples as does The Watchman (Boston), whose report of the Boston conference between ministers of the two bodies was printed in our columns recently. The World doubts the evangelical character of a great section of the Disciples. "The Boston brethren will do well," the editor says, "to remember that there are Disciples and Disciples, and all down this way the decided majority are of the Christian Standard type, non-evangelical." Quoting from Mr. Herbert Moninger's speech, in which he said: "Only names hold us apart," the World characterizes such a statement as "untrue, at least in his case," because the Christian Standard, which employs Mr. Moninger, contends that there is no remission of sins without baptism by immersion. This, The Christian Century hastens to remark, is a very gross misrepresentation of the Standard's position on baptism. The Standard, as we understand it, does not teach that there is no remission of sins without immersion, but that immersion is necessary to the remission of sins! This the Baptist World should know is a very important distinction!

One of the most interesting forms of inter-denominational co-operation is seen in the growth and promise of the American Inter-Church College for religious and social workers at Nashville, Tenn. The Methodist Church South has long had, as a part of its working force, a training school for missionary and Christian workers in that city, but during the past few years it has been felt that this work belonged to no one denomination and should be shared by all. The result has been the development of a work which is now participated in by three religious bodies, and gives promise of being still more widely representative of Christian interests throughout the South. Why is not this a suggestion for all similar institutions? There are missionary training schools in various places which ought not to limit their operations to a single religious body. Might not our own projected school at Indianapolis broaden its plans and become a really important agency in the interest of Christian unity as well as a missionary preparation.

The foundations of the Harper Memorial Library at the University of Chicago are well advanced, and the building will be pushed rapidly to completion this spring and summer. It will be the most notable of all the structures on the university quadrangles, and will unify the departmental library work which has hitherto labored under difficulties of isolation. In the crypt of the building the tomb of President Harper will be placed, and the structure, as a whole, will be a worthy monument to the man who not only founded and organized the university, but has been the most inspiring force in American educational work during the past generation.

The Federal Council of Churches of this city has taken a step forward by securing a regular executive secretary in the person of Professor Hobson, of McCormick Theological Seminary, who, for the next six months, during the vacation period of the seminary, will devote himself to the work of the council and prepare the way for a permanent executive secretary who can take up the work in the autumn. It is probable also that at an early day an executive secretary will be chosen for the western division of the Federation of Churches. This will embrace several of the adjoining states, with headquarters in Chicago.

The International Sunday School Association, in coöperation with the Federal Council of Churches and the Layman's Evangelistic Council, expects to take a religious census of Chicago in the autumn. This work has been done in other cities with excellent results. The religious forces of Chicago are growing more closely together and a united plan for action is being organized. Mr. J. Shreve Durham, who is in charge of the census, is a member of Memorial Church of Christ and superintendent of the advanced department of the Sunday-school.

The Chicago & Northwestern R. R. has ordered that none but perishable freight and passenger trains be moved on Sundays hereafter. This will give Sunday rest to ten or twelve thousand men. For many years, Sunday was a favorite day for pushing ahead fast freight and the movement of trains was made with no reference to the day at all. The Steel Trust will also suspend needless Sunday work, it is said. All of which augurs gain, not only for the workingman, but for American ideals and wholesome habits.

America the Open Door

Doors open for those who are prepared to pass through them. America offers opportunity for men of vision to employ all their talents in profitable labors. No church with a living faith can complain that there is nothing in this land for it to do. It is only dead churches that have difficulty in discovering the needs of humanity. But we must beware lest our missionary activity become meddlesomeness. America needs the universal gospel. We have no right to bother our neighbors with ideas and customs peculiar to ourselves. It is not the business of the Christian teacher to condemn customs because they are strange to him. He opposes whatever interferes with human rights and then he stops unless he is ignorant and opinionated. The world will be saved by the truth, not by the absurd notions of self-appointed preachers.

The laboring man offers an opportunity to the church of America. He is often suspicious of the church. He doubts that it really believes what its Master taught. He thinks it is more concerned about its own salvation than it is about the salvation of the world. How can we show him that we are true disciples of Jesus? We certainly cannot convince him by standing off at a safe distance and telling him to be content with his wages and to accept the conditions of labor imposed by his employers. He is an American citizen and he knows that it is his right to think for himself, to express his thoughts on the platform and through the press, and to cast his vote for reforms that seem to him desirable. He will turn to the church for help when he feels that the church understands him and intends to help him. That he often misunderstands the church and condemns it without reason should be accepted by the church as a challenge to go to him with a heart of sympathy and with a clear understanding of the problems he has to meet.

The country community presents a problem. Boys and girls are not safe because they grew up in the country. Many of them go to the city on the Sunday excursion and come home with a knowledge of the vices of the city and entirely ignorant of its better life. The loafer in the little village is about as vile a specimen of humanity as one can find anywhere. Sectarianism is at its worst in many village and country communities. Where one church would be sufficient to minister to the people, there are three, four, five, or more, each denouncing all the others and proclaiming itself the true church of Christ. Instead of one preacher of ability and vision, there are several narrow-minded men whom nobody respects. Young men who might become strong preachers are turned away from the ministry because they see nothing in the institutions of religion in their neighborhood that calls for the services of a real man. Halley's comet has been used lately to frighten sinners into confession of their badness. Superstitions supposed to be entirely outgrown still flourish in out-of-the-way places. These superstitions are sometimes preached in the name of Christ and Christianity is rejected by intelligent people because of the ignorance of its teachers.

In the cities the church has been retreating before the people. Where the need is greatest the churches are fewest. It has been the habit to ask whether a given section of a city can support a church, not whether a church is needed there. This policy must be changed. If it is not, we must quit saying that the gospel is for all men, and state frankly that it is for those who can pay for it. We do not ask that the man in Africa pay the expenses of the missionary sent to him. Why should we adopt a different policy for home missions? If we answer that it is the expectation that all native churches will in time become self-supporting, we must remember that there is good reason to hope that the gospel will transform conditions in American cities and enable people who are now too poor to pay for the preaching of the gospel to support their own church and to assist in telling the good news elsewhere. The question should ever be, "Can the people of this part of the city raise money enough to buy a building and pay a preacher?" but it should be, "Where ought churches to be planted in order that the truth of the gospel may be most fully proclaimed?" The people outside the churches must be made to feel that they are sought first and not their money.

Midweek Service, April 27. Rev. 3:7-13.

Biblical Problems

By Professor Willett

Was the man in the porch sick? The Book says he had infirmity thirty-eight years and was impotent. Was it real or imaginary? Did Jesus practice Christian Science on him? Did Jesus heal him? Did Jesus perform a miracle in healing the man? By miracle I mean an act that no mere man could do. E. L. Frazier.

Morristown, Ind.

The man in the porch was sick. The record is clear that for many years he had been afflicted and impotent. The line between the real and the imaginary maladies is becoming more difficult to determine, as it is understood that much of the physical suffering and disability in the world is more mental than physical, and that its healing lies in mental rather than physical methods. Certainly all the powers which the modern mind is coming to understand and utilize in the curing of disease were at the service of Jesus. He did not fail to apply whatever power was needed for the recovery of the sick. The truths that lie in the domain of mental healing, Christian Science and Divine Healing, are worthy of credit in so far as they explain the facts of daily experience, and no farther. Jesus healed the man, and in so doing he performed a miracle. That is, he worked a sign or marvel. The things that men are doing daily in the recovery of the sick by other than medical or surgical means are evidently a part of the method by which evil is to be conquered in human life, and there is no reason to suppose that Jesus would reject a method of reaching and helping the people of his time merely because it was natural and not sufficiently abnormal to meet the wishes of those who would limit his work entirely to the superhuman realm. It is worth while following our Lord as far as we can in those regions where he uses the common laws and methods open to us. That study of his work makes all the clearer the wonders of his greater acts of power that lie beyond.

I want to buy a few reliable books on the general subject of how we got our Bible. I want something that can be understood by the average layman, and, at the same time, entirely reliable. I am anxious to get a few books covering the Old Testament and especially the Pentateuch. I have been conducting a Teachers' Training Class for three winters, and at the present time we are studying "Genesis." My pupils represent a half dozen denominations and nearly every one has a different view of the lessons. If you will suggest something that will be helpful and, at the same time, reliable, your kindness will be appreciated.

Green Bay, Wis. John C. Thurman.

General works that you would find helpful are Gladden's "Who Wrote the Bible?" and Patterson Smythe's "How God Inspired the Bible." The best text book on "Genesis" is Driver's Commentary, "Genesis," in the Westminster series. The Century Bible on Genesis is also excellent, as is the handbook on Genesis by Marcus Dods. On the more general lines of Old Testament study, the Old Testament Introduction by McFadyen, Bennett and Adeney, and Driver are very valuable; also the articles on the individual books of the Old Testament in such a work of reference as Hastings Bible Dictionary. Furthermore, admirable side reading is furnished by such volumes as Batten's "The Old Testament from the Modern Point of View," and Kent's "The Origin and Permanent Form of the Old Testament."

In 2 Kings 5:1-11, how do you account for the way in which Naaman's case of leprosy was treated. Can this incident be accounted for according to the ancient ritual and customs regarding this disease? Reader.

Mt. Sterling, Ill.

Leprosy is the name by which a large number of diseases are described in the Bible. It was almost a blanket term. We have no knowledge of the particular type of leprosy with which Naaman was afflicted. No doubt many of these forms are skin and filth diseases. Doubtless the prophet saw the value of his suggestion to Naaman as to the washing which he commanded. How far this was useful in curing the disease, and how far it was a command whose value lay in the obedience it imposed we cannot decide. It seems to have little or no relationship to the ritual of the later law regarding the ceremonial pronouncement of cure.

Social Survey

By Alva W. Taylor

Industry a Field for Religious Culture

The bread and butter problem comes before all others in living, and its consideration is one of the first in any progress. In industry are the fundamentals of the social question. Its problems are the fundamental problems. Consequently, it is a field for primary moral consideration. Little can be done for the souls of men except it at the same time operate to better their industrial status. Men think first of their bodies, and until their physical necessities are satisfied, higher considerations cannot enter.

Industry today presents a new working fraternity. In its age-long battle for its share of the profit and for industrial independence, the working world has arrived at the place where co-operation, motived by an intelligent concern for the common good, is the recognized need and at once the means obtained for advancing that common welfare. In that fraternal co-operation is a consideration of the things of another as your own, one of the very vital attributes of a working religion. At its heart the trades union movement is religious. As a presentation to the world of an object lesson in fraternal help it is one of the most significant movements that the brotherhood spirit of a Christian age has produced.

Therefore, by its need of better things, of a higher standard of living and a closer compact for fellow help, it challenges the faith that seeks to give more abundant life to all men. By its spirit of fraternity and co-operation, and its consideration of the things of another, it becomes a vital religious force to a Christianity that returns to the method of the Master who went about doing good and who challenged the world to test his teachings by the fruit they produced. In this fraternal spirit is a vast force that the church needs to claim and utilize, for it is of the Christ.

Where there is an honest difference of opinion between the sincere followers of the Lord, the church cannot take sides in the controversy, but it can call for a reasonable and brotherly consideration of the case and put into its people a spirit that will suffer loss and defeat rather than do what is not Christlike in the matter. Where the wrong is so clearly defined as to mark its churchly defenders as selfish and insincere, it becomes the duty of the pulpit to denounce with prophetic wrath and warn with apocalyptic terrors those who make a house of merchandise of the temple of the Lord.

The masses toil. If the church and its ministry would reach the great world, then they must go to those who toil, as the Master did. Between the haves and the have-nots there has ever been a gulf fixed. As Christianity comes more into the rulership of the hearts of men and civilizations, the gulf is narrower and less an abyss. Christ betook himself to the side of the masses who have-not. He did not recognize or approve any class distinctions nor become the "prophet of poverty," but he went with his sympathies to those that had the need. The church has shifted from the base of operations fixed by the Master. Otherwise it would not move to the pleasant suburbs while leaving the slums uncared for. It would not hesitate to denounce the current social reforms with more decision, and its ministry would not imperil their very forums by daring to speak in a prophetic tone upon current moral issues in the social world.

The industrial world presents the greatest moral problem of our times, as, indeed, it has, in most eras of human progress. Concerned in it is the welfare of the masses, and while that welfare may be first intent on the material factors of life, yet it is only through consideration of these factors that we can arrive at the heart of the matter. It presents today one of the most real forms of brotherly effort in that it presents an actual working fellowship for the common good and becomes, therefore, an asset on which the church should be realizing. When the church takes hold of such a vital current problem as that involved in modern industrial questions, it will renew its life in the present world and become a greater factor in all good.

Christianity's Boon to Chinese Children

The Home.

The children of the masses in China are born into a small one or two-roomed home of mud and wattle with an earthen floor. Vermin infest it and disease lurks in every corner. There is little ventilation in winter except such as brings draughts and suffering from the cold. The fire is made of stems and grass and the house is likely to be full of smoke and gas. The food is cooked in a single great pot and the children are fed without discretion. The patriarchal type of family life often crowds large numbers together, and especially in winter they get close to one another to avoid freezing. The house is the scene of many quarrels on account of the daughters-in-law and the more remote kin and the Chinese instinct of suspicion. There is little that we could call home-like.

The Christian home is known in China by its peace and cleanliness. It is not built over after the American model but it is made more cleanly and what improvements can be afforded are adopted. The atmosphere is better, quarreling is reduced to a minimum, some little attraction is added and the house becomes less a shelter merely, and more a home in fact.

Physical Treatment.

The children are not often bathed, and especially in winter their clothing is seldom changed. They sleep on the brick oven which is too hot in the early night and too cold in the morning. They are fondled foolishly and punished brutally. The girls of all but the working classes are liable to have their feet cruelly bound and to be married at an extremely young age. The mother toils heavily, and it must react on the physical life of the infant. Many of the girls are sold into slavery. Infanticide is secretly practiced until as high as one-half of the female children have been known to have been killed. The death rate, because of the physical surroundings, runs up to as high as fifty per cent. The stupidity enforced by the manner of life can but make the boy or girl less intelligent and they are brought up to a life of physical endurance and monotonous toil which takes the spirit out of the nation.

The Chinese Christian family treats its children with that consideration which is taught as a cardinal beginning of all Christian life. First infant life is looked upon as sacred. Infanticide and female slavery cease. Intelligent care takes the place of the old haphazard and ignorant rearing in so far as the parents can learn. The death rate is thus lowered and the children grow up so much more alert that when they come to compete in school exercises, they invariably lead all comers. Discipline becomes reasonable, and things are done from the standpoint of interest.

Moral Training.

In the Chinese home the children are brought up in an atmosphere of suspicion. The heterogenous members of a household live in an atmosphere of suspicion and breathe it from birth. The proverbs of common parlance are those of native suspicion. There is no basis of trust in their religion. Life is a battle for self, and order is such that the strong, from the Mandarin down, prey upon the weak. Insincerity is also inbred. The children are disciplined by terrors that never happen and threats that may be executed and may be defeated by shrewdness. Thus insincerity is inculcated. The conversation is foul. There is no reserve before the little ones, and as a result tots of five can use the vilest kind of language. Their minds are befouled and good moral foundations are hard to lay. There is no intelligent entering into the child's life. They are treated with foolish fondness and made at the sametime the butts of any passing temper. They have few sports, especially few that develop an imagination. The result is Chinese stolidity with a sort of animal-like instinct for self-preservation that goes for cunning.

The native Christian is taught the value of a clean mind. He learns that as "the twig is bent the tree inclines" in place of his proverb, "leave the twig alone, the tree will straighten it as it grows." The education of the child is based upon reasonable things and his mind is developed symetrically. The parent begins to live with his children and for them, and the idea that the children are born for the parents' sake is modified by the Christian teaching that the parent is given a sacred charge. Veneration is taught, but it is for a greater power, and throuugh that for all upon whom the child depends, chief among whom is the parent.

Native and Christian Philanthropy.

The native religion provides little philanthropy. The heart of the average native is calloused to sympathy. If the abandoned or orphaned little one is cared for it is for the sake of the profit it may bring in the future. The one who knows is not inclined to tell it to the one who does not except for a fee, for there is little real fellow-feeling. The unfortunate are despised for their misfortune rather than pitied, and looked upon as pawns rather than means of grace. The native religion knows practically no philanthropic institutions except as Christianity has inspired their building, and even then they are poorly managed because of lack of heart interest. Christianity provides the hospitals and orphanages of China. By its introduction of human sympathy and fellow helpfulness it is leaving vast communities to give more than a cash to the beggar and a kick to the unfortunate. It is appealing to that benevolent instinct that is born into every natural heart and making the people more charitable even where it does not make converts of them all.

That Timid Church Letter

The Folly of the Present Way of Transferring Membership

By Rev. Nelson H. Trimble

Ministers and evangelists have long ago found that the church letter represents the ultimate in timidity. How it endeavors to avoid the eyes of the world! How it keeps in the background! The blowing of trumpets, clanging of bells and waving of banners may do for enthusiasts and those who wish to be seen of men but not so for the modest church letter. Down in the bottom of the trunk it stays and seems content. In the old family Bible, which is never opened, it reposes in sublime peace. Securely tied in the bundle of "family papers" it remains uncomplaining year after year. If any minister doubts the truth of this statement let him try to coax a dozen of these modest letters out of their seclusion.

I feel that the whole subject of church letters calls for readjustment. Entirely too much stress is laid upon them, their necessity is over emphasized, they occupy an abnormal place in church procedure.

The fact that church letters are granted in printed form to every member alike clearly demonstrates that they do not carry with them the personal commendation of the church. The fact that thousands of letters every year are granted by churches and are not presented to any other congregation seems to show that the force of the letter is lost before its purpose is accomplished.

A true analysis of the situation reveals this, a majority of the letters which are in temporary oblivion are held by Christian people who would put them into a church if the church made the transfer easy.

The Open-Door Policy.

The simplicity of our church is its strongest claim for non-human authorship. The opening of the door at every service is one of our distinctive characteristics. This is a most beautiful way to welcome both those who confess Christ and those who would place their membership with the local congregation. This is as it should be, but the church which insists that the transfer can be made at no other time, and in no other way, lessens its own influence, adds to its burdens of expense and worry, and encourages a method which releases unnumbered hundreds from the duties of Christian stewardship.

A member of the church of Christ in Indianapolis who moves into the neighborhood of the Church of Christ in Wilhelm Park, Baltimore, let us say, ought to become a member of the latter church by virtue of the proximity in residence. A Christian in Indiana is a Christian when he arrives in Maryland, and the adjustment of church relationship ought to be automatic. To place too much red tape about the entrance of a congregation, for one who is already a member of the Church of Christ in the larger national sense, lays the church making the barrier open to that oft repeated charge, that it is easier to get into the Church of Christ than to get into a local congregation. For is not the one holding the letter already in the church?

The multitude of reasons presented by Christians for not uniting with a local church is the exact measure of reasons why the old form of transfering memberships, and the old form alone, should not be irrevocably demanded. I have looked extensively into the matter and find this true. There are no organizations, from the Masons right down through the innumerable host of fraternal, beneficial and social orders, which requires a "brother" transferred from one local to another, to go through the same public acts in joining the new lodge that they required at the original initiation. And yet, practically every church requires that a person coming, even from a church in the same city, "go forward" at the invitation moment and be received. It is practically the same to "put a letter in" or to "come by statement," as to make the great confession.

Of course there is no confession to be made again, and no rebaptism, but there is the same public walking to the front, the same public welcome, attended for the timid and retiring with the same embarrassments. Who has not seen the "great evangelist" as he rants and gesticulates with his frenzied mag-niloquence point here and there in the congregation inviting and urging the timid to "step out." And as one "steps out" the evangelist gives a vivid picture of the splendid act of this one giving his life to Christ. Now it may be that this new "convert" is a saint of many years standing, having been serving the Lord for the greater part of life, but by changing congregations a spectacular and unappreciated demonstration is accorded.

By the same passive inactivity that a man becomes a citizen of a new community he ought to become a member of the nearest church. The Christian takes the yoke upon his shoulder for life. Endure to the end were Jesus' words. There should be no break because of change in residence. To insist upon a reaction of a large part of that which was required when church membership was secured, simply because of a change in the street address, amounts to granting the Christian a vacation and refusing to catalogue him again without another matriculation.

This system permits a Christian to sever relationship with the church by the purchase of a railroad ticket and a logical conclusion from the same premise forces the conclusion that the obligation of church membership is ended when we can no longer see the church spire from the rear platform of the train.

I would say this with all the power I can put behind it: Minimize the significance of a transferred membership. Do not let a Christian feel that a change of address admits of a break in church relationship. To allow a church member who has moved into a new neighborhood to feel that the relation with the old church is broken and that no new relationship can be established until there is a public action which acknowledges the new union, is an open sin and another useless regulation which makes satan smile.

When the minister calls to welcome Mr. Clark, who has moved into the neighborhood, he can easily suggest that the church rejoices in gaining another helper and if in accordance with Mr. Clark's plans his name will be enrolled at once on the books and the old church notified. In the majority of the cases the suggestion will be accepted by "Mr. Clark." Leave him alone or urge him to "come to the front next Sunday," many Sundays will pass and many trips will be made before he puts in his letter, and the chances are against his ever doing it at all.

Inflated and Misleading Reports.

Mr. Clark has been lost 5,000 times, it is stated, in Chicago alone. If there had been a reasonable method of attaching him to the Chicago churches I feel that at least half of these timid letters would have been turned over to the churches. Transferred members who put in their letters would have been turned over to the churches. Transferred members who put in their letters either in this simpler way, or by going forward ought not to be counted as additions in reports of regular work or in meetings. Of course they add to the numerical strength of one congregation, but they subtract the strength from another. Surely there is no need to telegraph their putting in their letter, for every telegram of this sort, to balance things, there ought to be a telegram from the minister of the church which granted the letter stating that so many were lost. The unnecessary emphasis we place on "additions" of this kind is one of the reasons we insist on this method of reception. Hundreds and hundreds of members are reported to the papers that are really nothing more than changes of address. Some of the telegrams really mean no more than this:

Christian Banner, Middle West.

Big Rock, Mo.: You will rejoice to know we had twenty-two additions yesterday, two confessions, and twenty people have moved from surrounding points into our neighborhood. Elder Smith's family moved into the new house. Town stirred from center to circumference. Continue.—DOOLITTLE AND SAYMUCH, Evangelists.

The church leaves the gathering in of these transferred members till the evangelist comes, and he spends half his time in getting into the church people who need not to be out if our system only dared to be reasonable. An evangelist told me that it is harder to get a member with a "timid letter" into the church than it is to get a sinner to make the confession.

I want to say another emphatic thing: The transferring of church membership will eventually amount to nothing more than the clerical detail of enrolling a name.

To make it more than this is to add an unnecessary burden upon your neighbor. Our New Testament creed nowhere admits that an Antioch Christian had to be reinstated into the new fold with elaborate ceremony when he pitched his tent toward Corinth.

If we demand a re-enlistment of every Christian who comes to our bivouac, we open to the one who most needs our aid a way of escape from service. Do not let the Christian who moves in think he is not a member of the church, for he is a member.

The Gospel and Christian Science

Study and Characterization of Modern Healing Cult

By Rev. Orvis F. Jordan

The church in all ages has had its mystics. Whether they have been monks, or whether they have lived among the laity as Joan of Arc, they are always to be found. The century that is past had departed far from the point of view represented by Francis of Assisi and Thomas A. Kempis. The revivalistic religion had once been fresh and spontaneous so that it furnished this element but it had come to be mechanical and formal, after having standardized christian experience. The liberals had departed from the transcendentalism of Emerson and were busy with criticism to the exclusion of prayer. It is on the background of such religious conditions that we are to make our sketch of the Christian Science movement.

Philosophic View Point Necessary.

Christian Science is only to be understood when we approach it from the view-point of philosophy. Its intellectual concepts are often unintelligible for those not trained in philosophical thinking so that it has come to be the claim of the adherents of this movements that only those who have been enlightened by the truth can understand it. They are correct in saying that their enemies usually fail to understand what they are talking about. Christian Science began as philosophy and has come to be a religion. It began as a club for psychic research but is now a church.

In philosophy, the materialism of Spencer had reached its culminating glory about the time that Christian Science took its rise. It was time that the pendulum should take a swing. Idealism must have its innings. Christian Scientists represent the extremest reaction from the materialism of the men of science of the past generation. They reject materialism by denying material reality altogether. For them the only true reality is our spiritual experiences. Our experiences of contact with matter belong to a form of self-delusion which is called mortal mind. All is mind and all is God.

It is this philosophy which is the basis of their theology, a philosophy of some sort lying back of every theology. It is this philosophy which gives the point of view to their healing work. It is this philosophy which colors all the life relationships which they form.

Hard Point of View to Conceive.

It is hard for the average hard-headed business man to even think this point of view, much less to accept it. How can he believe that his money is only a mental impression? How shall the mechanic believe that his tools are mental states which do not correspond to material reality? How shall the physician believe that the body which he has labored years to understand is only mortal mind? Mrs. Eddy says, "You entertain an adipose belief of yourself as substance." Christian Science tells us that our material senses are illusory. "The only evidence of the existence of a mortal mind or of a material state or universe is gathered from the five personal senses. This delusive evidence (the evidence of the five senses) Science has dethroned by repeated proofs of its fatality."

The theology of Christian Science is made to agree with this fundamental view-point. Mrs. Eddy said in a magazine article a year or so ago that Jesus was never born and he never died. She denies his real humanity as the Unitarians deny his real divinity. This was one of the earliest heresies of the church, that of the Docetists. Orthodox Christianity has ever tried to hold fast to both the divinity and the humanity of Christ.

The Christian Science attitude toward the Bible is also harmonious with the general view-point. Historical study of the book is not esteemed. The Higher Critics are roundly condemned for failing to get from the Bible the religion of Mrs. Eddy. The Swedenborgians insisted that the Bible had three meanings, the earthly, the spiritual and the celestial. Only the earthly meaning was obtainable by the ordinary methods of exegesis and the remainder was given through revelation to Swedenborg. Christian Science makes as much of its biblical foundation as do any of the orthodox bodies but it insists upon the allegorical interpretation of the book. Mrs. Eddy is placed by the side of Jesus in authority for is it not she that has explained the Bible and shown what it means? It is interesting and funny to see a certain type of theologian proving Christian Science wrong by the Bible when he begs the whole question in assuming a view of the Bible that is in dispute. The Christian Scientists are great readers of the Bible and are sure that they alone understand this book, thanks to Mrs. Eddy.

Attitude Toward Sin.

The Christian Science attitude toward sin is also characteristic of the view-point. Because they have assumed the belief in sin to be bound up with the belief in material reality, they have considered the belief in sin as a huge blunder and the true salvation to be the persuasion that after all you are all right. On page 63 of the Miscellanies, Christian Science says, "If there is no sin, why did Jesus come to save sinners? Jesus came to seek and to save them from this false belief." This seems to be rather an original contribution to theology. Among the various explanations of the origin of sin, we do not remember that any before ever solved the problem by denying that there is such a thing. Would Christian Scientists abolish policemen? How would they explain the work of a burglar or a murderer? As we have observed them as neighbors, they have continued to hold their friends morally accountable. They have found great difficulty in reducing this hypothesis to a working basis.

The Christian Science God is very near to being pantheistic. "All is God and God is all." While they reject the characterization of being pantheistic, they have not made much of the personality of God. Science and Health says, "Prayer to a personal God is a hindrance." The cult definitely rejects the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. "The theory of three persons in one God suggests heathen gods."

Propagandist Activity.

Christian Scientists are intensely earnest in their religious propaganda. There is not behind it, however, the same doctrine of salvation as with the orthodox. Salvation with them is illumination. All need it and they work earnestly to reach members of the churches. Most of the Christian Scientists were once members of other churches. Christian Science has not been very effective in reaching people outside the pales of religious organization, as they have not been able to make the irreligious man feel the need of salvation, the kind they have to offer.

The essential difference of view-point in the healing work of Christian Science and all others will be seen from the course of our study. Dowie healed people by overcoming the devil. Christian Science does not believe in the devil. Roman Catholics heal by working miracles. Christian Science heals by persuading the mind of the patient of the unreality of his material body and consequently of the unreality of the physical ills of which so many of us complain. All of these people do heal disease, Dowieites, Catholics and Christian Scientists. If healing is the proof of theological correctness, we have proved too much in proving all three of these to be right, with their divergent theories of the nature of disease and the process of cure.

The Great Life Relationship.

Christian Science carries its fundamental view-point to the great life relationships. It is a burning question now in the Christian Science group as to whether the physiological basis of marriage shall longer be recognized. Mrs. Eddy in Miscellanies says, "To abolish marriage at this period, and maintain morality and generation, would put ingenuity to ludicrous shifts; yet this is possible in Science, although it is today problematic." "Human procreation, birth, life, and death are subjective states of the human erring mind; they are phenomena of mortality, nothingness, that illustrate mortal mind and body as one, and neither real or eternal." While, however, it is denied that physiology plays any part in the origin of life, Science and Health makes this concession, "Until it is learned that generation rests upon no sexual basis, let marriage continue."

We are surprised that poverty has not been exalted as well as celibacy. The acceptance of money on the part of a Christian Scientist is a concession to mortal mind. Yet the founder is a millionaire and we have learned of no groups that have given up the belief in property. It would be consistent for Christian Scientists not to eat. Eating is as inconsistent with the general view-point of the unreality of matter as taking medicine. Some Christian Scientists assert that we will some time achieve this and having won the victory over every belief in food and property, there will no longer be any who believe themselves poor and miserable.

Indifferent to Philanthropy.

It is because of this that Christian Scientists have little interest in reform and philanthropy. They believe the world needs the truth more than it needs food or raiment. They have built none of the great institutions which have been the pride and the flower of our Christian civilization. In this they have been severely logical.

Back of every theology that makes headway in the world, there is a religious experience. The determining experience in giving birth to Christian Science was that of Mrs. Eddy. What though others did furnish most of the ideas of Science and Health? What though others today are the rulers of the earthly affairs of the church? Mrs. Eddy was the one who experienced the greatest victory over misery and disease and has the most to be thankful for. She was a nervous and hysterical child. McClure's Magazine has told the story of her early eccentricities with great accuracy. Even after she was married, she was so nervous she had to be rocked to sleep in a cradle built by her husband and carried upstairs to bed. None but the nervous can know the horrors of such an affliction. Through mental healing, she was entirely cured of her ailment and has ever since enjoyed health, being alive today at a ripe old age. Such a deliverance as this should be experienced by other sufferers.

America's Debt to John Calvin

Founder of Freedom and Most Influential Protestant Reformer

By Professor Errett Gates

Editors' Note: In July of last year there was a notable gathering in Geneva to pay special honor to John Calvin, the four-hundredth anniversary of whose birth came on the tenth of that month. Delegates from all parts of Protestantism united in praising the founder of their church organizations and the moulder of their religious and political thought. At that time it was announced that a monument to the Calvinistic Reformation would be erected in Geneva and would be as significant as that to the Lutheran Reformation at Worms. Committees to finance this scheme have been formed in Geneva, where already more than forty thousand dollars have been pledged, in other parts of Switzerland, in Germany, Holland, Great Britain and Ireland and in the British possessions over sea, and in this country. Two committees, and those in two of the smallest and financially weakest Calvinistic churches, in Bohemia and Hungary, have completed their collections, and their delegates have the proud satisfaction of handing in remarkably generous sums, for Bohemia had raised one thousand dollars and Hungary ten thousand. America has as yet made only a beginning.

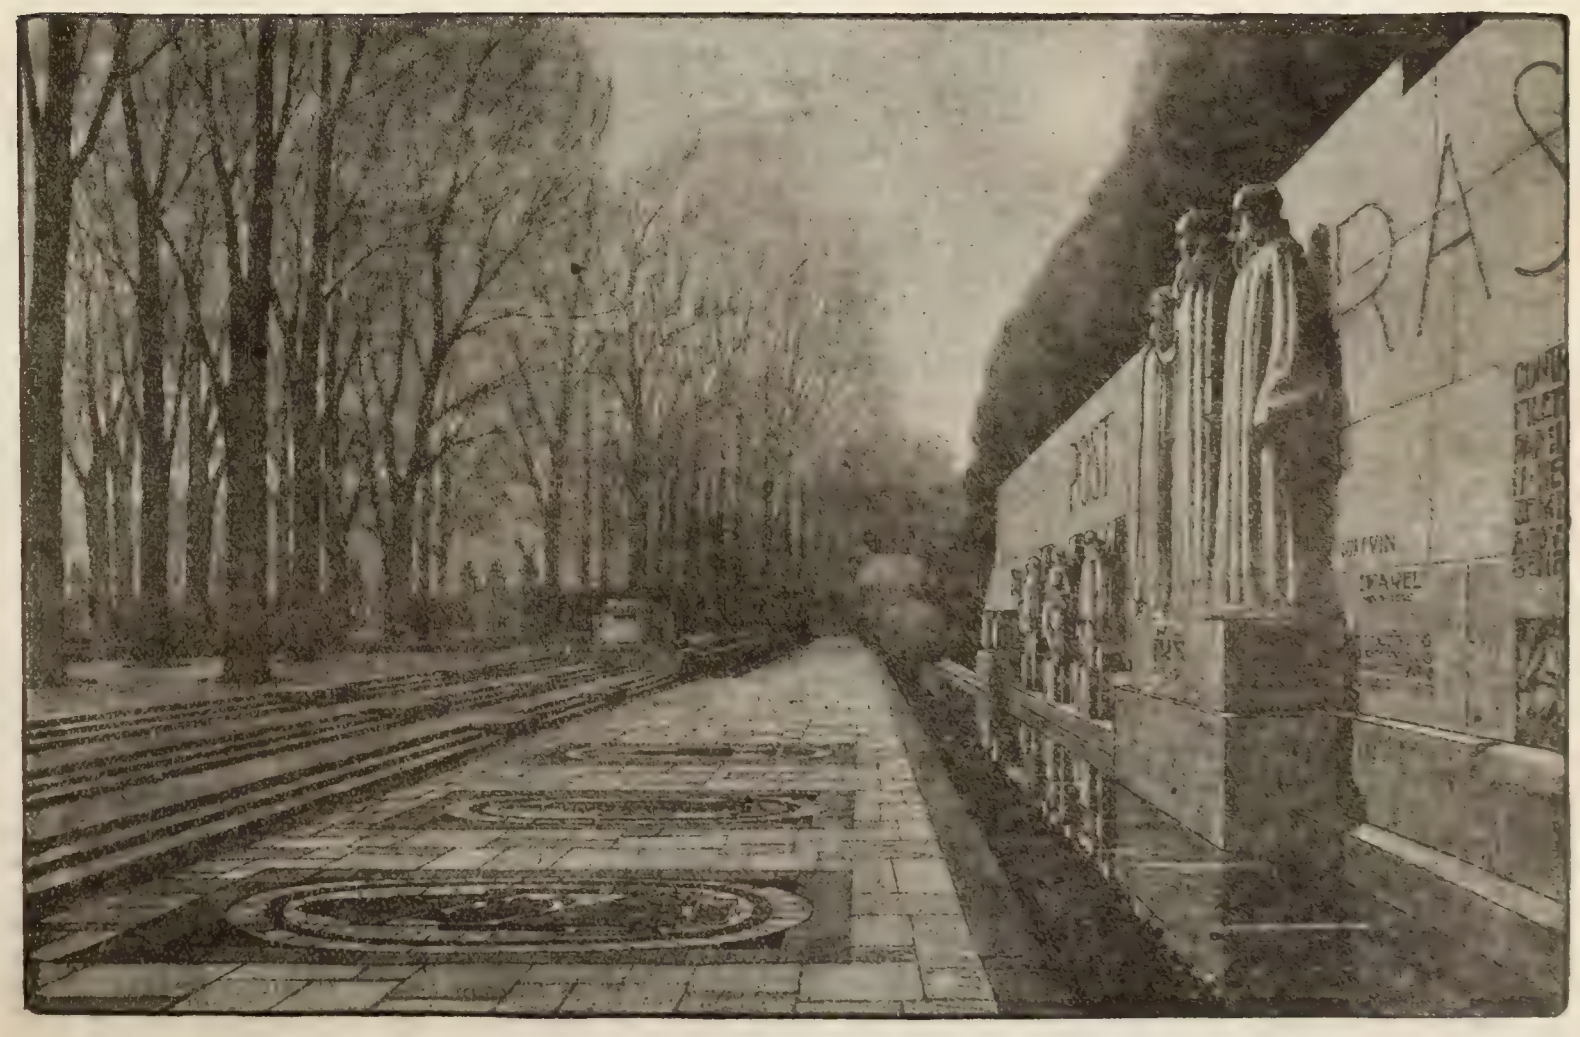
The Christian Century is glad to extend the opportunity to its readers to share in this world-wide tribute. The Disciples of Christ, while indebted to Calvin for but little that is distinctive in their way of thinking are, nevertheless, sharers in the great common treasures of religious and political liberty with which the name of John Calvin is indissolubly connected. Contributions may be sent to the treasurer, Samuel M. Jackson, 700 Park avenue, New York City.

The monument is noble in idea and will be artistic in construction. Its cost will be one hundred thousand dollars. It is proposed to cut down a part of the grounds opposite the University of Geneva so as to form a broad walk at a lower level. This walk will have a tasselated pavement and be reached by a very wide flight of stone steps, at the head of which on either side will be huge boulders, one inscribed with the name of Luther, the other with that of Zwingli. Between this walk and the ancient wall which here sustains the cathedral wherein Calvin regularly preached, will be a trench. The monument proper will consist of figures carved out of the granite slabs inserted in the wall. The central slab will have the forms of the four men, Farel, Calvin, Beza, and Knox, who were the leaders of the movement which resulted in the Reformed, Presbyterian, and Congregational Churches. On either side of this group will come those who as statesmen and rulers promoted and protected the Reformed faith. Besides these figures, the monument will have tablets with appropriate inscriptions.



In connection with this notice we have asked Dr. Errett Gates of the Disciples' Divinity House, the University of Chicago, to briefly interpret to our readers our common indebtedness to the Genevan reformer.

BY DR. GATES.

John Calvin was the most influential of all the Protestant reformers. The only other reformer that could dispute his commanding position was Luther. But Luther's influence was dominant only over his own German people, while Calvin dominated the reformatory doctrine and order of France, the Netherlands, Puritan England, Scotland and America. Calvin gave his name to a system of doctrine that was adopted by all the so-called Reformed churches, including Presbyterian, Congregational and Baptist. Calvinism ruled in the Protestant movement as the orthodoxy of all the great confessions of faith—the Heidelberg Catechism, the Belgic Confession, the Articles of the Synod of Dort, and above all, of the Westminster Confession of Faith, in which both Puritan England and Presbyterian Scotland joined.

The whole of Protestant Europe literally and figuratively went to school to Calvin at Geneva. It became "the capital of the Reformed Church, and was called the Protestant Rome." Philip II. of Spain wrote to the French king as follows: "Geneva is the source of all misfortune to France, the refuge of all heretics, the most terrible enemy of Rome. I am ready at any time with all the power of my kingdom, to aid in its destruction."

The gates of Geneva were wide open to the persecuted of all lands. It was one of the free republics of Switzerland, and one of the earliest cradles of religious liberty. Here gathered Protestant students of all countries to learn the Reformed religion, and returned to their homes to scatter the seeds of the new doctrine.

An academy was opened there by Calvin in 1559. Schaff says: "The success of the school was extraordinary. No less than nine hundred young men from almost all the nations of Europe were matriculated in the first year as regular scholars, and almost as many, mostly refugees from France and England, prepared themselves by the theological lectures of Calvin for the work of evangelists and teachers in their native land. Among these was John Knox, the great Reformer of Scotland." No wonder Calvinism came to be the power that it was.

Calvin's Part in Making America.

John Calvin had no small part in making America what she is. This republic is often said to have been "cradled in religious liberty." That cradle was brought from Geneva, by way of Puritan England and Reformed Holland. It was not such a cradle as we should call up to date in the America of the twentieth century, but it was the best of the kind in that time. It is true that Calvin gave refuge to the persecuted in Geneva: but he persecuted to death in that same city, Servetus, who denied the orthodox doctrine of the trinity. Calvin was not consistent, neither were his disciples in the colony of Massachusetts Bay. But they had the doctrine which was destined at last to make of the North American continent "a land of the free and the home of the brave."

Motley says concerning Calvinism: "The doctrine of predestination, the consciousness of being chosen soldiers of Christ, inspired those Puritans who founded the commonwealths of England, of Holland, and of America with a contempt of toil, danger, and death which enabled them to accomplish things almost supernatural. No uncouthness of phraseology, no unlovely austerity of deportment, could, except to vulgar minds, make that sublime enthusiasm ridiculous, which on either side the ocean ever confronted tyranny with dauntless front, and welcomed death on battlefield, scaffold, or John Calvin became the founders of both religious and political liberty—that the most arbitrary and monarchial spiritual doctrine should work itself out in the widest expression of human freedom. How shall we explain such an effect from the doctrine of Divine sovereignty, with its five corollaries—"unconditional predestination, limited atonement, total depravity, irresistible grace, and the perseverance of the saints"? How can the waters of sweetness and freedom flow from such a well? This is how it was: The same sovereign and arbitrary power which bound the human soul to its Maker, freed it from all things made—from popes, and priests, and kings, and governments, and the world itself. Calvin transferred the allegiance of the human soul from the seen to the unseen king, "who is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think."

In the courage of this doctrine, Andrew Melville, the successor of John Knox as leader of the Presbyterian forces in Scotland, was able to pluck King James by the sleeve and tell him: "There are two kings and two kingdoms in Scotland. There is King James the head of this commonwealth, and there is Christ Jesus the King of the Church, whose subject James the VI. is, and of whose kingdom he is not a king, or a lord, or a head, but a member." Thus it was that a spiritual tyranny begot a political liberty.

All the original founders of the great American colonies were Calvinists. The hardness of this system entered as iron into their blood and spirit. Out of them has come the strength of our national life, and the moral idealism of our national aims.

Let Us Forget

By J. M. Cavaness.

Thou Maker of the heavens and earth,
Thou Master of the universe,
Whose Spirit gave creation birth,
Whose hand stayed not creations curse,
Though scarlet sins our souls beset,
Let us forget—let us forget.

Hast thou not said through prophet's old,
In the plain speech of holy lore,
Though our dark sins be manifold,
Thou wouldst remember them n omore?
Why spend our days in vain regret?
Let us forget—let us forget.

The flowers that bud and bloom again
O'er devastated hill and wold,
Forgetful of the hurricane,
Star-gem the plains with blue and gold;
O'er sin-scarred hearts why should we fret?
Let us forget—let us forget.

The Love that holds the farthest star,
That reaches Sheol's utmost bend,
That neither Time nor Chance can bar,
Nor mind of Seraph comprehend,
Until earth's latest sun shall set,
A ransomed soul cannot forget.

That Timid Church Letter

To enlist with Christ means a life work. Absorb him into the local congregation before he realizes that he has an opportunity of refusing service.

This is a sane and sensible solution of a great question, a question which is costing our churches thousands of dollars in evangelistic expense, misspent, and wasting foot pounds by the million which ought to be used in winning souls to Christ. Yes, and more, it is losing to Christ's church and the cause we love thousands of members every year. This is a vital matter. The waste of time, money and effort can hardly be computed. This waste is unwise, unbusinesslike, unnecessary, and I say it with a firm conviction, sinful in the sight of God Almighty.

The most enthusiastic Scientists in our acquaintance are those who have had some like deliverance. From person to person a real gospel has been handed on. The personality has been aroused and cures of functional disorders have taken place in great numbers.

One may easily indicate the relation of this movement to the Christian gospel. The religion of the New Testament everywhere treats sin and disease as realities. Jesus is a man not distinguishable from other men save through the faith of the disciples. God was personal and objective to the believer. Salvation was a deliverance from the bondage of something more than a superstition, a real force for evil. The gospel shows Jesus as sympathetic with the sick. He does not treat them as deluded sinners. The gospel makes the marriage tie and the family functions and relationships, types of the various relationships of the perfect Kingdom of God.

Christian Science may be true, but if it is the gospel is not. Even their allegorizing process has not removed from the Bible the manifest evidences of another view-point. We cannot settle the truth of Christian Science by such a statement. It must be investigated for what it is. It must stand on its own evidences. But while it has in it many Christian ideas, its controlling idea is one which is not to be found in the Bible or the Christian religion, and its Science has neither the method or the view-point that has ever been associated with that word.

Our Readers' Opinions

What Baptism Certainly Is

Baptism is certainly a command of the Christ, based upon his "All authority in heaven and earth." It is done in the all comprehensive name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit. Matt. 28:18. It is done in the making of disciples and is therefore initiatory. As initiatory, it is a positive ordinance and not moral per se. Is there not a distinction between a symbolic sign of authority and a moral precept? At the commencement of the civil war, the governor of New York said, "If any man pulls down the stars and stripes shoot him on the spot," and the loyal North said, "Amen." Yet some one might say, "Oh, you narrow, bigoted, cruel soul! Shoot a man for pulling down a piece of cloth." "Let us look at it more closely. Why, here are some red and white stripes, with a blue piece on which are sewed some stars. It is frayed at the end and is soiled in several places. Give me ten dollars and I can make a better one. You are making a great fuss over that flag."

"Oh, you do not understand. This is the ensignia of authority of the United States. Back of it is the army and navy, backed by every citizen to defend it to the last drop of blood. Of itself, it is certainly insignificant but as the ensign of the authority of the government it is of tremendous significance," and the bloody war continued for four long years at the cost of a half million of lives, before it was settled that "old Glory" should float over the Southland. So Jesus the Christ, having proven his kingship by his life, death and resurrection, sends his heralds to make disciples with the statement, "All authority is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and make disciples of all the nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit." Who shall thrust his profane hand into that throne of authority enswathed as it is in "light unapproachable" and glory ineffable, to change, or wrest completely from the hand of "the only Potentate, King of kings and Lord of lords" his emblem of authority? Putting a man under the water is a very insignificant and even foolish act taken by itself. But when the soul in this act bows to the sceptre of the Christ, bends his neck to the yoke of his Lord, and thus comes into the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, it becomes an act of tremendous significance and woe to that one who knowingly changes or even trifles with a divine ordinance of such portent.

Jesus certainly understood that baptism was an ensign of authority in John's mission; for when cleansing the temple, he was asked by the rulers, "By what authority doest thou these things?" he hurled back upon them tne question, "The baptism of John; was it from heaven or from men?" They reason, "If we say from heaven, he will say why did ye not believe on him?" In rejecting John's baptism they rejected his authority and mission and also God who sent him. "They rejected for themselves the counsel of God, being not baptized of him." If Jesus so held John's baptism to represent heaven's authority, do you suppose that he considered his own to be of less significance?

The crying need of this age is for it to recognize the authority of our divine Savior. Our fathers made no mistake when they saw that the only road out of the religious confusion was to hold aloft the supreme authority of Jesus. His kingship was exalted above all parties and creeds and they made sermons on the Lordship of the Christ. They could no more help the battle raging around the woods, schoolhouses and barns ring with baptism than contending armies can prevent the contesting of the cohorts about the standards that represent the government of each. And it is so even today. If you do not preach on baptism the people will deluge your question box on the subject. In the last meetings I have held I have been requested to preach on the subject, the urgency was so great. I believe that it is the universal experience of our evangelists that the meeting hangs many times until the action of baptism is made clear and strong. The evangelist neglects it at his peril. Instead of its standing in the way of our growth, thousands, yea, hundreds of thousands have come to us because their eyes have been opened to this divine requirement. On the other hand there is a body taking the Bible only and calling themselves Christians who are a weak and dying people. In the Erie conference, which formerly numbered forty churches they now number only fifteen, and in a report recently of a year's work they only reported four baptisms in the whole conference, and I had baptized that four in a short meeting in one of their churches. The virile preaching of one of our preachers in ten days had accomplished more than fifteen churches had done in a year. Their voice for union is weak and they are almost a cipher in answering the prayer of Jesus for union. And the most potent factor in producing this weakness is that in their century of effort they threw down the ensign of authority, and in compromising in this they broke down the principle upon which we have wrought a glorious victory, viz.: The unquestioned supreme authority of Jesus the Christ in all matters of religion. Why should they expect the king to lead a people that trails his ensign in the dust. What Judson, Stone, the Campbells, Scott, Peirson, Simpson and a million others have seen when the scales have fallen from their eyes, all can see when they shake off the increments of the past. There is less of a deadlock now than ever before. The affusionists are silent because they are too much enlightened to use the petty subterfuges of former years. It is the time now as never before without dogmatism to open the book and invite all to a careful and prayerful examination to discover what baptism really is.

Pittsburg, Pa. FRANK A. WIGHT.

[There is real value in the conception of baptism set forth in Mr. Wight's article above. It is better to say that immersion is a "symbolic sign" than that it is essential to salvation or a test of faith. In actual practice immersion is neither essential to salvation nor a test of faith. But it is a symbolic sign of the soul's self-commitment to Christ, of its alliance with others who have likewise committed themselves to Christ, and it has become a symbolic sign perpetually memorializing the death, burial and resurrection of our Lord. Yet the above letter illustrates the unreality into which a legalistic conception of Christianity leads one. That Christ ever exercised such authority as Mr. Wight builds his argument upon is a pure assumption. Baptism as an "ensign of authority" is a totally foreign conception to the New Testament and to the spirit of Christianity. The authority that Jesus exercises is a moral, or inner, or spiritual authority. His whole life and teaching were flung against the system of authority-religion such as that implied in our correspondent's article. What he was ever striving to show his disciples was the fact that spiritual character (in his own definition of "spiritual") was the basis of "salvation," was, indeed, itself salvation. The notion that Christ, whose essential mission to his contemporaries was to emancipate them from the use of arbitrary tests of faith, in turn established arbitrary tests of faith in himself, tests that can be likened to flags and other "ensigns of authority" is wholly repugnant to our understanding of the Savior. "The crying need of the age" is indeed the recognition of the Lordship of Jesus. But the Lordship of Jesus concerns itself with realities of life and not with symbols. Whether Christ reigns in our lives and our world is not declared by the fact that we have been immersed, but by the fact that we have committed ourselves to him to learn his secret and his spiritual law so that we may live like him in our personal experience and in social relationships. The Christian Century believes with the Disciples of Christ in the practice of immersion only. There is to our mind, peculiar honor to be given to Jesus by this beautiful historic ordinance. But that there is any ground in Scripture or in fact for the legalistic interpretation of it, which the above article sets forth, we do not hesitate to deny. The one constant peril of a spiritual religion like Christianity is legalism. The terms and concepts of government can not but be misleading when applied to a relationship such as that which Jesus taught obtained between God and man.—Editors.]

Dr. Gates' Congress Paper

Editors Christian Century: Thank you for giving the Greybeards a chance to strike back at the young heretics. We want to strike at Bro. Gates; for he has been running at large for some time. But where shall I find a good place to strike? Bro. Gates says that God is not to be found in darkness, in mystery, in magic, but in the light, in an orderly life, in the humility and obedience of a true Christian. Certainly there is no place here to strike. He says that the ethical is the divine. I might substitute spiritual for ethical. But little or nothing would be gained by the change. He tells us that Christ did not, after living a pure and unselfish life here, go to a selfish heaven. I can not strike here; for I remember he ascended with his hands uplifted in blessing. Bro. Gates does seem to teach that the reason of the ancient thinker and that of the modern thinker, are identical; but he soon relieves our minds by confessing the modern thinker has the advantage of superior light. But I most earnestly ask you, Bro. Gates, what inconsistency can there be between the inspiration of scripture and the allegorical interpretation thereof? Do you not know some very intelligent persons who believe profoundly in both the inspiration and allegorical interpretation of Scripture? Are you not aware that these persons even believe that inspiration is best established by allegorical interpretation?

To my two Bro. Graybeards, the reviewers, I would say: Brethren, your reputation for intelligence is good; keep it so. Do not say, "Modern thought is centuries old and has been refuted long ago." The present writer is about as old as you, and does not desire to be compelled to be classed with the naughty, heretical boys. He must look to the sane, progressive elders, like yourselves, for association. He is afraid that you will drive him to the communion of the young heretics, like Bro. Gates. For the young man who is nonprogressive, whose mind and heart have become stagnant, is as old as the everlasting hills. He does not wish to be classed with him.

A STORY OF THE TRUSTS

BY JANE RICHARDSON

CHAPTER XXVI.

Alonzo Surrenders.

The spring vacation was over and the April college term had begun; the students had returned from their short Easter holiday to work for their final examinations in June.

Yard cleaning was everywhere in progress, and the air was filled with the pleasant fragrance of burning grass—one of the most suggestive odors of spring in the country. The maples had flung out their scarlet tassels, which were presently beaten down by sudden showers and strewn along the sidewalks.

Eleanor was busy with her garden, where, thanks to the labors of Alonzo Johnson the preceding year, there was little to be done but turn up the rich, friable mould, and shape the beds in their former outlines.

Susan missed her husband at every turn, for he now was quite past helping her at any task. She hired one of Randall's former employees, "who needed the money," to spade the vegetable plot, and she and Eldora planted the onion sets, the peas and lettuce—always Alonzo's favorite occupation, "after hours." Mary Benson was contented and busy in her new position, where she steadily advanced, encouraged by the approval and generosity of her employer. She received letters from Teddy regularly, which, although he had little to say concerning his own prospects, were not specially disquieting. They were full of expressions of affection and encouragement, but she did not read very carefully "between the lines." Had she done so she must have suspected that his Chicago venture was not all that he had anticipated.

She was happier with Eleanor than she could have been elsewhere with Teddy gone, and at her friend's express desire, considered herself a member of the little family. She helped in the house-work as she could find time; she kept her own room in order and shared in the care of the plants and flower-beds. Her board was a small item of expense, but something she insisted on paying; and she was saving every dollar that she could, putting it aside for future need. She had become a thoughtful, sedate little woman.

Eldora studied of evenings and for one hour each day, recited her lessons to Eleanor, and she was consoled for her enforced withdrawal from school with the reflection that she was not falling behind her classes. Susan's praise was not mere maternal vanity, for her teacher found the girl remarkably quick and clever. The realization of her ambition might be delayed, but Eleanor was convinced that sooner or later it would be rewarded.

"Ned's better off in school where the teacher makes him mind," said Susan. "I ain't got much time to look after him now, I'm glad he's there, it keeps him out of mischief."

From the day that she had confessed to Teddy that she knew that Alonzo would never get well, Susan had given up hope. But she was careful not to betray the belief either to Alonzo or Eldora. As time passed their economics became more rigid. They lived upon the coarsest fare and the greater part of all Susan earned by her needle was spent on necessities for the sick man.

Randall and his wife still kept them in mind, bringing substantial offerings for Alonzo which Susan dared not refuse, and work for herself which was promptly paid for. But the money melted rapidly. To gratify the sick man's whim Susan had paid the taxes on the lot, he begging her "to hold on to it till better times." It seemed to her that she had been "holding on till strength and endurance were gone. She told Eleanor when she came in to pay the rent: "We'll mighty nigh have to live on bread and water, but I ain't sorry I let him have his way. It's done him so much good."

"Now, Susan," said Eleanor, giving back the money, and folding Susan's rough fingers over it, "If I'm ever to be your friend now is the time."

"Oh, Miss Eleanor—" protested Susan brokenly.

"I don't want you to bring me any more rent until I tell you when I'm likely to need it. I've had a little good fortune lately—some stocks have been sold that we thought were worthless—and I am provided for. I know that you will let me do this. If I were in your place I should certainly accept it from you." Susan began to cry bitterly. "I don't know what we're coming to. Lon was always so proud, and I never could bear to take anything from nobody. I've tried my best to keep up, but we're nothin' but paupers!"

"Susan, you take the wrong view of it altogether," said Eleanor firmly. "Your spirit and independence are worthy of all respect, but there are times when everybody must have help in some way. Do you suppose if your husband had been dishonest or shirked his duty there would be much sympathy for him now? It is one of the rewards—the very best of all, I think—that such a man's virtues are remembered in his hour of need."

Susan was comforted, and took the money, mentally resolving to pay it as soon as she could. She knew that Eleanor would need all she had in preparing for her wedding which was now fixed for the last of June.

As the days grew warmer Randall came frequently to take Alonzo out to drive; but he soon grew too feeble for even this exertion. Life was rapidly slipping from him, and if he realized it he made no complaint and expressed no unwillingness to go. He had never felt that enjoyment of mere existence which reconciles some natures to suffering, loss and long-continued misfortune. He did not struggle against the final surrender.

One Sunday, the latter part of April, he woke feeling much better. There had been several days of clear, bright weather, and he rallied surprisingly. He ate his breakfast with more relish than he had shown for weeks. He noticed for the first time how green the grass was and how rapidly the leaves were coming out, and he smiled when Ned brought him a few purple crocuses, drooping and wilting from the heat of his moist little hand. Susan went into the kitchen to look after the dinner with a lighter heart than she had had for days. She thought that after all there might be a chance. "If Lon can only get well," she said to herself, "I'll never complain about anything again; I don't know but that I'd almost forgive Mullens."

At that instant Alonzo called her—a feeble, smothered cry—the import of which she comprehended instantly. She ran to him and found him strangled and suffocated with the blood that streamed from his mouth—the sudden hemmorrhage against which she had been warned.

Ned, who was standing beside his father's chair shrieked with terror, and rushed out of the room calling for Eldora, who came, pale and agitated, to her mother's assistance. They gave him the remedy the doctor had left for such an emergency, and when the flow of blood was checked Alonzo consented, at last, to go to bed. He was carried upstairs, with the help of neighbors, knowing full well that he should descend but once again—when all was over.

Susan ceased to weep. She realized that she must be in full possession of her faculties, ready for all that might be required of her at the last moment. She sat beside Alonzo refusing to yield her place to anyone, begging in these final hours they might be left undisturbed.

Alonzo fell into a heavy sleep—a deep stupor in which the soul appeared to have already deserted its worn-out tenement. When he woke for the first time he did not recognize Susan, and in his delirium he talked without cessation, though brokenly, about their courtship, their marriage—of the home they were to have. He went over again the closing of the shops the loss of employment, and his hard struggle to find other work. Everywhere he imagined he encountered Mullens; he barred the way, he rose in his path like a pursuing phantom, and he begged and pleaded that he would go and leave him to die in peace.

Eleanor came in and asked to take her place at the bed-side, but Susan replied:

"There isn't much more than I can do for him, and I'm not willing to give way to anybody."

Ned and Eldora went home with her to remain that night. The boy could not fully realize the sorroow of his father's death, but to poor Eldora it was a crushing loss.

At dawn the sick man woke conscious and composed, but he could not speak aloud. The east shone with the splendor of the coming day, the morning star fading before it. As he fixed his eyes upon the brightening sky, the dying man asked that he might be raised upon his pillow; and Susan thrust her arm beneath it and lifted him up. The radiance of the morning fell upon him like the premonition of that other day,—just at hand—wherein no man shall work. And thus they waited; they that had loved and suffered, that had shared alike the joys and sorrows of their humble existence; one, unterrified, upon the confines of the unseen, the other watching his departure, which no wild rebellion, nor any human protest could delay. He spoke once more, slowly, half audibly, with painful effort:

"Poor wife—poor children—I have loved you—but I must leave you."

The sun rose, its first rays filled the room with dazzling splendor. Susan felt his cold hand relax. With a sigh he closed his eyes and was gone.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Mills of the Gods.

When all was over Susan was like a woman who had slowly turned to stone. She was stern and cold, and shutting herself up in the room in which Alonzo died, would see neither Eleanor nor the children. Eleanor could well imagine the burden of that dark self-communion—the realization of the future stretching drearily before her, whose trials and sorrows she was doomed to bear alone.

In the first bitterness of her sorrow Susan repented that she had ever married; that she had ever brought children into the world to suffer as their father had suffered—to die, perhaps, as he had died, disheartened, defeated, crushed by a merciless force from which there was no appeal, against which there was no defence. The heavy lines in her face were brought into relief. Her ruddy skin was blanched and sallow, her eyes dulled, her hair faded and gray, like one who had grown old before her time.

Eleanor, Mary and Jessie Clark did their utmost to rouse her to a realization of the duties which remained; the home, though its loneliness was heart-rending; the children for whom henceforth she must toil alone with redoubled energy. But nothing could stir her from her sullen apathy during the first weeks after Alonzo's death.

Mary and Jessie at this time were almost as sad and care-worn as Susan herself. Mary still had letters from Teddy every week and though they were superficially hopeful and cheerful—she suspected the truth—that he was enduring trials which he would not, or dared not confess.

Since Jessie had delivered her ultimatum, standing between the children and his outbursts of temper, Clark had never again raised his hand to strike them. His silence had increased and he kept a furtive surveillance over them all, following every movement with lowering glance, which was in reality far more ominous than the fits of unprovoked rage, as Jessie realized. He began to neglect his work, coming and going erratically, or forgetting it altogether. As no reliance could be placed upon him he was dismissed. He then haunted the house, walking restlessly from room to room with uncanny noiselessness, appearing unexpectedly at Jessie's side when she supposed him elsewhere; and he continued his ceaseless watching day and night.

The people of his neighborhood had suspected for months that Clark "was not right," and endeavored to put Jessie on her guard.

She, however, found his passive sullenness so much more endurable than his violence, that she tried to assure herself he would never harm her. Sometimes she was suddenly awakened in the night, conscious that he was lurking in the darkness, and she called to him sharply with a dread that was full of terrible misgivings. He would never reply, but she heard him slip away, as stealthily as he had come and return to his own room. She listened, always for that, before she could compose herself to sleep again. She attributed his constant spying, his wandering about the house at unusual hours, to the old suspicion; she would not admit that she was afraid, but she kept the children under a vigilant guard.

The death of Alonzo had marked a great effect on Clark. From that hour a new impulse took possession of him, an idea on which he concentrated all that remained of his ability to think and plan. He muttered to himself: "Nobody need pity him; he's better off. It's the best thing that could happen. If we've got to go, what's the use of puttin' it off? Good men have got a right to rest; bad ones ought to be sent where they belong—to hell. Lon—and Mullens— one gone and out of his trouble, and the other—where—where—where?"

This mood lasted for some time. As he approached the house one evening, he saw Jessie through the window preparing the children's supper and he started and gasped like one who had suddenly been roused to consciousness.

"There she is," he said in gentler tones than he had used toward her for many months. "Like her mother. She'll marry and have children and die of a broken heart—just like her mother, and the children'll grow up and mebby go to ruin. They'd better all die now like poor Lon. They've got to go sometime, 'twould be a mercy—a mercy, if they'd go now;"

When he opened the door Jessie looked up, her heart giving a throb of fear. His face had changed and softened unaccountably. He gazed at her—at them all—with an expression of gentleness and pity, startingly different from his scowling gloom of the past weeks.

Jessie caught up the baby to her breast and stood on the defensive, waiting in suspense for what might come. It was totally unexpected and all the more terrifying. He said in strange, unfamiliar tones, strident and faltering:

"Children, I've been a bad father to you. I've found it out at last. I haven't rightly known what I've done till now, and you've been good children—good children—too. We'd better go away to some place where nobody'll know us and despise us because we're poor. Mebby we can find mother I want to go and I want you all to go with me."

Jessie huriedly gave the baby to one of the other children, and went bravely up to him. Some instinct of protection prompted her to humor him, for she saw he was quite beside himself:

"Wait a little while, father, be patient. You must eat first, and rest, and we'll make our plans in the morning. Then we will all go!"

He put his hand beneath her chin, and lifting it said:

"You're not deceivin' me?"

"No; oh no! Let me give you some supper now—you're worn out."

One of the children gave a little frightened cry. Jessie raised a warning hand he saw the pathetic gesture.

"They tremble at the very sight of me—I've been so cruel." He sank into a chair, rested his elbow on the table and covered his face with his hands.

Jessie said nothing but poured out his tea and gave it to him saying: "There, father, drink that and you'll feel better."

She would not alarm the children by sending for help, nor would she go herself for she dared not leave them.

This strange mood laster through the next morning, which was one of unseasonable sultriness. Toward sunset dark clouds began to rise in the north—ragged, detached masses, floating rapidly toward the zenith. Flashes of lightning played along the horizon where there was a dull rumble of distant thunder.

A lurid unearthly shadow settled over the fields, and the wind moaned and sighed in the treetops. The children hurried in from their play and Jessie closed the door and secured the window. The wind rose steadily, rocking the house on its foundation, but the rain held off.

Jessie put the frightened children to bed early, but it was late before she could persuade her father to seek his, and then she saw that he threw himself down on the bed in his clothes.

Full of forebodings, Jessie sat with her book, watching alone. Toward midnight she heard her father groan, then he threw his door open violently, and coming to her exclaimed excitedly:

"I know what you're doin'! You're watchin' me. Put out the light and go to bed. I won't have you settin' there. It drives me crazy."

At that moment a blaze of lightning flamed through the unshuttered window, white, intense, dazzling—followed by a crash of thunder as if the heavens were rent. Rain fell in a tumultous flood, lashed into blinding spray by the fury of the tempest. Clark raised his voice to a hoarse shout, and with wild gestures made the girl know that he would not be watched—she must go. She dared do nothing but obey when he was wrought up to such fury. She crept into bed beside the sleeping baby and after a time dropped into a disturbed slumber, from which she awoke with a start, conscious that he was there beside her.

She knew instinctively that it was her father, nerved at last to some dreadful deed. Her mind worked with that mysterious swiftness which stirs the brain in moments of peril and she remembered that the key of the outer door fitted that of the staircase also, though she had locked it when she came up.

She heard him muttering: "The time has come! they must all go—their mother is calling them. They must go first, then I will come."

She did not stir or make an outcry. Instinctively she threw her feeble arm across the child beside her; then she reflected that her one chance for life lay in her ability to dissemble sleep. She could not tell how—if she must die—he would rend soul from body. She thought she caught the glitter of a knife. She wondered if she would be long in dying.

As he crept toward the bed in a glare of lightning her face on the pillow, calm and ghastly, suddenly arrested his attention.

"Why—why," he whispered, "she is dead!—gone first, after all! She'll tell her that we're coming!"

He did not notice the child but he looked at her again intently.

"I must make sure," he muttered, laying his burning hand up her forehead. One thought moved her to superhuman control—the children. Their safety depended on her—if she could escape they might in some way be saved. They were alone! Their cries for aid could not be heard above the tumult without.

"She's cold—cold as death!" he whispered, and then stole away with the furtive tread of a beast on the trail of its prey.

She heard him halt at the door of the other room; she could bear no more. She sprang up with a terrible cry that rang through the house.

"Father,—father,—father!"

She stood breathless—waiting; she expected that he would come back foaming and raving. But instead, he gave an answering cry, rushed down stairs out of the house and fled away through the storm. She lighted the lamp with trembling hand. Could he have gone to the children first?—they made no sound. Trembling she crept to their closed door; she paused, not daring to enter. She placed her ear against the panel; all was silent. She could endure the suspense no longer; she threw back the door, and crossing the threshold, raised the candle high above her head. In its light she saw they were all there—all safe. Then she dropped upon the floor in a swoon.

The Cry of the Toiler

S. Leander White.

Throughout this land, and every land,
Today we hear this earnest cry,
"Give us the earnings of our hand,
The portion which you now deny."

We toil and struggle on through life;
We risk our health and lives each day
We often die amid the strife,
And find our lives a cheerless way.

While those who neither toil nor spin,
But live in luxury and ease,
And have the comforts that we win,
Give us the wages which they please.

Give us a wage so mean and spare
That we can hardly clothe and feed
Ourselves and those for whom we care;
Can scarce supply our urgent need.

And so sometimes our tempers lead
To deeds of violence and crime;
And then are punished for the deed,
And sent to prison in quick time.

How shall the workman have his rights
When laws, and courts fast bind his hands
Unless he turns about and fights
Until they yield to his demands?

When will the Golden Rule prevail
In all the dealings of mankind?
Until that time the toilers' wail
Will agitate the public mind.

De seventh chile of a seventh chile
  Folks say see ghosts;
  Dunno 'bout dat, but I know dis chile
  See de Heavenly Hosts—
    'Case ev'y little once in a while
    De way she smile!

Folks say dimples is a sign of luck.
  Dunno how dat be;
I know angels kiss dese dimples heah,
'Caze dat I see—
    Fer ev'y little once in awhile—
    And den she smile!

Dese fat little creases here, dey say,
  Around her knee,
Gwine tie folks' heartstrings tight to her;
  And dat may be—
    'Case ev'y little once in a while
    How she do smile!

Nigger signs, good or bad, are true;
  But no ill dare
Come my baby-chile whilst you
  Are in my care;
She know dat, too—
    'Caze ev'y little once in awhile
    Watch how she smile!

Kiaulani, the Hawaiian Boy

Hawley E. Strong.

"You're afraid," cried a little dark-skinned Sandwich Islander, sitting crossed-legged under a tall cocoanut.

Kaiulani was the son of the minister and a great favorite in Waipio Valley, being very good and brave, and to have his playmate dare him to climb a cocoanut was too much. He jumped from the ground quickly and climbed with feet and hands up to the top of the tall tree. He had picked a fine young cocoanut and was just about to descend, when suddenly something caught his eye way down the valley. He looked a moment and then gave a piercing cry.

"Malahina" (stranger), he cried to his companion below and slipped down the cocoanut as if it were a pole.

A stranger way down in Waipio Valley was quite a novelty and the natives, hearing the cry, left their weaving and came to the doors of their little grass houses to see who was coming.

Kaiulani jumped quickly upon his little mare and galloped off down the valley at a lively pace to greet the stranger.

Down the road he sped, his chestnut colored arms waving in the air and, turning a curve, he was lost behind a large rock.

Now the other little boy, when he saw Kaiulani rush off on his horse, became very jealous, as he had no horse of his own, so he went down to the beach and pulled out his little canoe and got the paddles ready, so that he could give the stranger a ride in on the waves and make Kaiulani, who had no boat, very angry.

Before he was quite ready he heard the "alohas" (greetings) of the townspeople and he hurried back up the slope just in time to see a haiole (white man) come around the bend and by his side a little boy, Kaiulani behind.

They had been lost and had wandered down into the valley. The minister took them into his house and they all sat down to a meal of fish and poi. (a Hawaiian dish).

The little white boy wanted to swim after they had eaten, so Kaiulani offered to take him down to the beach. Here they met the other little boy, who offered to take the little white boy out in his canoe.

This made Kaiulani very angry and he advised the white boy not to go, but wanting the adventure he accepted and in another minute they were bounding out over the crests of the waves in the little canoe, leaving Kaiulani staring after them on the shore.

He sat down under a large tree fern to watch them, but had been there only a few minutes when the father of the little boy and his own father came along. They asked about the little white boy and Kaiulani told them the whole story.

Just then came a cry from way out over the water and looking out, the canoe was floating empty.

The boy was on his feet in a moment and rushing to the shore, he seized a surf board and jumped into the water and paddled quickly out to sea.

When the canoe had filled the native boy had swam for shore, but the little white boy was not strong enough and there he was hanging on frantically to the canoe. Kaiulani was alongside in a minute and by lifting the prow up quickly between the waves, he emptied out a large part of the water, so that they could get in again. He helped the white boy in and, the paddles having floated away, he pushed the canoe along by swimming from behind.

They were met by the two men and the other little boy who had swam into shore. He was very much ashamed, but Kaiulani forgave him. The father thanked Kaiulani very much for saving his little boy and he became quite a hero in Waipio Valley.

Angels that Watch Over Us

Little Mary Allen was afraid of the dark at night when she was put to bed. To be sure, the door of her room opened into her grandmother's; but that was not like having a light and somebody to talk to.

One night there was a storm. The thunder crashed, and every time the lightning flashed she could see through her window the lilies in the garden bending and falling in the gale like tall white ladies. Then she turned over and saw through the open door a candle lighted on her grandmother's table, and the old lady in her easy-chair placidly knitting.

"Grandmother," she called, "I am coming!"

And before Mrs. Allen could answer a little white figure dashed across the floor, flung itself upon her, and was now closely wrapped in her skirts.

"Mary," said the old lady, looking down at the scared face, "you have run away from your angel. Do you feel safer with a poor old woman in a storm than with the angels that have guarded you every moment since you were born?"

"I can see you, and I cannot see them," replied Mary.

"Yes, but they can see you when I cannot. They are with you when I am asleep or absent."

"Grandmother, what are angels, anyhow?"

"They are the watchers from Heaven that attend us. Sometimes you may be far from home and from those who love you; but always your angels are with you. It is written: 'The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them.' So just now, if you had stayed in your bed and believed in your angels, you would not have been lonely and you would have been delivered from your fear. Once when Peter lay in prison awaiting his death an angel came, struck off his chains, and led him through the doors out of the gate into the city. That was long ago; but every day the angels come still to deliver us from the prison of our fears."

"Grandmother. I wish we could see our angels."

"If we could see them, we would not need to believe; and it is faith that draws us up to God and to the angels. Are you afraid of the dark now?"

"No, grandmother," said the little girl as she arose, put her arms about the old lady's neck, and kissed her. Then she went back to her bed in the next room. A few moments later she called out: "Grandmother, the angels are here; I can feel that they are."

"That is because you believe," said her grandmother.—Boys and Girls.

My Little Boy

His stout little legs are so sturdy and strong;
  His eyes are so fearless and true;
His cheeks are so red, and his laugh is a song
  That brings back the springtime anew.

His hair is a rainbow of glittering gold,
  And soft are his dear little hands;
And yet he's a soldier lad eager and bold
  Who marches to conquer far lands.

The Indians take flight at the sound of his drum,
The Turk is so frightened, he's deaf and he's dumb,
  The pirates relinquish their pray;
  So scared that he can't run away.

Then off go their heads with a swish of his sword,
  And he lays them away in their chest;
And weary from slaughter, this mighty war lord
  Creeps into my arms for a rest.

"And how old are you little girl?"

"Six."

"And how is it you are out walking without your mama?"

"Oh, mama doesn't go in for exercise. Really we have very little in common."—Houston Chronicle.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, APRIL 24.

Theme for the Day—Paul at Athens.

Scripture—Ye men of Athens, in all things I perceive that ye are very religious. For as I passed along, and observed the objects of your worship I found also an altar with this inscription, To an Unknown God. What therefore ye worship in ignorance, this I set forth unto you.—Acts 17:22, 23.

Ay and ere now above the shining city
Full of all knowledge and a God unknown
Stood I and spake, and passion of my pity
Drew him from heaven and showed him to his own.
—F. W. H. Myer ("St. Paul").

Prayer—Father in heaven, we praise Thee for the witness borne to the truth by Thy servants in the past. Our hearts are stirred as we recall the fearless and inspiring labors of apostles and saints in behalf of the gospel of our Lord. We thank Thee that today the story is preached in all the lands, and that the nations are lifting up their eyes and hands to Thee. Make the services of Thy house a comfort to our souls and a message of warning and hope to all who hear. And may our love for Thy sanctuary, the place where Thine honor dwelleth, make the day a blessing to us, in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

MONDAY, APRIL 25.

Theme for the Day—Delight in nature as the work of God.

Scripture—Jehovah possessed me when he marked out the foundations of the earth; then I was by him . . . and I was daily his delight, rejoicing always before him, rejoicing in his habitable earth; and my delight was with the sons of men.—Prov. 28:30, 31.

The earth is all before me. With a heart
Joyous, nor scared at its own liberty,
I look about; and should the chosen guide
Be nothing better than a wandering cloud,
I cannot miss my way.
—Wordsworth ("The Prelude").

Prayer—Our Father, we are like little children who know not anything until we are instructed by Thee. Thou hast sent us many teachers. Nature, the seasons, the living things about us, and the voices of the past, all speak of Thee. We love the good and glorious world in which Thou hast set us. In it Thou hast shown us the wonders of Thy creative power, and Thine own love of beauty. In the joy that comes from such reminders, we seek to make ourselves more worthy of Thy gifts and of Thy presence day by day. Amen.

TUESDAY, APRIL 26.

Theme for the Day—The heroism of standing unmoved.

Scripture—For in your faith ye stand fast.—II. Cor. 1:24.

Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit ye like men, be strong.— I. Cor. 16:13.

O power to do, O baffled will,
O prayer and action! ye are one.
Who may not strive may yet fulfil
The harder task of standing still,
And good but wished with God is done.
—John G. Whittier ("The Waiting").

Prayer—Dear Father of our spirits, we look to Thee with praise for Thine abundant blessings to us. This day renews our debt of gratitude to Thee. May the mercies Thou sendest us make us more than ever thoughtful of Thy purpose for us, and eager to bear such fruit in character and conduct as shall meet Thy approval. We would not shirk any duty. We would be faithful to every trust. May our courage rise in the presence of danger, and at the thought of Thy assistance. Hold us at our post of duty, we beseech Thee, with unwavering courage, and give us the victory at last, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

WEDNESDAY. APRIL 27.

Theme for the Day—The delight of spring.

Scripture—For, lo, the winter is past; the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth; the time for the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle-dove is heard in the land.—Song of Songs 2:11, 12.

Gentle Spring! in sunshine clad,
Well dost thou thy power display!
For winter maketh the light heart sad,
And thou, thou makest the sad heart gay:
He sees thee, and calls to his gloomy train—
The sleet, and the snow, and the wind, and the rain;
And they shrink away, and they flee in fear,
When thy merry step draws near.
—Longfellow ("Spring").

Prayer—Our Father, we are increasingly grateful for Thy gifts. Thou hast sent us the springtime with its flowers and singing birds. Thou hast given us the companionship of those whose souls are knit with ours, and whose love is the joy of every day. In these mercies of Thine, the loveliness of nature, and the happiness of our homes, may we not forget Thee, but learn a deeper sense of obligation and praise. May this day remind us of all our wealth of possession, and may it increase our gratitude and devotion. For Christ's sake. Amen.

THURSDAY, APRIL 28.

Theme for the Day—Repentance and tears.

Scripture—And the Lord turned and looked upon Peter. And Peter remembered the word of the Lord, how that he said unto him, Before the cock crow this day, thou shalt deny me thrice. And he went out and wept bitterly.—Luke 22:61, 62.

That God would move
And strike the hard, hard rock, and thence,
Sweet in their utmost bitterness,
Would issue tears of penitence.
—Tennyson ("Supposed Confessions").

Prayer—Holy Father, our days are ever shadowed by our sense of sin. We have left undone the things we ought to have done, and we have done the things that we ought not, and we are ashamed of our ill-desert. We cannot undo the past, but we can find the solace of deep and sincere repentance, and by Thy grace can set our lives in new pathways, and thus find the joy of forgiveness. Forgive our sins, we pray Thee, even as we forgive those who have wronged us. And may the sorrow of penitence yield to the happiness of pardon and Thy divine power, we ask in the name of the Redeemer. Amen.

FRIDAY, APRIL 29.

Theme for the Day—The Love of Christ.

Scripture—And he said unto him, Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee.—John 21:17.

The love of Christ constraineth us.—II. Cor. :14.

Christ of Judea, look thou in my heart!
Do I not love thee, look to thee, in thee
Alone have faith of all the sons of men—
Faith deepening with the weight and woe of years.
Pure soul and tenderest of all that came Into this world of sorrow, hear my prayer.
—Richard Watson Gilder ("Credo").

Prayer—Good Master, what shall we do that we may obtain eternal life? We find ourselves weak and insufficient amid the pressure of the world. Our ideals seem to slip away from us, and our evil shadows follow ever after us. But in loving Thee, Thou great Lover of us all, we find ourselves inspired again to holy things, and we take comfort in the midst of our incompleteness. Lord Christ we love Thee; help Thou our imperfect love. Hold Thou our hand in Thine own and lead us to the Father's presence, for our prayer is in Thy name. Amen.

SATURDAY, APRIL 30.

Theme for the Day—One day at a time.

Scripture—Be not therefore anxious for the morrow; for the morrow will be anxious for itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.— Matt. 6:34.

Except one be born anew, he cannot see the kingdom.—John 3:3.

And be not fashioned according to this world; but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is the good and acceptable and perfect will of God.—Rom. 12:2.

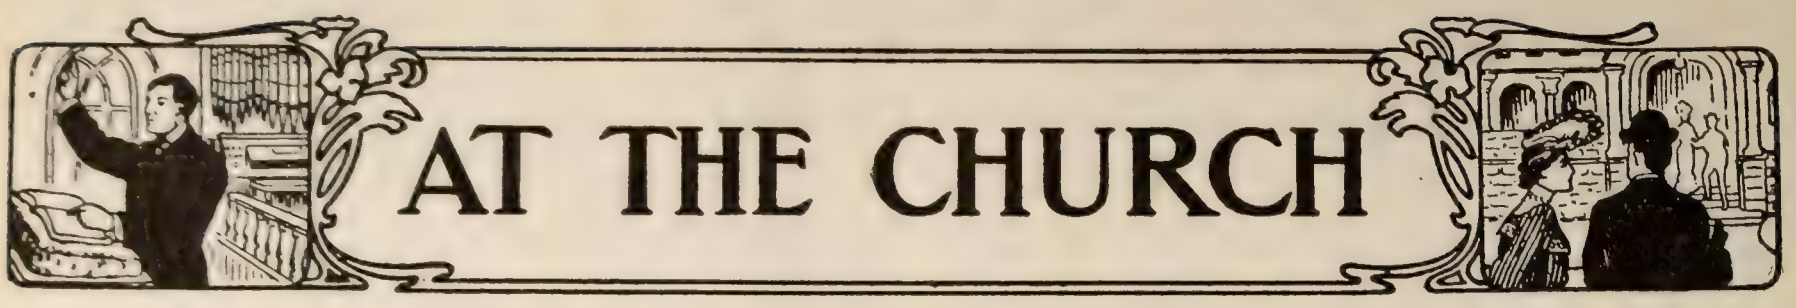
If thou wouldst live unruffled by care,
Let not the past torment thee e'er;
If any loss thou hast to rue,
Act as though thou wert born anew;
Inquire the meaning of each day,
What each day means itself will say.
—Matthew Arnold ("Rule of Life").

Prayer—O Lord, our Lord, how excellent is Thy name in all the earth. Day unto day uttereth speech of Thee, and night unto night showeth Thy knowledge. In Thy greatness and our nearness to Thee help us to find our truest comfort, our sense of security, and our best incentive to holy living. We thank Thee for the week through which Thou hast brought us in safety. May all our times be in Thy hand until we are called by Thee to nobled service in a world without end. Amen.

The Blessed Road

By Charles Buxton.

Three roads led out to Calvary.
The first was broad and straight,
That Pilate and great Caiaphas
Might ride thereon in state.



The second was the felon's road,
Cruel and hard to tread
For those who bore the cross's load,
For those whose footsteps bled.

The third road slunk through mean defiles,
Fearing the open sky;
And Judas crept the dreadful miles
To Calvary thereby.

The highroad up to Calvary
Was blotted from the land;
Where Judas hid, the jackal cries
By thorn-cursed drifts of sand.

But that poor road the felons went—
How fair it now appears,
Smoothed wide by myriads penitent
And flower-set by their tears!

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

Form and Substance*

Perhaps no incident in the life of Jesus illustrates more admirably than those of the present lesson his intense interest in the substance of religion, and his indifference to the mere forms with which it clothes itself. He never willingly slighted those duties which were prescribed by the law of the fathers and the customs of the age. At the same time he held himself free to disregard the letter of the traditional law in his care to preserve its spirit.

Later Judaism emphasized the observance of the Sabbath to a degree which made the fourth commandment really the most important in the law. The Sabbath day was the final period of the week, corresponding to our Saturday. Its observance among the Hebrews grew out of Babylonian customs, and was a part of their race inheritance. All through their earlier history it was held more or less lightly, in spite of its place in the Ten Commandments. Indeed the prophets of the exile attributed the misfortunes of the nation to their neglect of this principle of the Sabbath day rest.

Sabbath-Breaking.

During the period of the revival of Judah after the exile increasing emphasis was placed upon the observance of the Sabbath. It became easily the most important of the Commandments. Not content with the simple form of the law relating to the day, the scribes devised elaborate definitions with which to hedge about this sacred time, and prescribed thirty-nine different kinds of work which must not be undertaken upon the seventh day. Probably no institution was given as much attention as the Sabbath. Perhaps the conscience of the orthodox Jew was more sensitive on this point than on any other included in the ritual of his religion. For this reason the Scribes and Pharisees were quite sure that they would have the people on their side if they could find something in Jesus' conduct regarding the Sabbath which they might criticize. The simple and unpremeditated act of the disciples in plucking the grain from the ripe fields as they came along in the early Sabbath morning gave them exactly the excuse they wanted.

Is it not a significant commentary on the simplicity and poverty of Jesus and his friends that on this occasion at least they were dependent on the plucking of the grain to provide themselves with the morning meal? Perhaps Jesus did not notice their action, or perhaps he had even advised them to satisfy their hunger in this natural way. To him the Sabbath was not a master but a servant, offering an opportunity for rest and religious culture. But to conceive it as a master standing with uplifted whip above the head of the trembling worshipper to goad him into obedience was an unspeakable affront in Jesus' mind to the whole law of righteousness.

David at Nob.

When, therefore, the scribes raised their clamorous objection to the action of the disciples Jesus defended that action with vigor, saying that the entire principle of righteousness which the law represented demanded freedom and inspired whole-hearted devotion to the essentially great things of religion. He referred to the fact that in David's time he as a refugee had come to the tabernacle at Nob breathless, weaponless and hungry, to beg of the priest the loaves of bread which had just been taken from the table in the sanctuary. And the priest, interpreting the rules of the holy place not in the small and superficial sense of the scribes but in the large interests of humanity, had freely given him what he asked. That showed that holy things such as the show-bread might well be devoted to common usage without sin, especially when human need made the occasion. But even the holy day itself was not to be regarded as a time when no labor was permissible. The priests performed a multitude of duties in the sacred place on the Sabbath day. Indeed, the work of the sanctuary was heavier on that day than on any other. It was unthinkable, therefore, that a rule forbidding work on the sacred day was to be construed in this trivial and needless manner.

And then Jesus quoted that great word from Hosea, the prophet of the past, "I desire mercy and not sacrifice" (Hosea 6:6), as one of his own favorite words from the great body of Hebrew scripture. It so admirably illustrated his own views of religion in the contrast which it made between principles and rites, between moral obligations and ceremony, that Jesus had occasion more than once to refer to it in words of high appreciation.

The Withered Hand.

Apparently it was the same day that gave another illustration of Jesus' view of the Sabbath. He was in the synagogue according to his custom when he saw a man with a shrunken hand. He knew that if he healed the man without justifying his conduct he would be instantly accused again of Sabbath-breaking. Probably the Jewish leaders suspected that Jesus would use the occasion to heal the unfortunate man. They knew that this act would increase his influence and popularity, and they wished to avoid such results at all hazards. They therefore sought to prevent his action in the matter by raising the question whether or not it was right to perform a work like that of healing on the Sabbath day.

Jesus in response put to them a question which searched out their own natural attitude toward a work of necessity as contrasted with ceremony. Any one of them would have counted it permissible to rescue a sheep or an ox from danger, no matter whether it was the Sabbath or another day. Certainly the value of a man was greater than that of a beast. Why should Jesus hesitate to heal the afflicted man, even though it was the day of rest? We can well believe that Jesus' indignation was roused by the attempt to put a small legalism in the way of his kindly service to humanity. He could neither understand nor tolerate such smallness of spirit.

The Power of Jesus.

Then he bade the afflicted man stretch out his hand. The order seemed impossible of obedience. Probably the man had not used his arm for years. Yet it was the very command that was needed to arouse in him powers of which he was unaware. Perhaps this was all his case required. Whether the cure lay in the arousal of the man's effort by the sharp and compelling words of Christ, or whether some other power was required, the result was the same. The man lifted his hand in obedience to Jesus' words, and it was restored. Had he doubted the possibility of such obedience his hand would have remained helpless and useless. It was his faith in the words of Jesus that brought him his new blessing.

The rulers were indignant beyond words that their authority and opinion were thus disregarded. It seemed unthinkable that this young peasant from Nazareth should ignore their views and attract to himself the public interest of which they were so covetous. With their view of the strict character of Sabbath observance, as it had been developed through generations of scribal activity, they could not conceive how kindness, justice, mercy and love had any such value as correctness of ritual conduct. In this very chasm between Jesus and the scribes lies the chief distinction between Christianity and Judaism. The one is a religion of the spirit, putting its emphasis upon the qualities which Jesus himself illustrated in his life. The other was a system of rules, which implied that God was as much interested in the length of fringes and the manner of washings as he was in the largest interests of humanity. The one was a religion of life, the other of law.

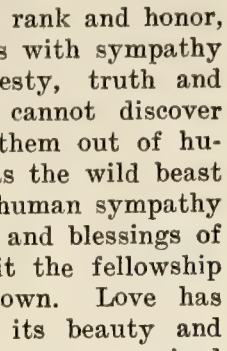
Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

Topic May 1: Christ Our King. (Consecration Meeting) John 18:33-40.



Simply because we as Christians are not subject to any ecclesiastical authority, we must not make the mistake of assuming that we are free from all restraint. While we rejoice that we are not the slaves of a despot, we must not rush to the other extreme and become anarchists. So far as the soul-life is concerned it matters little whether it be starved and shriveled by the iron heel of oppression, or consumed in the flames of riotous living. Simply because there is no priest whose frown of disapproval can send the soul to eternal perdition, it does not follow that the spiritual laws of our being can be violated and the consequences escaped, any more than we can thrust our hands into a caldron of molten metal and escape pain.

It is this life of the soul of which Jesus is king. That is why he said my kingdom is not of this world. It was not to be bounded by Judea, nor by Syria, nor by any portion of the earth's surface. He teaches men the value of their own souls and how to develop them. How to live so that the soul of man, that which makes him man and more than animal, may be the real life which he lives. He dwells in the heart and makes clean. He rules from within. He is lord of the conscience. We submit to him because that is the right way, and he has shown us this way because it is right. He "bears witness unto the truth." And every one that loves the truth seeks to live in harmony with the truth will hear him.

How glorious is his realm, and how indispensable it is to our human lives. He has to do with qualities of soul. He does not ask about houses and lands, rank and honor, power and dominion. His is with sympathy and love, justice and honesty, truth and righteousness. These you cannot discover with the senses, but take them out of human life and men become as the wild beast of the jungle. It is out of human sympathy that the joys and pleasures and blessings of friendship come. But for it the fellowship of society would be unknown. Love has reared the home with all its beauty and tenderness. In it human lives are conceived and nurtured. Here the soul is kept clean and enriched. Love has sent the good Samaritan out on its mission of mercy, whence our hospitals, our schools, our asylums, our charities and benevolences. Again he bids us not to forget justice and honesty. These are the foundation stones of all our civic and commercial life. But for the fact that men can rely upon the words and promises of one another the entire machinery of our government would be wrecked. It is by coöperation and progress that laws are enacted; men's relations and obligations are judged, and laws enforced. But for this all commerce would cease, transportation could not be carried on and even communication beyond personal conversation would be impossible. Without them the very existence of our lives would be threatened. He calls men to righteousness and to God. He seeks to have the soul be true to itself and thus to come into perfect harmony with God. He would bring us into the true life and leave us in tune with the Infinite. While we here may be subjects of earthly kings and the servant of earthly lords, Jesus is "King of kings and Lord of lords."

Peter Ainslie

The Central Church of Christ has enjoyed the rare privilege of having Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, Md., in special meetings for three weeks. It is with no vain pride, but with a sense of peculiar favor that we recall his stay among us. A pastor of a great church and with brotherhood interests resting deeply upon his heart, this year it seemed more than we could reasonably expect that he could spend so much time with us. But Brother Ainslie dignifies his work by giving the task in hand his undivided attention. His days here were more like the walks and talks and conference of Jesus one pictures than anything we have seen. From early morning until late at night men and women sought his spiritual advice. With a most patient ear and delicate concern for the almost insignificant detail of personal problems, he touched life very deeply. His messages were largely to Christians. He feels this is the present greatest need. Consequently the crowds were not large, except on Sundays. But those who came were the hope of the church. Night after night this "man with God in his face" searched the hearts of his audience with spiritual intuition. His themes were largely devotional in nature. He preached on "Prayer," "The Comforter," "Personal Experience," "The Second Coming of Jesus," "Called to be Saints" and similar subjects. Afternoon meetings were held the last week, which were largely attended. Fit to be a bishop, Brother Ainslie moves through the church life with unobtrusive yet careful eye. Solicitous about the mission of the Disciples of Christ he is concerned that we bear the truth in love and with grace to the religious world about us. With largest charity to all workers he yet speaks his convictions with an unction born out of the motive to do good. The personal equation is eliminated. He is eminently fitted to bear the plea we make to the religious world as fraternal delegate.

PETER AINSLIE.

Personally, Brother Ainslie is preëminently a man of prayer. With the faith of a little child, he has the courage of one who has seen God's face and therefore fears not the face of man. Endowed with all natural elements of leadership, he is yet the most congenial fellow-worker. A student himself and of wide experience of men and books, he wears none of these as an adornment. The man is ever larger than his experiences. Indeed, one might say that instead of preaching his experiences (which a lesser man would do) he preaches out of experiences.

His stay was all too brief and is remembered now as one would recall "some sweet song." He made it easier for men to pray. Hundreds of our people caught a new view of personal holiness. "To have transactions with God" is no longer a privilege of mystics to our membership.

Would that the brotherhood could claim him as a bishop! But since we will have none of titles it would be of immeasurable gain if he might be called to give himself constantly to "missions" to be conducted in all our larger churches. The Disciples of Christ need his spirit. With natural charm of speech and manner, with quiet dignity and spiritual grace he honors any occasion and imparts "the benediction that follows after prayer." The brotherhood has honored itself in choosing Brother Ainslie as president of the American Christian Missionary Society.

When Is Virtue Safe?

John Ray Ewers.

"No virtue is safe which is not enthusiastic"—Seeley. Nothing great is ever accomplished without enthusiasm although mere enthusiasm is not a sign of greatness. There is frequently zeal without knowledge. On the other hand blase inanity is not a sign of profundity. Enthusiasm in a noble cause is commendable. More than that it is essential.

Manliness, in ancient Rome, we are told was called "Virtus" courage. With us the term is broadened and stands for all the strong, ethical excellencies. Honesty, industry, purity, generosity, as well as bravery, spell virtue today.

Virtue is hard to maintain. A thousand subtle enemies seek its overthrow. Judas always lies in wait to betray. The unguarded soul becomes the target for the arrows of the evil one. Temptations, like the hammers of Thor, pound at the walls. Siren voices lure the innocent.

"My soul be on thy guard,
Ten thousand foes arise;
The hosts of sin are pressing hard
To draw thee from the skies."

Is a man honest? He sees the crafty gaining wealth, and to him comes the devil in a livery of gold and purple, offering him the world if he will but fall down and worship. In that moment the wise man hears the Savior's voice whispering, "What shall it profit thee if thou gainest this world and loosest the next?"

Is a man industrious? To him comes the prince of this world telling him of those who live without labor, who substitute deceit for worth. Happy is such a man if he remembers Ruskin's words, "To draw hard breath over chisel, spade or plow and after toil, to read, meditate and pray."

Is a man pure? To him comes the adversary with all his subtle wiles, waiting for his leisure hours and beguiling him with dreamy music and languid sighs and seeming love. Blessed is the man who in such an hour steels himself with Paul's idea of self-mastery.

Is a man generous? To him come the imps of unappreciation, extravagance, misappropriation, delayed dividends, doubtful values, until it is again easier to withhold than to give. Happy is he who at this moment of vanishing virtue hears our Lord exclaim, "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

Is a man brave? Then is he one among ten thousand, for he is indeed rare, who is king in his own right, and who bows and scrapes to none. To be brave and free, ah, that is to be a man. But to him comes the inhabitant of hell offering the bribes of cowardice, bribes of lavish wealth and seeming proud position. Blessed is he if in the last fearful moment of trial comes the vision of Socrates, loving only happiness, truth and morality, and dying in rugged strength to gain an everlasting crown.

Let no man say that virtue is not assailed, but it need not be overthrown. Good is stronger than bad, and the stars fight for righteousness. Nevertheless, to maintain virtue one must be clothed in steel and have his heart pure. How shall virtue be kept? "No virtue is safe which is not enthusiastic." You must believe that honesty is grand, that industry is noble, that purity is supremely worthful, that generosity, bravery and all the train of virtues are godlike. "Live with a vengeance, die with a snap" as Robert Speer says, and believe in the value of the virtues with all your happy heart.

When the honest man is approached by the grafter let him cry out, "Oh, I would not lose my sense of honor for a thousand worlds. I love intergrity above rubies." When the industrious man sees his brother of the lazy-ease lolling in the lap of luxury let him exclaim, "You may have your ease, I would not trade the satisfaction of my work for all your soft delights." When the pure man trembles on the brink of indulgence let him shout until the mountains ring with his virile voice, "Away with you, I would not sacrifice my self-respect for all the nerve-thrills this earth can offer."

When the generous man feels the sordid touch of the lucre fiend, let him say as he rises in his might, "Oh, there is no joy beneath the skies that equals the joy of giving to a worthy cause. I glory in generosity."

And when the brave man sees the sun go behind the clouds, and all the flimsy ghosts of fears flap about his ears, swinging his good sword until the air shivers, let him sing into the mists, "Oh, I would not barter my chivalrous soul for all the wealth and fame of a thousand kingdoms, sweeter than honey, dearer than love is courage to my soul."

He who holds his virtue in doubt as to its worth, he who is but luke-warm in its possession, will fall an easy victim to overwhelming temptation. Such temptation waits for all. Hold your virtue with enthusiasm, my brother, if you would not have it wrenched from your grasp. I think you will agree with me that self-respect and self-control are worthful. Then with zest possess your treasures and allow no devil to despoil you.

Friendship and Fellowship with God

A Sermon

By Dr. G. Campbell Morgan

"Our fellowship is with the Father, and with His Son Jesus Christ."—1 John 1-3.

The great word of this passage, which at once arrests our attention, is the word "fellowship." While not exclusively so, it is peculiarly the word of John. It is an interesting fact, which some of you have doubtless noticed, that in these three letters John never speaks of Jesus as Lord, and never speaks of the disciples of Jesus—believers in him—as servants. I do not mean to suggest that John forgets the relationship which he and his fellow-disciples bore to Jesus and his bond-servants; that John ever forgets the supremacy and sovereignty of Christ, that he was, indeed, the Lord; but it is an interesting fact that he does not speak of him as Lord. These are peculiarly the letters of a close and intimate, and personal friendship with Jesus.

An Illuminating Word.

This word "fellowship," therefore, is an illuminating word concerning our friendship with God and our friendship with Christ; our friendship with God through Christ. The word thrills for us, with all the deepest, and the sublimest, and the tenderest things of our relationship to Christ, and in him to God. It is a rich and spacious word, full of suggestiveness, almost impossible of full and final translation. That is borne out by this fact; the word which is here translated "fellowship" is translated in many ways in the New Testament—fellowship, contribution, distribution, communication, communion. Or if we turn from this actual word, which is an abstract noun, to the common noun, it is translated partakers, partners, companions. I believe that all these are needed in our language if we are to have any idea of the richness of this one great word; the word which is descriptive of the great and gracious fact of our friendship with God and with Jesus Christ. I shall, therefore, select from these different words two, which mark two phases of the one great fact. I will take that rich word of the church "communion"—fellowship is communion—and I will take one of those common nouns, rendering it in its abstract fashion, and say the word means partnership. Why make the difference, for they signify the name thing? Because in our use of these words we use them in different relations. We use the word communion in the realm of friendship; we use the word partnership in the realm of business; and for that reason I select these two words, because by so doing we shall come to a better understanding of what this fellowship with God means. Let us first dwell on our fellowship with God as communion; our fellowship with God as friendship.

Three Illustrations.

I will take three simple illustrations of what friendship is on the earthly level, in order that we may climb to the higher height, and understand what is meant by our fellowship, our friendship, with God.

"Oh, the comfort, the inexpressible comfort, of feeling safe with a person: having neither to weigh thoughts nor measure words, but pour them all right out just as they are, chaff and grain together, knowing that a faithful hand will take and sift them keep what is worth keeping, and with the breath of kindness blow the rest away."

Is not that a perfect description of friendship? How many people are there one can talk to like that? How many people are there in company with whom you can pour out everything in your heart, say everything, say anything? Very, very few; for God does not give us many friends in this world; many acquaintances, and we value them all. But that is a perfect description of friendship. With your friend you think aloud, there is no restraint; there is no need to keep up an appearance. That is friendship on the human level. And it describes what true friendship with God is—that is on my side of the fellowship. With God it is my privilege to pour out everything that is in my heart, chaff and grain together, saying anything, saying everything I am thinking. But have we learned that lesson? Do not we altogether too often think our conversation with God must be that of carefully prepared and often stilted phrasing? I think we never so grieve his heart as when we attempt to speak thus with him. Converse with God reaches its highest level when, alone with him, I pour out in his listening ear everything in my heart; and the manner in which I have learned that secret, and live in the power of it, is the measure of the joy and strength of my friendship with God.

Quotes Goethe.

Or take another illustration. Goethe speaking of his friendship for one with whom he held converse, said this:

"For the first time I carried on a conversation; for the first time was the inmost sense of my words returned to me more rich, more full, more comprehensive from another mouth. What I had been groping for was returned clear to me. What I had been thinking I have been taught to see."

Is not that even a more subtle and delicate definition of friendship? Not only can I pour out all the things in my heart; but my friend will say yes, and repeat the thing I have said, and repeat it definitely better than I could ever have hoped to say it.

Here again is the revelation of what friendship with God means to those who know and practice it; and even though this may be a more delicate and wonderful definition, I think we all understand it perhaps a little better, for there have been moments when we have struggled to say things to God, and have heard him saying them again to us better than we could have said them. Is not that what Paul meant when he said: "We know not what to pray for as we ought?" Is not that the supreme inspiration for high and prevailing prayer—the consciousness of inability to make prevailing prayer? But Paul added: "The spirit maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered," that is, he says the things for us, and we know that God is praying prayers we fain would pray, and answering our imperfect articulation with the perfect words that prove his perfect comprehension.

Dryden's Picture.

Or once again, Dryden, describing his friendship for his truest friend, said:

"We were so mixed up as meeting streams, both to ourselves were lost. We were one mass. We could not give or take but for the same, for he was I, I he."

What is that but Dryden's method of declaring that he and his friend had all things in common? And dare we take that last God? Without a doubt. Here we touch the real meaning of fellowship; here we are at the heart and center of the great idea.

Let us now consider the other aspect of fellowship as partnership; mutual interests, mutual devotion, mutual activity.

Fellowship with God means mutual interests: God interested in me, and I interested in God. The overwhelming sense of the heart, as these things are uttered, is that of the inequality of the friendship. That I may be interested in God is understandable; the infinite marvel at first sight is that God can be interested in me. "What is man that thou art mindful of him? Or the son of man that thou visited him?" Fellowship with God means that God is interested in my being, in all its parts; in my spiritual life, in my mental ability, in my physical need. Be not anxious about what you shall eat, or drink, or put on, for your heavenly Father knoweth you have need of these things.

Now, would to God, brethren, I knew how to say this thing as it ought to be said. Presently the evening service will be over and the day of worship and rest done, and most of you will be back in the midst of all the everyday things we speak of as the daily task, the common round. But fellowship means that God is as profoundly interested in a man on Monday in his office and store as when in the sanctuary; that there is no part of the life in which God is not interested. I only pause for lack of words to express a thing so sublime and yet so simple. The difficulty in business, the perplexity that burdens the mind—all these things he is interested in. God is interested in me, and in my development.

Partnership.

Partnership also means mutual devotion. God's resources are all at my disposal. And now I must speak, I fear, in the language that indicates duty—my resources ought all to be at his disposal. His resources are all at my disposal; his knowledge, his wisdom, his power, are all at my disposal. How small a demand we make of him! How often we settle down in our own wisdom and neglect asking for aught, while he is waiting to give! How constantly we dishonor him because we do not appropriate all he has put at our disposal. All his resources at our disposal!

But we have responded to the other fact that all our resources are to be at his disposal? All of them, not a tithe, not a tenth. Oh! tithe your possessions if you will, but let your tithing be the evidence that the nine-tenths are also his. The man who takes his income and says, one-tenth is God's and nine-tenths are mine, is a bad Jew, and certainly not a good Christian. All belongs to Jehovah, just as the one day in seven is the symbol of the fact that the seven days belong to him. All our resources at his disposal. That is the law of friendship, and if he put all his at my disposal, and I keep back part of the price, how unworthy I am of this great fact of fellowship with God.

Mutual Activity.

But partnership means also mutual activity. God accommodating himself to my weakness and I rising by that accommodation into co-operation with his mind and with his strength. Of these two things, the one to emphasize is that of God bringing

The Texas papers are keeping before their readers the meeting of the state convention in Dallas, May 9-12. Many questions of great import to the work in the Lone Star State are to be proposed at this meeting.

The church at Steubenville, Ohio, employs a secretary, Miss Lambert, who assists the treasurer, keeps careful records for the church, and makes calls at direction of the pastor.

This is business in the church and will repay.

Charles E. Smith has been succeeded at the First Church, Marion, Ohio, by W. H. Oldham. He was called without any preching visit, simply on his record as a Christian and a preacher, and made a fine impression on all.

Gerald Culbertson, pastor of the Third Church, Richmond, Va., preached at the Seventh Church on a recent Sunday morning. H. D. C. Maclachlan had an engagement for an address at the state university of Virginia on that date.

Professor B. S. Dean, Hiram College, preached in the Central, Warren, Ohio, church, both morning and evening, April 3. The pulpit supply committee of this church is working carefully in the selection of a successor to J. E. Lynn.

Arthur K. Brooks, the younger of the Brooks brothers, evangelists, died at Little Rock, Arkansas, where he had but recently become pastor. The cause of the death was diphtheria. Mr. Brooks has accomplished a good work.

W. B. Craig, minister of the Lenox Avenue Church of the Disciples, New York, spoke on the following subjects at the morning and evening services of his church, "Blessed are They that Do," and "Live Men and Live Questions."

J. H. Craig, pastor at Logansport, attended the Laymen's Missionary conference in Indianapolis and expects to attend the great congress in Chicago in May. There have been thirty-one additions at Logansport since February 1.

The California State Sunday-school Association will convene in Oakland, April 19-21. Full particulars may be had in writing C. R. Fisher, 941 Phelan Building, San Francisco. Dr. R. P. Shepherd, of Southern California, is on the program to speak.

The first Sunday in May W. J. Lockhart and W. F. Lintt will begin an evanglistic meeting with the Union Ave. Church, St. Louis, Mo. This will be the first meeting held by a professional evangelist in this church.

The work at Elmira, Ore., under the lead of George R. Whipple is making good. Two confessions on Easter Sunday. Large crowds constantly. They expect Evangelist C. E. Williams to begin a meeting for them by the middle of May.

After a ministry of more than ten years, Mr. Hugh McLellan has resigned as pastor of the Christian Church at Richmond, Ky., to accept a call to San Antonio, Texas. Mr. McLellan is known as one of the most eloquent and successful ministers of Kentucky.

James Lane Allen has added another to his list of books, "A Brood of the Eagle." It has been but a year since there came from the pen of this author, "The Bride of the Mistletoe." Mr. Allen is a member of the class of '72 of Transylvania University.

Royal L. Handley, at one time assistant editor of The Christian Century, for the past two years pastor of the church at Waukegan, Ill., is studying at the University of Chicago, and will supply at Gurnee, Ill.

J. Harry Bullock, minister of the church at Footville, Wis., is pushing things vigorously. The Sunday school attendance has climbed to 150, and they adopted the motto: "All the church and as many more in the Bible school."

Thomas H. Popplewell receives new members into the church at Arkansas City, Kansas, almost every Sunday. The Junior Endeavor Society of this church has raised the money to make their superintendent, Miss McPherson, a life member of the C. W. B. M.

DR. PRICE'S

The Christian churches of Kansas City are moving to erect a $25,000 hospital in that city. This is another of the fine things being carried out by the churches of greater Kansas City, where there are 11,000 Disciples, and 100,000 within a radius of 100 miles.

V. W. Blair of the Payne Ave. Church, North Tonawanda, N. Y., is preaching a series of sermons on "The Christian and His Money." His subjects are: "Our Stewardship," "The Grace and Glory of Giving," "Systematic and Proportionate Giving," "Tithing."

Daniel Protoff, who has been made minister to the Russians of Chicago under direction of the C. C. M. S., spoke recently in the Evanston Church. Mr. Protoff has suffered as a prisoner for the Protestant faith and has a thrilling life story to tell.

Beginning June 1 G. D. Edwards who has been acting financial agent for the Bible College, Columbia, Mo., will give a year to study to better prepare himself for teaching in the college. In the past two and one-half years Mr. Edwards has raised for the Bible College $120,524.

The First Church, Oklahoma City, has arranged for the sale of its property for $72,000, and will start to work at once on a new structure to cost $100,000. This church has grown with the growth of the city until it now numbers 1,200 members.

On a recent Sunday, O. F. Jordan, Evanston, preached the following sermons, morning and evening, respectively, "Faith and Ideals of the Disciples," "What Shall We Believe About Hell?" Some readers of the Christian Century are curious to know what the preacher said on the latter subject.

Allen Wilson is now in his second meeting with the First Church, Atlanta, Ga. There have been 311 additions to this church in the past two years. In the meeting one year ago there were 110 additions. In the present meeting fifty accessions in the first two weeks.

The First Church, Springfield, Ill., held a special service Sunday, April 17, in honor of the two hundred members who came into the church just a year ago, at the close of the Sunday revival. These members were given reserved seats in the middle of the church.

G. W. Muckley, I. N. McCash and S. J. Corey have delighted church and college with their presence within recent months. Chas. Stelzle gave a great series of lectures the first of the month at Eureka college. There There were about 150 men present at an annual luncheon, November 28.

A St. Louis paper states that B. A. Abbott of the Harlem Ave. Church, Baltimore, has accepted the call extended him by the Union Ave. Church, St. Louis. This call came to Mr. Abbott unsolicited and as a testimony of the esteem in which he is held throughout the brotherhood.

The ladies of the church at Vollmer, Idaho, are to erect a $1,200 parsonage, the money for this needed improvement having been raised by them during the past few months. The parsonage is a very necessary feature for any church. It gives a permanency and dignity to the work that is always needed.

The Sunday-school is "in the eye" of the churches. Attendance is increasing everywhere. But now is just the time of year to make plans for the teaching work of next year—the choice of a curriculuum, the selection of lesson helps. Many of the best churches are planning to use the Bethany Graded Lessons.

Arthur Holmes of Philadelphia was recently in St. Thomas, Ont., as the guest of the Canadian Club and the Business Men's Bible Class of which F. W. Norton is teacher. He spoke at banquets given by each of these organizations. About 100 men were at each banquet. Dr. Holmes was enthusiastically received.

R. A. Long, president of the Long-Bell Lumber Company, left Kansas City the early part of this week for a European tour. He will take with him his wife and daughter and two of his nieces. It is his purpose to take in Edinburgh and the Great World's Conference to be held there June 14-23.

R. E. L. Prunty, now of LaBelle, Mo., tells of the progress of the work at Knox City Church, which is preparing for a revival to be held in February. At LaBelle the Sunday school now numbers 120 and the C. E.

125, and there have been forty-nine accessions to the church since Mr. Prunty began work there last December.

The Jefferson St. Church, Buffalo, was thrilled Sunday evening, April 10, with the announcement that the Kehr street mission had succeeded in raising the funds for the new building, which will be commenced at once. This work has prospered greatly under the efficient ministry of Roy Deadman. It will soon become a separate congregation.

The little congregation of Disciples in Whiting, Ind., dedicated a new house of worship April 10. C. J. Sharpe, pastor at Hammond, had charge of the money raising and secured the $1,935 needed in fifty minutes. Austin Hunter, pastor Jackson Boulevard Church, Chicago, preached the dedicatory sermon. In the evening Mrs. Nelson Trimble, Chicago, began a meeting in the church.

The first annual banquet given by the ladies of University Place Christian Church, Seattle, Wash., on the evening of March 14, was a success in every way. About 100 covers were laid in the beautiful dining room of the University Congregational Church, which had been tendered our minister for the occasion free of charge by Dr. Munn, the pastor.

The annual convention of the churches of the Third District, Missouri, will be held in Aurora May 2-5. Among the speakers are F. L. Moffett, Springfield; Joseph Gaylor, Springfield; Mrs. M. E. Harlan, Indianapolis; J. H. Jones, Ash Grove; Prof. J. R. Roberts, Springfield; George L. Peters, Springfield; W. F. Richardson, Kansas City; J. B. Hunley, Neosho, and Barclay Meador, Lebanon.

Joseph C. Todd, Bloomington, Ind., always awake and with power of initiative, is preaching an unusual series of Sunday evening sermons. The general subject is "Preachers and Preaching." Special subjects: "St. Paul as Pastor and Preacher," "The Ministry as a Life Work," "What the Minister Thinks About in His Study," "Problems of the Minister in the Modern Church," and "How Sermons Are Made."

The annual meeting of the church at Parsons, Kansas, was held April 1, 1910. Since January, 1909, 200 persons have taken membership with this congregation. The receipts of the year were $3,868.63 from the church; $732.04 C. W. B. M.; Young Ladies' Mission Circle, $23.30; Ladies' Aid, $712.59; Sunday school, $656.51, and Y. P. S. C. E., $135.55. Amount given to missions was $1,088.23. Average attendance at Sunday school was 302.

The First Church, Philadelphia, Pa., which has been without a pastor since L. Z. Batman went to Youngstown, Ohio, last fall, has called to its service L. E. Sellers, formerly of Terre Haute, Ind. Mr. Sellers has been engaged in evangelistic work for the past two years. This church has a fine body of people in its membership, but is facing the serious questions of the downtown church in the large city.

On April 1, Harry G. Hill, of the Third Christian Church, Indianapolis, Ind., was asked by the joint board to continue his work with that church, and the congregation unanimously concurred in the action of the board. Mr. Hill is beginning his fourth year with that church, and while the past three years have been good ones, both pastor and people anticipate better things in this fourth year, as they expect to be in their new home before the close of the year 1910, where they can do more efficient work.

The notice of the death of one of the most useful men among the Disciples of New York has just come to our office. Robert Christie, Jr., who with his father have long been honored members of the First Church, New York. Mr. Christie became a member of this church in 1884, and since 1893 has been a trustee. The church of which he was a member assembled in a called meeting to express their love and esteem for their fallen comrade, and adopted resolutions that must prove a source of consolation to all friends of Mr. Christie, among whom the editors of the Christian Century are glad to be numbered.

At the annual meeting of the trustees of the Bible College of Missouri, held recently, C. M. Sharpe, acting dean, was elected dean; G. D. Edwards was elected to the chair of Old Testament history, language and interpretation; A. W. Taylor to the chair of social service, religious education and missions. Prof. Edwards was granted a leave of absence for one year after June 1, for further qualifying himself for his work. The board put itself on record as opposed to the growing tendency among ministers to the use of tobacco. Truman E. Winter, who has been on the teaching force of the college, has been called to the pastorate of the church at Fulton, which he has accepted.

"The Christian," parish paper of the church at Uhrichsville, Ohio, tells an interesting story of growth at Nelsonville, where Charles Darsie, pastor at Uhrichsville, recently held a meeting. When W. S. Cook began at Nelsonville four years ago there were but 100 in the Sunday-school, and a poorly attended church service, and the church was divided. The first thing attempted was a new building costing $14,000. This is now paid for except $4,000. The average Sunday-school attendance last quarter was 800. In the four years 350 have been added to the membership of the church, making the present membership 565. This has been accomplished in a town that numbers only 7,000 inhabitants. These are dependent upon the coal mining in the Hocking Valley region.

The faculty of the Medical School of Drake University, have recommended that the work of the school be discontinued, but the board of trustees who have not so decided as yet, have been besieged by remonstrances by the people of Des Moines and Iowa. The Christian Century believes that the school has a place, and worthy work to do. The only other opportunity for Iowa's sons to receive medical training within their own state is at the State University. But this school because it is in a small town can never have the opportunities of hospitals as at Drake, in a city of 100,000. All Drake needs is money. The people of Des Moines regardless of church affiliation are helping to keep the school and to place it upon solid financial footing. Our readers may here exert a telling influence.

Houston, Texas, April 1.—Breeden-Lintt meeting closed. Twenty-five days, 101 additions. Breeden's second meeting. First meeting a year ago, 158. Offering for foreign missions this year will be $2,000.—A. F. Sanderson.

The First Christian Church of Laporte, Ind., was rededicated March 27. This was the culmination of extensive improvements. The church is now practically new, as the result of the consecrated effort of this noble little band of disciples, and gives them a delightful house of worship. The work was very ably and economically done, so much so that on the day of dedication there was only a very small indebtedness. This amount, and more, was raised with apparently no effort, and left the people in a splendid mood and happy over the services. The work of the church is in a splendid condition and the people are hopeful. Z. T. Sweeney, that prince of platform orators and preachers, was with us and gave us two most helpful and delightful discourses. J. J. Cole is the pastor there.

Follow the International Lesson Committee

Every informed Sunday-school worker desires to have the graded system introduced into his school. But it seems like too big an undertaking to grade the school all at once. Hence nothing at all is done, and the school goes on in the same old absurd way of teaching the children the lessons provided for grown-up people

The International S. S. Committee has made it possible to bring the graded system in, like the Kingdom of God comes, "without observation." You can have your school graded without any agony—almost without knowing it, except in its beneficent results. Begin at the bottom now—with the elementary grades, the pupils under twelve years old. Provide teachers and pupils with the Bethany Graded Lessons, based on the outlines already authorized by the International Committee. Later on—perhaps in nine month or a year from now—when the Committee authorizes an outline of lessons for the Intermediate grades you will be ready to adopt them and the Bethany Series will be ready with the helps for you. And so on, through the Senior and Advanced grades, follow the International Committee and as fast as they provide the lessons you will be ready to adopt them.

Our advice to all schools, then, is: FOLLOW THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE. No independent course yet devised is better than that provided by the International Committee, if indeed there is one so good in all respects. Besides, there is advantage in the whole Sunday-school world studying together when our leaders really lead—as the International Committee is now doing.

The Bethany Graded Lessons may be commenced at any time. Purchase the main bulk of your supplies wherever you wish, but let us furnish you these fascinating lessons for your pupils under twelve. THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO., 700 East Fortieth Street, Chicago.

A SKILLFUL RETREAT.

Things hadn't turned out too well with their love affair. The fatal word had just been spoken, and he was rejected. The rejected suitor stood respectfully before her, listening to her elaborate explanations of her decision. Below, the smooth waters of Oriental Bay rested in awesome wonder. "I trust I have made myself sufficiently plain," she said: "Well, I would scarcely go so far," he answered, as his courage gradually returned. "It's but fair to give nature the credit for that," he added as he retired in good order.—New Zealand Free Lance.

GETTING THE SAILOR VOTE.

It was a clever lawyer in a Boston court recently who took advantage of the nautical knowledge he possessed to work upon the mind of a juryman who did not seem to show much comprehension of a case of suing a street railway for damages.

The dull member was an old sailor, who, though doubtless very keen of perception along some lines, was, nevertheless, rather slow in his understanding of the points involved in the case being tried. The lawyer noticed this and made his strike with this particular man. Approaching the jury box he addressed himself to this one juryman and said:

"Mr. Juryman, I will tell you how it happened. The plaintiff was in command of the outward bound open car, and stood in her starboard channels. Along came the inward bound closed car and just as their bows met she jumped the track, sheered to port, and knocked the plaintiff off and ran over him."

The sailor was all attention after this version of the affair, and joined in a $5,000 verdict for the injured man.—Gloucester, Mass., Times.

FREE SUPPLIES FOR CHILDREN'S DAY

For Foreign Missions First Sunday In June

A normal child with even a good apple will give the other fellow a share

"Shall we whose souls are lighted
With wisdom from on high;
Shall we to souls benighted,
The Lamp of Life Deny?"

The Foreign Christian Missionary Society will furnish Children's Day supplies for the first Sunday in June Free to those Sunday-schools observing the day in the interest of Foreign Missions and sending an offering to the Foreign Society.

FREE SUPPLIES

1. "Into All the World." The beautiful new Children's Day Exercise by P. H. Duncan. Sixteen pages bright songs, recitations, and drills. It is a high-class exercise, yet simple enough for the smallest school.
2. "Lighthouse Missionary Boxes." These are new, attractive, self-locking boxes. Each box a lighthouse in four colors. Put your school to work with them.

Order Your Supplies at Once. Give local name of Sunday-school and average attendance.

STEPHEN J. COREY, Box 884, CINCINNATI, O

In order to meet the great demand for Sample Copies of the Bethany Graded Lessons the publishers have decided to send out Returnable samples of the complete line of supplies—Beginners', Primary and Junior—(excepting the large Beginners' pictures). Accompanying the samples a bill will be sent for $1.09, the regular price of the set. The recipient may do one of three things: (1) He may return the samples uninjured after examination. (2) He may remit $1.09 and keep the samples. Or (3) he may return the bill with his Sunday school's order for supplies and the publishers will mark it "paid." In writing for sample copies please say "Returnable."

Oklahoma Preachers

This is the last word before the meeting of the State Ministerial Institute at Norman from the 2d to the 4th of May. The committee has done its best to provide a program that will be both helpful and enjoyable. There are many good things in store for those who avail themselves of the opportunity. You ought to take advantage of this meeting for your own sake, for the sake of your work and for the sake of the other preachers of the state. The church at Norman wants the privilege of entetaining you. Brother Reed, the minister, will be disappointed if you are not there. The program committee have labored for your advantage. Your presence will be an inspiration to those who have prepared the addresses for the meeting and your participation will give zest and larger helpfulness to the various discussions. Be on hand. Be in the spirit to give and get help and be there from the first to the last.

Notes from the Foreign Society

Still gaining. The receipts of the Foreign Society for the first fourteen days of April amounted to $26,186.84, a gain over the corresponding fourteen days in 1909 of $6,417.21. The total gains of the year to April 14 amounted to $12,989.57. There must be a still larger gain than this if we reach $400,000 this year.

The missionaries in Japan express themselves as being greatly pleased with the visit of John L. Brandt to the mission stations. He impressed all that he was there "for the cause." He is a warm friend of the missionary force.

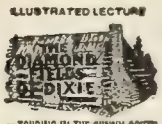
The Laymen's Convention at Peoria, Ill., greatly stirred the churches of that city. Our own Central Church and the Second Church have decided to raise at least $700 for foreign missions. W. F. Turner is our minister. The Second Church is only a few months old.

J. J. Evans, Sacramento, Cal., writes that the Sunday-school and church expect to become a living link in the Foreign Society on Children's Day. The church has been supporting a missionary through the C. W. B. M. The congregation was greatly stirred by the Laymen's Convention.

At the recent Laymen's Convention at Peoria, our own Professor H. T. Sutton of Eureka, Ill., gave a most remarkable address on "Missions, the Chief Work of the Church." It was pronounced by many the strongest and most unique missionary address they had ever heard. The address by M. B. Madden, Japan, and Dr. Paul Wakefield, China, missionaries of the Foreign Society, were said to be of the best of the convention.

Last week the Foreign Society received a gift of $600 on the Annuity Plan from an aged sister in Kentucky. This money goes toward enlarging the school property at Shanghai, China.

Friends of the foreign work will be glad to learn that $6,000 has been raised to buy additional property for our Shanghai school. This was greatly needed. The money had been promised for several years.



In the death of W. H. Cord, Mt. Sterling, Ky., the Foreign Society has lost a good friend.

In the death of Supreme Judge David J. Brewer of the Supreme Court of the United States, the cause of world-wide missions lost a helpful and distinguished friend. His parents were foreign missionaries at the time of his birth. He was born at Smyrna, Asia Minor, in 1837. He was active in the management of the American Board (Congregationalist) and often made addresses before great missionary gatherings.

Ex-Vice President Fairbanks, who has just returned from a circuit of the globe, testifies as follows to the work of foreign missions: "I wish to express my profound admiration—it goes beyond mere respect—for the workers in the great missionary fields. I have seen many at work. I have seen the rich abundant harvests they have gathered and are gathering. They are evangels of a new order of things. They are doing much to knit the people together and have earned their right to the gratitude of mankind for their noble self-sacrifice."

The High Street Sunday-school, Akron, Ohio, Frank Root, superintendent, hopes to raise $600 on Children's Day to support Miss Eva May Raw, Nankin, China. Her parents are members of that congregation.

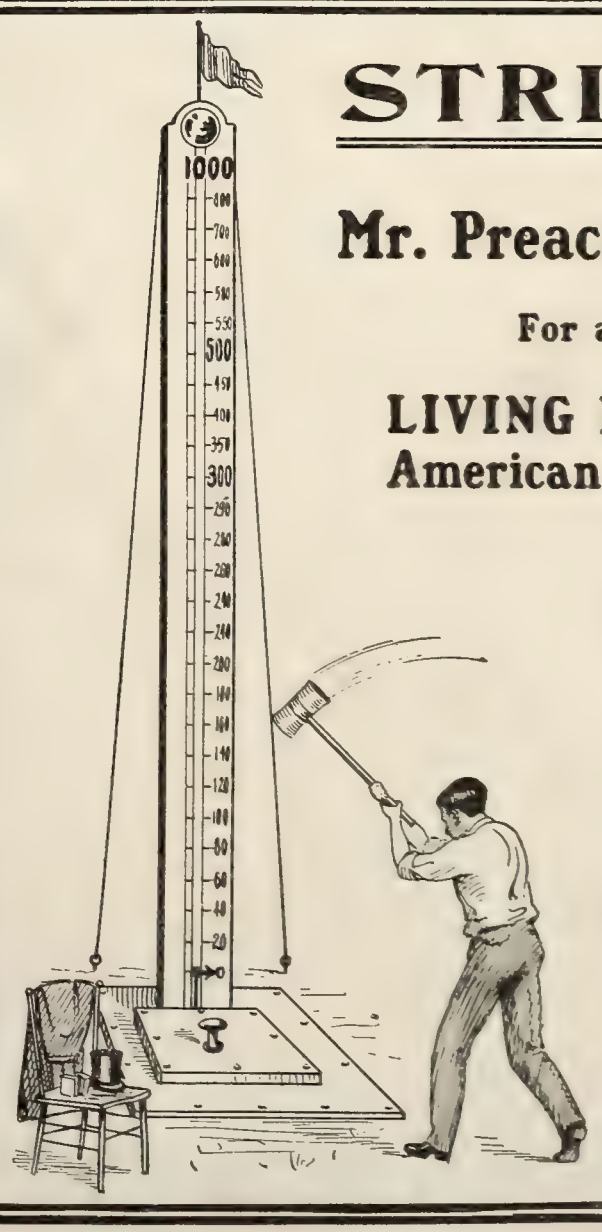
What Leaders Say of Living Links

"The Paris Church expects to continue to be a Living Link in the Home Field. We have given the Living Link a thorough trial. It works. The church can keep in touch with its workers, and will give more money and will give it more cheerfully than any other plan that I know of."—Carey E. Morgan, Paris, Ky.

"We like the Living Link Plan. We raise more money and raise it more easily for Home Missions upon this plan than upon any other which we have tried."—H. D. Smith, Hopkinsville, Ky.



"You may count on the abiding interest of Broadway Church in the work of Home Missions. In making up our missionary budget for this year, we have allowed $300 for our Living Link Missionary at Montgomery."—Mark Collis, Lexington, Ky.

LIVING LINK in American Missions

A Dollar A Day Will Do It

Be Satisfied With Nothing Less Than Your Very Best

The First Church, Birmingham, Ala., hopes to reach the living link rank this year. A. R. Moore is the minister. H. G. Broxton is the chairman of the missionary committee. A systematic canvass is being made of the whole church.

Dr. W. N. Lemmon, Laoag, P. I., writes as follows: "Our work in Laoag is progressing well. We are treating from seventy-five to one hundred and eight patients every day with plenty of surgery on the side. It is a great work and I am enjoying it very much. Dr. Pickett and I have all we can do. He is a royal good fellow and I am glad to be associated with him."

Our mission at Laoag, P. I., will observe Children's Day. They have ordered Children's Day supplies.

Achievement at Paris, Ill.

On March 6th we began a revival meeting with the pastor doing the preaching. Mrs. J. E. Powell in charge of the music and F. B. Thomas of Kansas, Illinois, assisting in personal work and in other ways. The meeting closed on Easter Dey with ninety-seven additions, but there have been additions at every service since the meeting closed and at this writing, April 12th, there have been one hundred and seven additions since the beginning of the meeting. A little over half of the additions have been men and boys, all but thirteen adult men. Of the women and girls all but six were adults. Among the men some of the prominent men of the community and one Sunday morning two veterans of the Civil War, both about seventy-five years old, were received into the church together, becoming members of the church for the first time. Among the additions there are many who will be a source of strength to the church here and elsewhere in the years to come.

Mrs. Powell greatly endeared herself to the church and community by her sweet solos, her efficient leadership, and most of all by her genuine Christian character and her superb womanhood. The church is in better condition financially than it has been for several years and in most ways it is doing excellent work. The different departments are in a prosperous condition.

W. W. SNIFF, Pastor.

himself to my weakness. "Thy gentleness hath made me great." Do you remember George Matheson's description of gentleness? He declared that when you speak of a brook running down the hillside, and away through the meadows, as a gentle brook, you are using a false term. He says there is no gentleness in a brook, but that if you watch the mighty ocean when it kisses the golden sands, and does not harm the child at play, then you may speak of gentleness. Gentleness is strength held in reserve, and placed at the service of weakness—"Thy gentleness hath made me great." Why does not God move more quickly? Why does not God accomplish his purpose in the world, and put an end to all the things that fret and puzzle us? Count that the long-suffering of God is his patience. Remember that it would be possible, as we believe in God, for him to end everything with a crash. But where would some of us be if he did so? Vulgarity is in a hurry; omnipotence is never in a hurry. All his processes are slow, as they appear to us, because of the gentleness of God.

He Waits for Men.

He waits for men. If it be a marvelous thing that Enoch walked with God, it is a more marvelous thing that God walked with Enoch, waiting for him as for a weak little child along the way. Just as you, father—strong man, equal to great speed—walk by the side of your little child that is just beginning to walk, accommodating your strength to the child's weakness, your speed to the child's slowness; so God for ever accommodates himself to our halting pace.

But the gentleness does make us great, and by comparison with the pace we once had, how much quicker the pace is today; and by comparison with what we once were able to do, how much more we are able to do today! Let us not be afraid of boasting in the Lord, but say: "I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me." He leadeth us everywhere in triumph. Oh, presently we shall be back again facing the problems and perplexities, and doing that piece of work we laid down yesterday, glad to be away from it for very weariness. But now, when we take it up tomorrow, let us remember God is as interested in it as the song with which we close the Sabbath. And if we will, brethren, that very piece of work —so poor, so commonplace that we desire not to do it—will become transfigured; and we shall find that the least thing of everyday is part of God's method for building the city, and winning the world, and bringing in his kingdom.

An Incorrect Classification

Our attention has been called to a statistical report printed in the Literary Digest setting forth the relative positions of the various religious bodies in the United States. In this report no mention whatever is made of the Disciples of Christ.

Correspondence with the editor of the Literary Digest and with Dr. H. K. Carroll, upon whose annual statement published in the New York Christian Advocate the Digest's report was founded, reveals the fact that he presented two tables, one of which showed the relative position of denominational "families." In this "family" grouping the Disciples were included under the Baptist name. It was this table from which the Digest made its quotation.

This is a not uncommon classification of the Disciples. It is based upon the fact that both Disciples and Baptists practice immersion only.

The Christian Century feels that the incorrectness of this classification should be pointed out. We are not prompted by any sense of resentment at having the identity of the Disciples lost in a statistical table. That is a small matter, though an error which statisticians ought not to make.

And it is farthest from our purpose to suggest that we are uncomfortable in the company of our Baptist brethren. On the contrary, the Disciples feel very much at home with them. The movement for the union of the two bodies in an increasing number of communities is bringing together many local congregations of Baptists and Disciples.

These examples of union we hope to see rapidly multiplied throughout the land. The two bodies ought to be one. There is not one respectable reason why they should be kept apart—and there never was one.

Our exception to the classification as Baptists, however, is based upon the negative implications of such a grouping. To classify Disciples as Baptists seems to remove them from that intimate relationship with Congregationalists, Presbyterians and the rest which their plea for union calls for.

The Disciples feel themselves as near to the Congregationalists as to the Baptists. As Disciples, we hold no views that ally us more closely with the Baptist "family" than with the Methodist or Presbyterian "family."

If statisticians would be correct in classifying the Disciples according to "denominational families" they would have to distribute this brotherhood of a million and a quarter people among all the evangelical bodies. Probably Baptists would receive a larger share than any other "family," due, probably, mainly to the fact of the connection of the two bodies in history, but Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Methodists, Episcopalians and others would receive great numbers.

The important fact, not alone for statisticians and our religious neighbors to discern, but for ourselves clearly to see and to maintain, is that, as Disciples, we have come out from all "denominational families."

In thus coming out it is not to be assumed that our individual beliefs have changed in matters of creed or ritual or ordinance, but we have come to see that underneath our individual beliefs on these matters that divide Christ's church there is a common basis of faith and practice upon which the lost unity of the church may be restored and maintained.

Becoming a Disciple does not imply that one has altered his view on any disputed question, but that he has altered his viewpoint, and that now he sees the unity of the church as the paramount necessity for the Christianity of today.

The Disciples, therefore, are no more closely related to one than to another of the evangelical "families." Their primary thesis is that there is nothing between the denominations that is big enough to justify their separation into sects.

The Disciples do not take sides in the denominational disputes. They come as peace-makers, as an umpire, calling the disputants away from their discussions to the presence of Christ in whom all are one.

The mere fact that Disciples practice immersion only does not make them Baptists. The Baptist denomination is a portion of the church of Christ organized around the dogma that the Scriptures teach and Christ commands immersion only. They are propagandists of this dogma.

With this dogma of immersion the Disciples have, as Disciples, nothing to do. It is their constant peril to be adopting the Baptist point of view and arguing for immersion on the ground that immersion and immersion only is the plain command of Christ.

But it ought to be plain that no body of people which takes sides on the immersion dogma can be a Christian union body.

That dogma is the very cause of the division of evangelical christendom into two camps. Congregationalists, Methodists and Presbyterians deny that immersion is commanded by Christ or the New Testament. When the Baptist says it is perfectly certain that immersion is commanded by Christ he should say it is perfectly certain to him. For it certainly is not certain to a great majority of the followers of Christ.

For the Disciples to fall into the Baptist position on this question, and to be regarded and to regard themselves as champions of the Baptist dogma on immersion, is to surrender their unique position as heralds of Christian union.

The Disciples are not Baptists in any sense that they are not also Congregationalists and Presbyterians.

Our refusal to practice sprinkling for baptism is not due to our belief of the Baptist dogma, but to our passionate desire for Christian union. Many Disciples do believe the Baptist dogma.

Again many Disciples agree with the Congregationalists that the Lord did not legislate on the form of baptism at all. They are no less Disciples for holding that view. One does not have to be a Baptist to be a Disciple.

A Disciple is a Christian who believes in Christian union and practices it.

He is free to believe as he must believe on all the round of doctrines that divide the church. But as a Disciple he is bound to practice those things that make for unity, and to abstain from practicing those things which though his free conscience allows them, are the cause of schism in Christ's body.

In the movement toward the union of Baptists and Disciples The Christian Century takes profound interest. It is one of the most evident signs of grace in the two bodies today. But concerning it we cannot avoid asking this question:

Do our reciprocal overtures assume that Baptists and Disciples should unite because we "believe alike on baptism," or because we yearn alike for the answer to Christ's prayer for his people's oneness?

As an exponent of the plea of the Disciples of Christ The Christian Century must declare that it has no interest whatever in the union of Baptists and Disciples as a triumph of the immersion dogma.

We do not believe such a union would be Christian union. To unite because we happen to agree in our understanding of what the Scriptures teach implies that we will divide again if we should later come to differ in our understanding of what the Scriptures teach.

It is plain that a few of the much heralded instances of union between Baptists and Disciples in western Canada were mainly based upon this dogmatic agreement. For, after dwelling together in unity for a season, other dogmatic differences arose and their love for Christ was not strong enough to keep the union from dissolution.

There is no reason why a union should not be effected between a Congregational and a Disciple congregation as readily as between a Baptist and a Disciple congregation, if both Congregationalists and Disciples, feeling the exceeding wrongfulness of sectarian division and a sincere desire to promote unity, would simply refrain from practicing those things that divide.

Christian union does not consist in the agreement of all Christians on dogmas, but in love and loyalty to Christ. This is the Disciples' fundamental insight. They must not allow it to be eclipsed.

And in acting upon this insight they will allow no sect to claim them exclusively, but will claim "family relationship" with all who yearn for the unity of the people of God.

Catholic Ire Aroused

The Catholics are humiliated and angered over the Roosevelt-Vatican incident at Rome. No doubt, as we have before pointed out, the more discerning leaders of the hierarchy in this country are deeply aware that the advisers of the Holy Father allowed him to commit a strategic blunder. It is lucky for Mr. Roosevelt that the Methodists at Rome gave him adequate occasion to deal with them upon the same level as he had dealt with the Catholics. He completely removed himself from the charge of sectarian animus in connection with the Vatican, by giving the Methodists the same kind of a slap as he had given the Vatican. But it is regrettable, nevertheless, that the Methodists showed such dull diplomacy. It was their chance to hold their tongues. Events were going the right direction without any action on their part. To make capital out of the Vatican incident, especially before Mr. Roosevelt left Rome, was a stupid blunder which Rev. Mr. Tipple should have foreseen. As the case stands Catholics and Methodists have broken about even, and Mr. Roosevelt goes on his triumphant way with all the glory. But it is evident at any rate that the Methodist mission in Rome is no mere ornament of Methodist enterprise. It is there for business, and it is pushing its business in season and out of season. The pope and his advisers would not hate it so if it were not persistently and effectively exposing the arrogance and unchristianity of the papacy. Such chaste and delicate literature as the following from The New World (Catholic, Chicago), would not be composed in defense of an invulnerably righteous institution. Its anger measures the depth of its humiliation and sense of helplessness in the presence of the free spirit of modern life.

THE CARRION BIRD.

"When Prometheus lay chained to the rock it was the carrion bird that fed on his body. When the Holy Father was robbed of his possessions in 1870 and confined a prisoner in the Vatican, it was the carrion crow of the sects who builded his filthy nest opposite the prisoner's gate and reviled him and lampooned him and jeered at him. This took place forty years ago and the same campaign of vituperation and slander has been carried on all this time and is being carried on now. When the Holy Father, like the gentleman that he is, after having been discourteously treated by two prominent Americans, tries to hush up the affair so as to keep down religious strife and warfare, this unspeakable carrion bird dips its nasty feathers in the slime and putridity of the sewer and placards the city of Rome with the following vile and deliberate slander:

'Papal intolerance has found a worthy response in the Protestant conscience of Theodore Roosevelt, who rejected the conditions imposed as to a reception at the Vatican. This is a solemn warning to those who cherish the delusion that the spirit of the papacy has changed.'

"And then that statement of B. M. Tipple (we will not insult the cloth by calling him reverend), who expressed the greatest satisfaction that the ex-president did not have an audience with the Holy Father. Who tells us that 'the Vatican is incompatible with republican principles,' speaks of the 'Romish' church in America, etc., and says it is 'the uncompromising foe of freedom,' referring to France, where high-handed robbery and spoilation reign, in corroboration of his vile slanders.

'Then one Robert McIntyre, who calls himself a bishop of the Southern Minnesota Conference, who brands John Ireland a double tongued falsifier, a cowardly accuser of men better than himself, who are offering Italians the free grace of God without any terms of priestly monopoly, and who says, 'the papal machine has a blood-red record that stains centuries of history.'

"And then this deliberate falsehood from the Rev. F. H. Wright of Pittsburg:

'The Pope had no quarrel with Mr. Roosevelt or Mr. Fairbanks,' he asserted. 'When those Americans announced their intention to visit Rome the Vatican officials saw an opportunity to strike over their shoulders to hit the Methodists. The American visitors were used simply as foils.'

"And so on ad nauseam. Think seriously and ponder over this, gentle reader. Think of the utter infamy of it; the small, contemptible meanness of the whole affair. And then hide your head in shame for your shattered idol whose clay feet you have discovered. Your former president, whom you have worshipped as the strenuous one, the lion hunter, and what not, and who shows discourtesy to a venerable, mild-mannered, good and holy old man; a grand old man who represents the greatest institution in the world."

Baptist Trouble Over Creed

The difficulty constantly experienced by a creedless church in keeping creeds out is receiving fresh illustration in the case of the Baptists of Illinois. Baptist churches, as is well known, repudiate all human creeds and insist upon the all sufficiency of the New Testament as a guide in faith and practice, leaving to each individual the right of private interpretation. Some three years ago a group of Baptists from the southern part of the state tried to get the state convention to alter its constitution in such fashion as to include a definition of a Baptist church as one which subscribed to certain specified statements of belief. This was regarded as an attack upon fundamental Baptist principles, the effect of which, if it should prevail, would be to tie up the churches to a hard and fast creedal statement, thus surrendering the liberty of the local church and the individual conscience. Defeated by an overwhelming vote these reactionary Baptists have since organized an association of their own, which has been waging war upon the missionary societies of the Northern Baptist churches, asserting that they are participants in the crime of not "lining up" with the real defenders of the faith. As a result of this defection the new organization began to conduct mission work which, according to The Standard (Chicago) brought about a deplorable condition.

"Churches and associations were split; long-time friends were estranged. Counsel has been divided; fierce discussions have waged; confusion as to denominational affiliation has been caused, and a spirit of contention and bitterness reigns where peace should dwell. Seeking to solidify the truth—honestly, let us hope—as these good brethren declare, they have wrought sad havoc with the peaceful means of proclaiming the truth."

Now the recalcitrant association is seeking admittance to the Southern Baptist Convention. The fear prevails that the official recognition and encouragement of their organization by Southern Baptists will check the currents of good feeling between the two conventions that have been gaining strength and fullness steadily since the Civil War. Disciples of Christ take a keen interest in the outcome of such a struggle as this, realizing as we do that it is no mere sectarian interest that is involved, but the larger cause of freedom in religion. Against this same creed-imposing evil the Disciples have always stood, and at no time has it been more important to guard our freedom from the tyranny of man-made conceptions than today.

A Pulpit Editorial

How the preacher may wisely use the secular press of his city to advance his work is an art concerning which much has been said. But here is a paper, The Evening Telegraph, of Kalamazoo, Mich., which is using at least one preacher to write its leading editorial. It may be passing this compliment around among the pastors of Kalamazoo; if so we cannot but commend its sagacity if the other ministers furnish as good "copy" as the article by Rev. H. D. Williams, of the Park Street Church of Disciples, a copy of which has fallen into our hands. Mr. Williams strikes straight out at what he rightly calls, "The Real Anarchists." He says:

The grafting policeman, the subsidized judge, the bribed legislator, and all their kind, make possible the professional anarchist. The real anarchists are not the few fellows who are calling for daggers and dynamite; they are the men who, under cover of love for our institutions, are prostituting them to the worship of mammon. And these real anarchists do far worse than turn loose a few professional anarchists; they paralyze the patriotism of millions of our best people. They have so outraged public confidence and so demoralized the public conscience with their infamous doings that multitudes of men do not believe that honesty and integrity in public office is a possibility. This lack of confidence in men and in our institutions has given added opportunity to the servants of greed, and they have made the most of it. The call of the hour is for enough of the dynamite of honest conviction in the ballots of this country to blow every real anarchist out of the city halls, court houses, legislative halls and capitols throughout the republic. The press, the preachers, the teachers, the thinkers and all patriots should join hands in the crusade against this real anarchy until there comes a right respect for law that shall cover the land as the waters cover the sea.

College Men and the Bible

It is a matter of importance and peculiar significance that there has been of late a great revival of interest in the study of the Bible among the undergraduates of our colleges and universities. This has been mainly due to a concerted effort of the International Committee representing the Young Men's Christian Association of Canada and the United States.

Figures show that last year over 32,000 college and university undergraduates in the United States and Canada were voluntary attendants upon Bible classes, and that in other countries 80,000 college men engaged in intelligent and voluntary Bible study. Mr. Clayton Sedgwick Cooper, secretary of the Y. M. C. A. International Committee, in charge of its Bible work in educational institutions, has written for the May Century of "College Men and the Bible" in America, and will contribute further studies of other phases of this great world-wide movement.

The alarm that is felt by some Christian people over the widespread and increasing acceptance of evolution and biblical criticism as presenting the best solution of the problems of nature study and biblical literature, seems less and less justified as the subject is studied. Recently Rev. David Beaton was inducted into the pastorate of the Congregational Church at Janesville, Wis., and among his utterances in his inaugural address were the following: "Evolution has been to me the final and complete vindication of the spiritual nature of the Universe as against all materialism or pessimism, whether of the scientific rationalism of the eighteenth century, or the crass idealistic fancies of modern faddists." Of the Gospel message he said, "The Gospel of Jesus Christ is to me the power of God unto salvation, and whether in his home, his business, his social and civic life, or in the secret places of his individual spirit, man needs it more than he needs light and air, for it is the vital air of his spirit. It is the radiant light of his life. I am of late years making my messages more human, more practical, more simple for children and plain people, and it is satisfying to see that the people respond to this form of message with greater interest and greater self-surrender."

The Lake Mohonk Conference on International Arbitration is each year one of the most significant events in the higher life of the nation. By the invitation of Mr. Albert K. Smiley, two or three hundred leaders in education, politics, journalism, business and religion, gather at his home at beautiful Lake Mohonk, N. Y., to discuss the question of ridding the nations of war. For fifteen years this conference has been a fountain of national idealism and has exercised wide influence through its discussions and its published proposals. The gathering this year will be held May 18-20, and will consider especially the proposal recently made by Secretary of State Knox, that the International Prize Court as constituted by the second Hague Conference be given the jurisdiction of a Judicial Arbitration Court. At present the jurisdiction of the Prize Court extends only, as its name implies, to cases of prizes taken in war. The proposal to widen its function so as to include all disputes between the nations is the most important contribution to the Peace Movement in the past year.

The Vine and the Branches

Independence is based upon the right sort of dependence. The immoral man needs, for the success of his plans, the wrong kind of people and the wrong kind of social arrangements. The moral man has no plans that can be carried to completion without the help of high-minded persons and just laws. Perfect freedom requires complete and conscious dependence upon God. This freedom Jesus possessed. To be one with him is to enjoy the freedom of a moral being.

Christ lives in the hearts of his people. We cannot abide in him if we choose to separate ourselves from those who are striving to do his will. We need the help of the Christian thinker who applies the teaching of Christ to the situation we have to face. To ignore the devout interpreter of the will of God, to be out of sympathy with him, is to be away from Christ. Hard mental labor is the price we must pay for an appreciation of the simple gospel. The simplicity of ignorance and lazy acquiescence in the statements of others does not commend the gospel of our Lord.

To abide in Christ is to be in fellowship with his workers. Who are the men and the women whose work is the best exposition of the gospel of Christ? We cannot be disciples and assume an attitude of indifference toward what they are doing. We must know their motives. We must have their confidence. Of course union with the people of the Lord is more than a matter of ecclesiastical law. Attempts to force men into the fellowship of believers is anti-Christian. Co-operation for common purposes is the ideal of Christian fellowship. This is possible where disciples are intelligent, free, and loyal.

Vital relation to Christ reveals itself in good works. The true disciple does the service that pleasure seekers shun. He is not so much concerned about being respectable as he is about doing what an enlightened conscience lays upon him. He is apt to adopt what shocks worshippers of the conventional. He does not delight in novelty for its own sake, but because the new way is better than the old. He is pleased with the old road when it leads straight to human need. He looks to the welfare of the child, not to the integrity of a system of Sunday-school lessons, no matter who has elaborated the system. He goes to the non-Christian races by the shortest route. Is a missionary society the best instrument for the evangelization of the world? If it is, then it ought to be supported. If a better instrument can be found and made available, use it. It is entirely a question of efficiency. If two societies ask for the Easter offering, the disciple who cares for results wants to know why the common sense of the brotherhood does not devise some method of harmonizing the different interests. He is more anxious to get out of the tangle than he is to blame somebody for getting him into it. He will submit methods to a vote. His faith is his own and no body of men can dictate to him what it shall be. He walks with Christ and he knows in whom he believes.

Biblical Problems

By Professor Willett

"Is there authority for the statement that baptism or immersion was practiced by the Jews before Christ's day?" The response to this query by Prof. H. L. Willett in The Christian Century of March 24 does not justify an affirmative conclusion. It is well known that in the admission of proselytes there was a custom of "a bath with a view to a Levitical purification," and in the later usage of the Jews this lustration was "by immersion in water." This custom was alluded to in the letter to the Hebrews in the expression, "divers baptisms," which were self-washings. But the specific difference between these lustrations and baptism, whether John's or Christian, is in this, viz., the baptizing party performed the immersion on the baptized. "As regards this rite," says Olshausen, "we are less concerned with its relation to proselyte-baptism, than to the Christian sacrament of baptism. With reference to the baptism of proselytes, it seems probable to me, that an actual baptism, i. e., a lustration performed on the proselyte by another, did not take place before the baptism of John; subsequently, it may have arisen out of the lustrations so long customary, which every one performed on himself."

This is not only "probable" but certain, so far as the Bible throws light upon it. The fact is beyond fair disputation that the baptism of John is of heaven, and began in his commission from God. See Luke 3:2, 3 and John 1:29-34. Jesus sanctioned it by being baptized of John, was thus made manifest to Israel and was introduced to the world by his Father in the presence of witnesses. In act and previous preparation of heart for an obedience of faith in baptism, John's baptism does not differ from Christian baptism, which is based directly on the commission of Christ to his apostles after his resurrection. W. L. Hayden.

Indianapolis, Ind.

It is difficult at first for us to concede that immersion as a religious rite, antedated the ministry of John, because we like to believe that all the features of our Christian faith were new. But the facts are fatal to this view. It was no part of a spiritual religion to coin new forms of ritual. The Lord's Supper and baptism, the two simple forms employed in the Christian church, are the best illustrations of this truth. The Lord's Supper was in form the outgrowth of the Passover service, and baptism was the taking over of the most significant rite of the Jewish ritual.

Against this view all the earlier writers on the theme contended vigorously, as if it were a means of discrediting the Christian faith. Olshausen is a good example of this tendency. But the later authorities, whom I quoted in the former note on the question, are a unit in affirming the priority of Jewish to Christian immersion.

The statement that the baptism of John was from heaven would hardly be taken seriously in an argument as to the form of the ordinance. John's baptism was from Heaven in the sense of its significance and value as preparing the way for the greater work of the Messiah. In form John's baptism and Christian baptism are precisely like the baptisms of the Jewish church. In spirit they are as different as was the Lord's Supper from the Jewish Passover.

Even if there were no other reason for assigning the origin of immersion as a religious rite to a time preceding John's work, it would be a logical necessity of the case, from the fact that Jewish prejudice would have absolutely forbidden the adoption of a rite from the hated and despised sect of Christians. More than that, the authorities I quoted are apparently conclusive that the custom was already recognized in the Jewish ritual.

Social Survey

Compensating Injured Workingmen

Several state legislatures and the federal congress have been considering the problem of compensation to the injured worker. Under our present system the employer must be proved negligent before the injured workingman can recover compensation. This means that the worker must bear the cost of accident. The chance to recover damages are so small that only one in eleven injured workers ever attempt to recover damages, and only one-tenth of those actually win their suits. This does not look like the jury always favored the individual when a corporation is being sued. The law allows little opportunity for such bias.

Montana has a new law that is at least an advance. It assesses the cost of injury up to both employe and employer by creating an accident insurance fund to cover coal mining, to which the employe must contribute one per cent of his wages and the employer one per cent of all coal mined. The State Auditor has charge of the fund and possesses powers to decide all disputed cases. In case of death $3.000 is paid: for loss of a limb or an eye the benefit is $1,000; for total and permanent incapacity the injured one receives either the death benefit or one dollar per day indefinitely. The law is neither equitable in all its benefits nor clear in all its provisions, but is a distinct advance.

Illinois and New York both have commissions studying the problem and the question is being agitated in many states. Here is another matter that should seek national uniformity. The cost of accident to men, like that of accident to machines, should be assessed up to the cost of production. Above all, the man who never has much aside from his ability to labor should not have to bear the cost of accident in industry.

Raising the Wages

The eastern railroads are leading in granting a general increase in wages of about six per cent. The Steel Trust is following and other great employers are recognizing the demand that increased cost of living brings. The numbers benefitted in the past month will reach a half million. This increase still leaves many with a smaller margin than they had ten years ago. "Prices go up the elevator while wages climb the stairs."

An investigation of the prices of ninety-six commodities, such as those the workingman uses, and of the wages of more than 300,000 workers showed that while wages arose 3 per cent each two years between 1906 and 1910, living increased almost 40 per cent in the four years.

Some startling conditions have been revealed in the various arbitration hearings and other investigations of late. It is almost unbelievable that men should be compelled to work under the conditions that some of those who labor for great corporations are found to be laboring under. At the switchman's arbitration hearings in Chicago mothers testified that their husbands worked from twelve to sixteen hours per day, seven days in the week, and that they seldom saw their children except when asleep. At the steel works men were found to be working and living under conditions that would have shamed the middle ages, unorganized laborers toiling twelve and fifteen and even eighteen hours per day for as low as nine cents per hour. It will take a vast amount of uncovering to convince the people at large of these evils and to create a public opinion that will bring about legislation making such conditions impossible.

The Steel Trust is endeavoring to inaugurate a reform in the matter of Sunday labor. One man in its directorate has labored incessantly for this boon for years but has been voted down by more mercenary directors. He secured an order some years ago, but finds it has never been lived up to. Now he has a sweeping order and hopes to see it obeyed. Recent revelations and the terrific attack of the American Federation of Labor on working conditions under that immense monopoly may bring a betterment.

Constructive Labor Legislation

One hundred years ago political philosophy was saturated with the idea that nature's laws were all beneficent and the panacea for all ills was to return to nature and its simple ways. Such men as Adam Smith protested against labor legislation just as Rosseau protested against political law making beyond that which was negative, and Thos. Jefferson stated that the best law was the least law. But in those days laws were passed by and in the interest of the aristocracy and the wealthy. Labor legislation was representative. Today laws are passed in favor of the masses and designed, supposedly at least, to abolish privilege. Thus the Adam Smiths of our time are in favor of labor legislation for the same reason that he was against it, and the Jeffersons of our time favor more law for the same reason that he favored less.

The history of the world could be written in the history of exploitation. And it has ever been the exploitation of labor by those who had by chance or fortune obtained the power more than even that of weaker nations by the stronger that reveals the heart of humanity's greatest battles. But the record is one of the continuous rise of the unexploited into a larger measure of rights until laws are seldom passed longer that are directly designed to oppress labor. When oppressive measures are enacted it is by indirection for the conscience of the public is made indignant at overt assaults of the strong upon the weak or the privileged upon the unprivileged.

Labor legislation today is constructive. It is shaped to protect and enlarge labor's rights. The battle is between the old laissez faire principle of "let-alone" and the new constructive principle of creative legal acts for the benefit of society. All wealth is created by the application of labor to material nature. Therefore property is best conserved when its source is best cared for.

Sociological Study and the Churches

The New York School of Philanthropy has inaugurated a course for "Social Workers in the Churches and Religious Institutions." The innovation is not so startling as is the fact that it is an innovation. It is startling that the greatest moral and charitable organization should have done so little to instruct its paid ministers and servants in the art of applying religion socially. The great religious problems of the times are the social problems just as the most portending political problems are social. Both religion and politics must grasp the social questions or fail to meet the needs of the time. New York ministers who feel the impact of the social problem in their parishes welcome the course with satisfaction and promise the heartiest coöperation, saying their great need is for trained social workers.

Theological seminaries are yet unconscious of the demand for sociological training. Many of those that coördinate with universities get some benefit from the regular university courses, but few of them have any courses of their own, adapted to the social problem of the church of studying the matter from a religious standpoint. Most of them seem to consider it more necessary to know the various theologies and the intellectual tithing of criticism than the living problems of the cities and the call of humanity for better living and working conditions.

Prof. Peabody began giving courses on the ethics of the social question at Harvard in 1880. Prof. Tucker introduced like courses at Andover in 1887. In 1888 Hartford Seminary introduced sociology into the prescribed course and was the real pioneer in the matter. Chicago Theological Seminary was the first, however, to create a department, which was done by the coming of Graham Taylor to that institution in 1892. In the same year Yale introduced a course in Christian Social Ethics. At the University of Chicago, Prof. Henderson inaugurated a department which is called Ecclesiastical Sociology, and other seminaries have courses now, but the greater number still look to the future for some such instruction while they devotedly fill the curriculum with all the languages and histories of ancient things and faithfully impress upon budding ministers the excellencies of the particular denomination by which they were founded. Among the Disciples of Christ the Bible College at Columbia, Mo., is to be the pioneer in creating a Chair of Social Service and Christian Missions. Others teach sociology as a course in the college curriculum, but none have a department on a par with those of Church History, Old Testament, etc., and with special instruction from the religious standpoint.

Charles Stelzle asks pertinently whether it is not about as necessary to know the Chicagoites as the Amelakites and to know how to apply the Gospel to the problems of our time as to discover new meanings for Greek prepositions. We need to evangelize conditions as well as individuals. The medical student is taught materia medica as diligently as histology.

It is the civilizing power of Christian missions that is appealing to the strong men of the business world today quite as much as it is the old time evangelizing power.

Between the Testaments

Unfamiliar History Just Before Jesus' Day

By Christopher B. Coleman

Every kind of history must be regarded in two ways: in the light of its achievements, and in the light of the monuments, literary and material, in which these are recorded. The importance of any given period may vary greatly as measured in these two ways. The Peloponnesian war among the Greeks as measured by its achievements and its effects upon human welfare falls far below the movement beginning with Alexander the Great by which Greek civilization conquered the whole eastern end of the Mediterranean. Yet the greatest of Greek historians, Thucydides, described the former, and the Greek student until recently almost ignored the latter, his historical judgement being overshadowed by his literary taste. There is only a short paragraph by way of literary monument for thirty years of Jesus' life, while many an insignificant episode of personal or national Jewish history is recorded in magnificent psalms read everywhere today. The second century of the Roman Empire is in historical significance of importance equal to or greater than preceding centuries, but no Livy or Tacitus recorded it in a great historical work. Indeed, Cicero's orations against Cataline have unfortunately given by their literary value more weight to a trivial episode than most histories give to the whole of Roman law or imperial Roman government.

The Maccabean Period.

Between the Old and the New Testaments there lies a period to be estimated according to the dates assigned the latest writings of the Old Testament at from two to four centuries. The historical significance of this period has been obscured by the fact that it lies outside the two groups of Scriptural books. Yet the modern student of the Jewish people recognizes in the movements and achievements of this period one of the greatest stages of Jewish history. Three things alone surpass it, the original emergence of Israel into national and religious consciousness, the restoration of Judaism after the Babylonian captivity, and the disappearance of the Jewish nation under the Roman sword after the unsuccessful revolts of 67-70 and 135 A. D. The first Book of the Maccabees shows us how nearly the Greek or Hellenistic ideas, customs and religion came to swamping the Jews altogether. The High Priest and the leading men of Jerusalem were among the Hellenizers. The temple fell under their control and swine were offered in sacrifice to Zeus upon the temple altar of Jehovah. Had it not been for Mattathias and his great sons, the founders of the Maccabean line, it is difficult to see how the Jewish religion could have survived till the coming of the Messiah. Even the Jewish Scriptures and their record of God's dealings with his chosen race might have perished. The crisis was as grave as any in the time of Isaiah or Jeremiah. There were no prophets to stem the tide, but the sword of Judas Maccabeus was the providential means for the preservation of the people to whom God was to reveal himself in the greatest of all the prophets. The extension of Jewish power by the succession of Judas and his brothers, and its development by Herod the Great brought the Jewish government to a greater splendor than it had ever enjoyed, even in the days of Solomon. And the Pharisees, the product of Maccabean days, took care that the religion of the true God was preserved with all of its traditions and its Scriptures. Jesus was made possible by the father of the Pharisees who opposed him.

To understand the beginning of Christianity one must understand this period between the Testaments. How could we appreciate Lincoln and the Civil War if we knew nothing of previous United States history this side of the French and Indian War. Yet a longer time and equally important political movements lie between the Old Testament and the New. If we except some rather indefinite Psalms and books which have not yet been definitely dated, the Old Testament closes the information it gives us with the re-establishment of the Jews in Palestine after the Babylonian Captivity and the building of the second temple. The very town from which Jesus came and the region in which he spent most of his life was not at that time Jewish either in government or in population. Only in the time of the Maccabees did it become so. From the Christian point of view is not this movement of equal interest with the original conquest of Canaan? The parties and institutions of Jesus' time do not cross the pages of the Old Testament, and the New Testament gives only a glimpse of them and that indirectly, merely as they are involved in narratives about Jesus and his associates. The Pharisees and Sadducees, Herodians and publicans, the synagogue, the Scriptures, the temple itself, were creations of the time between the Testaments.

Jesus and the Pharisees.

Most of Jesus' public career is involved in his relation to two groups of people, the Pharisees and the "multitude." The former were the religious leaders of their time. The very term has become a reproach in the Christian world, but at one time in the Jewish world they ranked justly in the honorable list of judges, prophets, priests and kings who had preserved true religion in a trying and unfavorable world. Their task as they conceived it in the time of Jesus was still the same, to preserve Judaism in its entirety and its purity. The majority of the inhabitants of Palestine were not interested in this, if indeed they were interested in religion at all. The mass of the people probably were not Jewish in the strict sense of the word. They were mongrel in blood and in ideas, differing from the Samaritans only in having a larger mixture of Jewish blood and being officially under the Jewish system. They were the "common people," "the multitudes," the "sinners." The Pharisees could not conceive of them having any part of the covenant. They were unchurched, not only because they did not care for Judaism but because Judaism shut them out. A study of the Jewish people and the times immediately preceding, shows that it was largely Jesus' attitude toward these people that lined up the Pharisees so bitterly against him. The crowds that surrounded Jesus were not people of immoral life, not sinners against decency and society, but were simply "common people," "sinners" as opposed to those who kept devoutly to the traditions of the elders. Jesus included them among the chosen people, the Pharises shut them out. This was the question beside which Jesus' violation of the Sabbath laws and his interpretation of the Scriptures were mere incidents; rather they were the technicalities in which the fundamental question came forward in debatable form. While Jesus had a message for all men, the specific way in which it was delivered can only be understood in the light of this historical situation.

Importance of Apocryphal Literature.

In emphasizing the historical importance of the period between the Testaments as its chief challenge to our attention I do not want to minimize the writings then produced. It is a pity that we do not use them more. For centuries Christians generally used some of them as Scripture, the Roman Catholic church still includes the earliest of them, those known to us as the Apocrypha, in its canon of the Old Testament. The Jews in Palestine in forming their Scriptures left out late writings. The Jews of the Dispensation for whom finally the Scriptures were translated into Greek were more free in their attitude, they included later writings. And so the Greek Old Testament Scriptures, the Septuagint, contained much matter and some whole books not in the Hebrew Old Testament. This material is the Apocrypha, which the Protestants going back to original Jewish sources excluded from their Old Testament, but frequently printed as a third collection between it and the New Testament. Many Protestant ministers used to use verses of it as texts and quoted it only less frequently than their Scriptures. It gradually, however, passed out of use until it has become almost forgotten except by historical students. Yet the revisers of the King James version continued their labors with a revised version of the Apocrypha. This can easily be gotten at almost any book store, and will well repay reading. The Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus or the Wisdom of Jesus son of Sirach, and the stirring Books of the Maccabees are not only interesting reading but instructive and inspiring as well.

We possess also Jewish writings which appeared too late to be included even in the Apocrypha and which rank almost side by side with many canonical books. One of these at least, the Psalms of Solomon, or more properly the Psalms of the Pharisees, contains passages of the greatest beauty. It reveals the messianic hopes of a Pharisee, or a group of Pharisees, two generations before the time of Jesus, hopes which may well have been in the heart of Paul when he was as he describes himself, "a Pharisee of the Pharisees."

The Nation's Response

Christian Men Marvelously Awakening to the Missionary Call

By Colonel Elijah W. Halford

The great missionary campaign is well on the home stretch. In a short time the last of the conventions will have been held. With a mighty impetus and triumphant swing the culminating congress will come, and the United States will join Canada in the declaration of a missionary policy for North America.

We are living too close to the event properly to estimate the marvelous significance, power and influence of the unparalleled missionary and religious awakening that has had its expression in the one hundred or more conventions and auxiliary meetings which have belted the country during the past few months. The conventions have no precedent by which they can be judged. They have been the makers of history, the setters of precedents, whereby religious enthusiasm and Christian possibility may be and will be measured for the future.

Begun With Fear.

The campaign was not undertaken without serious doubt. At the beginning only fifty conventions were contemplated, and to many even this number seemed too great a task. But the larger number of seventy-five soon became the least that dared be undertaken, while as the campaign progressed an increasing number of allied and auxiliary meetings were forced to be provided for. It will be readily recalled by those responsible for the movement how earnest at first were the efforts to repress and to limit. It was feared that it would be quite impossible to secure the required force for such a huge campaign; the necessary financial assistance could not be commanded; it would be out of the question to hold the attention of the country during so long a period; the strain would be too severe; the pace could not be kept up; the whole enterprise would prove unwieldy and would collapse.

So far as human elements were concerned all these fears and doubts seemed to be well-founded. They were worldly wise. It was not surprising that men asked themselves "who is sufficient for these things!" and that while many questioned, some feared to such a degree as to become faint-hearted and not a few were disinclined to get under the burden.

A Greater Guide.

But God's ways are not the ways of men. From the beginning he has guided the campaign; taken care of the work, and seen to it that, despite great weaknesses, in the face of obstacles apparently insurmountable, now and again one or another upon whom a measure of reliance was placed being forced to drop out of the ranks for a time or altogether—in the words of Mr. Eddy, "not one of the conventions has recorded a failure." From the opening convention at Buffalo to the Congress at Chicago the song of triumph has been heard; the note of victory ever sounded; a moral force has been displayed, and a spiritual power visibly developed in the church praise. Each of the conventions has had its own special feature and characteristic. One has been notable for what may be termed demonstration of enthusiasm, as at Boise, where business was suspended that men could attend the meetings, while the governor and mayor headed the street parade as they marched to the opening supper. Another has been characterized by a depth of feeling the tide of which, in Tennyson's words, was "too full for sound and foam." But all of them, without exception, have been marvelously marked by the presence and power of the Spirit of God. This one thing, more than any other feature, has impressed all who have come into contact with the conventions. Many men, numbers of them among the leaders and the speakers, have had to readjust themselves mentally and spiritually; they have had to discard in a degree the advance preparation made, and have found their spirit and their message strangely moulded by a power outside themselves.

What Must be Reckoned With.

As the wind-up approaches, two classes must be reckoned with. First, those excessively carbonized folks who will assume that "all is over but the shouting." The results have been so stupendous that not a few will imagine that the work is now complete and that the future is to be simply a time of joyful reaping. A second class is composed of those who will heave a sigh of relief because the strenuous days are in the past, and are ready to return, measurably at least, to the old days of comparative ease and comfort. One of the most prominent missionary leaders in the country, when approached for personal enlistment at the beginning of the campaign, responded in the affirmative, saying: "When it is all over I don't want anyone to be able to say that I did not give the movement my heartiest support;" and he fixed the time when "it" would be "over" as the concluding date of the Chicago Congress! At no other juncture of religious history could the words of Livingstone be more truthfully used in paraphrase, "The end of the campaign is the beginning of the enterprise." Wonderful as has been the demonstration of these months of awakening, it is however, only the first furrow turned in a fallow field. The possibilities of cultivation have been revealed not realized. If there be a lesson more patent than any other it is that "leaving the things behind we press forward."

Ease When There is Interest.

One manifest lesson of the campaign is the ease with which God's work may be done when men really undertake it with devotion and purpose. Nothing is harder than "to pull against a cold collar." And this has been the difficulty with much of the service of men in the church. They have had spirit and desire in other things; and the "other things" have progressed and prospered to a marvelous degree. But with the things of the Kingdom men have had only perfunctory relations. The sense of duty has been appealed to; and unrelieved duty is always irksome. George McDonald says some day we shall stop doing right from a sense of duty and will do right for the love of it. That day in a measure has come in this "Laymen's" uprising. What a spring there has been! What a revelation of the truth that "My yoke is easy and my burden is light!" Not that sacrifice is not involved. It is; and much of it. The ease is not the ease that begets indifferent service; it is the ease that marks love's work and differentiates between human drudgery and divine ministry.

A Lesson.

A companion lesson is the readiness of men to respond to a worthy challenge. Men like the large, the heroic, the sacrificial. No libel is more deadly and deadening than the current view that men will not give themselves to religious work. Scores, if not hundreds of thousands of men, have followed the beckoning hand of this movement, and thrown themselves into its service with an abandon that is equaled in history only by the experience of the Crusaders or by the high resolve with which men have ever faced a supreme moral crisis, as in the days when for what they believed to be right, men of every section flocked to the standards which led them even to death. Surely the church and church leaders will not underestimate or forget this pre-eminent teaching of the campaign. We cannot go back to old mediocre days and to wornout methods. In a sense, at least, "old things have passed away and behold all things are becoming new." Let the dead bury the dead while the living church marches, with beating pulse and exultant steps to the victory that is presaged by every token.

Leadership and Organization.

Another lesson is that of leadership and organization. Things do not happen in the Kingdom of God any more than in other kingdoms. There is no warrant of Scripture or of sense for the idea that the Kingdom will "grow," like Topsy. The world everywhere and in everything waits for and upon leadership. Said the Marquis of Salisbury to Lord Roberts, when "little Bobs" left him at Charing Cross to assume command of the almost defeated British forces in the Boer war, "My lord, we are finding out that in this war we must depend upon the generals." In everything this is true. Materially and spiritually as well, leadership is demanded and is absolutely essential. Oh the pity of it when a man assumes to take any place requiring the qualities of leadership and shows that he is stuffed only with sawdust! And how fearful when this is in the spiritual realm. This campaign has been possible because men were willing to give their ability in leadership and in organization, subordinating themselves to the dominion of him who calls men into partnership with himself, and who by his blessing, makes even five loaves and two fishes feed uncounted thousands.

Suggestion for the Future.

A concluding suggestion is that of responsibility for the future. The work is but in the initial stage. The past and the present must be conserved to save the future. The Laymen's Missionary Movement under which these primary results have been registered must recognize the imperative of the obligation thereby imposed. Noblesse oblige. It will not do to lessen interest, to abridge service, to minify effort; to economize expression. What has been accomplished has been under the lead of an agency able to secure the united action of the church. The strength and force of interdenominational union has been overpoweringly demonstrated, as it has been in other phases of concerted Christian action. No other duty will be more pressing at the Chicago Congress than to consider and determine how the initiative and spontaneity of individualism may be preserved without weakening in any wise the inestimable value of the completest co-operation. The church has had a fuller taste of unity than ever before; but sweet as that taste has been, it is only a foretaste of the larger development of Christian union yet within the possibilities of the Laymen's Movement.

The Gospel and Liberalism

Third in Series on Present Tendencies in the Church

By Rev. Orvis F. Jordan

In the other religious movements we have been considering, we have had no difficulty over the definition of our terms. High-churchism and Christian Science are perfectly definite. As soon, however, as we undertake to define liberalism, we find ourselves at sea. Like the word gospel, it is one of the much-abused words of our religious vocabulary. A pastor of a "Peoples' Church" once spoke of this to me and deplored the fact that there were people in the world who thought they were liberal just as soon as they began to doubt something. Ella Wheeler Wilcox castigates this class in a poem where she speaks of the liberal man who is the most illiberal bigot of them all.

Historically, our present liberal movement seems to have taken its rise with the doctrines of the French Revolution. The intense individualism of that movement and its pet theories and doctrines are still much manifest among the Unitarians. That movement in France taught men everywhere to question the established institutions. Its point of view is to exalt the rights of the individual. Following the French Revolution came successively the Unitarians, the Universalists, the Christian Connection and the Disciples. All of these movements insisted upon the right of private judgment in religious dogma, and all of them were considered dangerous by the religious world at the time they took their rise.

Private Judgment and Limits to Liberty.

The Disciples in the exercise of private judgment set certain limits to their liberty by insisting upon belief in the divinity of Christ and in obedience to the form of baptism. The other three set no limits, allowing their members liberty even in these two matters where the Disciples had not accorded the right of private interpretation.

Today, we have not only the movements which we have enumerated, but we have people in every religious body who are insisting upon their right to think for themselves. The Roman Catholics have the modernist movement even in camps where there is the greatest hostility to independent thinking. Every religious body has its own dearest heretic which it would like to burn if that amiable custom had only not gone out of date.

About all we can say of the term "liberal" is that it is something like Boston, it is a state of mind. Wherever men insist upon the right of private interpretation of religious truth and are willing to accord to others the same right, we have a liberal. Wherever we find men who insist upon making men fit the Procrustean bed of another century's thinking we have those who care more for the term orthodox than for the term liberal.

There is, however, a pretty well understood theology which is current among modern liberals. It has infinite variety but agreement in method and in the main essentials. It is this set of religious beliefs that we wish to consider for a time.

Most Liberals Evolutionists.

If there is any word which is especially dear to all modern liberals it is the word evolution. We have never seen a liberal who was not an evolutionist. The charge of his enemies that he uses this point of view in the interpretation of the Bible and in the formulation of his theology is true. He points with pride to the fact that this scientific theory is now taught in every university of note in the world and in almost every village high school, so thoroughly established is it. He insists that a theology which does not square with the assured results of modern science is one which is built on sand and one which can never make headway among intellectual people.

The liberal takes his evolutionary hypothesis to the Bible. He discovers here many evidences of the operation of his principle. He arranges his old testament literature with reference to the development of civilization. Primitive ideas are put in primitive periods. In this work he has had much help from the literary study of the Bible called the higher criticism. He insists that the Bible did not drop down out of heaven de novo but that it is historically conditioned.

Creation Still Going On.

The liberal with his theory of evolution approaches the doctrine of God to sound a new note of emphasis. Creation is still going on. God is not on a big excursion somewhere while His world machinery runs down but is very busy just now energizing His universe and recreating it. Therefore He is immanent in his universe. Jesus said, "My Father worketh hitherto and I work." Paul said, "God is not far from every one of us." These texts would represent better than any others the liberal man's thought of God.

The liberal emphasizes the humanity of Jesus. Sometimes as in the case of the Unitarians, he denies altogether the divinity of Christ. Sometimes he holds to the divinity but insists that the doctrine of Christ's humanity is more beneficial to the race than the doctrine of his divinity. It is the humanity of Christ that makes his life in any sense an example for us. It is only his humanity that can afford a bond of sympathy with the race.

The liberal insists upon a new view of the origin of sin. Even in an orthodox Presbyterian church the other day the father of the baby spoke out in meeting and objected to the phrase of the preacher in the baptismal service, "born in sin." The father was enough embued with the spirit of liberalism to deny the doctrine that his child had any personal responsibility for what went on in the garden of Eden. The liberal insists that guilt may come only from personal transgression and he rejects the Augustinian view of a race lost without the operation of some mystical atonement process becoming operative in baptism.

Christ's Life and Death in Atonement.

The liberal insists upon new views of the atonement. Some would not attach much importance to the death of Christ as an atonement but would insist that it was the life of Christ that made atonement. Others would use the death of Christ but would interpret it in the light of the moral influence theory. They insist the God would never impose any mechanical or formal restrictions to the acceptance of a repentant sinner but that he has ever maintained the attitude insisted upon by Ezekiel that God had no pleasure in the death of the wicked.

The typical liberal lays a new emphasis on the value of this present life. He is seldom an unbeliever in the future life but lacks the assured hope that characterizes the orthodox. He insists that the present life is a good life. He indignantly rejects an abundant hymnology which ever speaks of humanity as poor worms of the dust and this world as a wilderness of woe, a desert drear. For the liberal, this is God's world and is the very best possible world for the realization of the Divine purposes. To inveigh against this present life seems to the liberal dangerous infidelity and unbelief in the benevolent purposes of God.

The liberal has a more appreciative attitude toward alien religions. For him, there is no "false" religion save the pretended acceptance of that which does not grip one, whether that be Christianity or Mohammedanism. The liberal does not like to say heathen. He finds much that is good in every other religion in the world and sometimes is so awed by the beauty of alien religions that he is remiss in missionary zeal.

Achievements of Liberalism.

The achievements of liberalism in a century of history are noteworthy. Whatever may be the fate of those religious bodies which are organized on a distinctly liberal platform, they have left a profound impression upon the religious world. They have given a new method to theology. The old method of dogmatic assertion is now dead. It no longer commands the allegiance of able men. The new method of scientific inquiry has come to stay.

A certain theological freedom has been achieved by the liberal movement. Heresy trials are growing more odious and less frequent. The odium theologicum is a less dangerous weapon. There is now a place to go for the man who is thrown out of an orthodox church. The older churches hesitate more and more to dispense with the services of a great thinker because he fails to think in the traditional channels.

Perhaps one of the greatest helps that has come to the church is the practical eradication of infidelity through the liberal Christianity. Once every village had a defiant unbeliever who loved to trouble the faithful. Since the church for a long time had no answer for him, he waxed great in power. We have no Bob Ingersoll on the American platform. Mangasarian in Chicago is the nearest American representative and he has only local fame and a limited constituency for so great a city as Chicago. Even he claims now to be religious. Blatant and noisy infidelity is dead, killed by the keen logic of the liberal.

Not Devoid of Mistakes.

While liberalism has been a mighty force in the modern church, more significant than any other force perhaps, it would be too much to expect that it would make no mistakes. As we have said, the man who is genuinely loyal to Jesus will ask of every religious teacher whether his doctrine arises naturally out of New Testament Christianity or whether it is antagonistic to it. We wish to indicate in closing some of the points of divergence between the point of view of modern liberalism and the point of view of Jesus, and his apostles.

Liberalism has no sense of social solidarity. Born out of individualism, it will remain individualistic to the end. For the success of a point of view, a liberal will sometimes wreck a church or a denomination. For him, an intellectual opinion is of more value than Christian unity. It is nothing to him to disrupt the body of Christ. Jesus was much concerned about the unity of his group. He withheld some of his own opinions because "ye are not able to bear them now." Paul did the same. With both Jesus and Paul, human brotherhood was of more importance

Our Readers' Opinions

Gates, Lanham and the "Gray Beards"

I suppose that Brother Lanham refers to Brother Hayden and myself as the "Graybeards" who took exception to Brother Gates' article read before the recent Congress. This characterization is not very descriptive. It was not necessary to use the word "gray" to present a striking contrast between the men referred to. Almost any kind of beard will do these days to distinguish a man from the average up-to-date gentleman. The razor is as much in demand, at the beginning of the twentieth century, as "modern thought" is. But let that pass. I claim no exemption from criticism, and no special consideration on account of my "graybeard." It is truth that I am seeking, and not personal commendation or exemption from criticism.

Brother Hayden is entirely capable of taking care of himself, so I will only define my own attitude with respect to Brother Gates' essay. I simply questioned, first of all, the use he made of the phrase "Modern Thought." I have noticed a tendency, especially with young men, to use this phrase with respect to certain theological notions, when, as a matter of fact these notions are as old as Celsus, if not as old as Apostolic days. It makes me tired to hear many of the old skeptical notions presented by our young theologues as if these notions were the newest things under the sun. I do not wish my language to imply that anything Brother Gates' presented was either old or new skepticism. I simply criticised the use of the phrase "Modern Thought," and stated that it was often used like charity to "cover a multitude of sins."

But I did find fault somewhat with what I considered the loose way in which Brother Gates used the term "love." I felt sure that in magnifying this greatest of all the graces, he was in danger of making too little of the severity of God, when the Apostle Paul distinctly emphasizes both God's goodness and His severity. I was told afterwards that Brother Gates' use of the word "love" included the justice of God. If this was his meaning, it would have been much better to have stated it, as his essay was evidently, as it stood, a strong plea for Universalism. If it is contrary to the love of God that His severity was exercised toward nations and people, as recorded in Old Testament history, then it seems to me that it must be contrary to the love of God to inflict upon any one, everlasting punishment. Surely temporal punishment for sin is not as severe as eternal punishment for sin.

But to show Brother Gates that even the Graybeards believe in "the right to differ, but not to divide," I will refer to some strictures which Brother Hayden makes on me in the Century of April 14. He refers to a statement of mine in my History of the Disciples of Christ, in which I suggest that there may be one Baptism and yet three elements in that Baptism, and then he goes on to intimate that one of these elements, viz., suffering, is supplied by the Devil. Now this is an entire perversion of my position. If Brother Hayden will look carefully at the language used by John the Baptist, in respect to baptism in the Holy Spirit, he will see that Christ, according to John, would baptize in Holy Spirit and fire. This baptism in fire I believe is a baptism in suffering, and is referred to when Jesus asked His disciples if they could be baptized in the baptism in which He would be baptized. In short, the element of water is that supplied by the human side while the Holy Spirit and suffering are supplied by the divine. Nor do I say that all these elements are supplied exactly at the same time, though this is altogether possible. For a full discussion of this whole matter, the reader is referred to my volume entitled "The Fundamental Error of Christendom," and also my "Plea of the Disciples of Christ." My main thought is that in every Scriptural baptism there is the human side and the divine side, just as there is in everything connected with salvation. I have never dogmatically affirmed my position with respect to the baptism in Holy Spirit and fire, though I think it can be defended on very good grounds. However, in stating my position, I have usually put it tentatively, and I would still very reverently offer it as a suggestion worthy of consideration.

Now a word about these differences. Just here is where I think love is and ought to be supreme. When my brother and I do not see alike, I am sorry for him and glad for myself. I am sorry for him because I know he is wrong, and I am glad for myself because the right to differ makes way for the exercise of that very love which is greater than either faith or hope. I most profoundly love Brother Gates, Brother Lanham and Brother Hayden, notwithstanding I am convinced that in some things they are all wrong. But how could I exercise charity toward them if they were all right? If all our differences could be settled there would be little or no use for the thirteenth chapter of the First Corinthians, and it might safely be cut out of all our Bibles. Our Congress ought to be a fine clearing house for the discussion of great questions without any regard whatever to either the orthodoxy or heterodoxy of the opinions advocated. If there was any one thing for which the pioneers of our religious movement contended more than anything else, it was "the right to differ but not to divide." I do not care what Brother Gates may say about this or that attribute of the divine Father while he accepts Him as the Heavenly Father and His Son, Jesus Christ, as the only Saviour. Nor do I care what may be the view of Brother Hayden with respect to the baptism in the Holy Spirit while he continues to carry out the human side in harmony with the New Testament Scriptures. God will take care of the divine side, and we need not, therefore, trouble about how He does it, though how He does it may be an interesting question for reverent consideration.

Dr. Gates Not So Far Astray

I do not remember reading anything with greater satisfaction than the lecture of Errett Gates. More than thirty years ago, Prof. Seelye wrote "Ecce Homo." It caused a tremendous sensation. The writer was one of those who were denounced for saying that "Ecce Homo" was an epoch-making book, that was doing a work that had been needed for fifteen hundred years. Trinitarian theology had ignored the humanity of Jesus, and had preached his divinity in such incomprehensible terminology, that it had robbed the world of the mediatorship of the Christ. "Ecce Homo" has been followed by many great works indicating that the title that Jesus applied to himself more frequently than all other appellations combined, "The Son of Man," the embodiment of mankind, that side of the nature of the Christ that gives man love and confidence, his mediatorship, has been restored. Brother Gates might have included in his line of thought, the theological distinction between religion and morality.

The writer has been censured for declaring that religion was the only true morality, and that complete morality is all there is in religion. An evangelist in Chicago shouted at his audience, "Lay to one side all your goodness. God hates your morality." "The good moral man is the worst man in the community," used to be a cardinal dogma of theology. The writer can name a preacher who declared he would rather have his son associate with a gambler or a saloon keeper than with a good moral man. This dogma teaches that there can be irreligious moral men and immoral religious men. The writer has known hundreds of immoral men and women, who believed that they were very religious, holy, sanctified, sinless, had attained the higher life, the second blessing.

One of Ingersoll's keenest trusts was the sneering question, "Will the note of a very religious man be discounted at a bank any more readily than the note of an infidel? Who trusts a very religious man any more than he does an infidel?" No more pernicious, polluting dogma has cursed the world, than the theological divorce of religion from morality, the substitution of belief of dogma for the Christ life, the Christ character. The writer's definition of religion is, whole-souled belief of the Christ teachings, whole-souled living the Christ life, whole-souled realizing the Christ character, in every thought and word and deed, in all relations of life, in every sphere of action. Such religion alone is complete, true morality. And complete, true morality is true, complete religion. Jesus never hinted, no inspired speaker or writer of the Bible hints, at any distinction between religion and morality.

If by God immanent in men, the Christ immanent in men, the Holy Spirit immanent in men, Brother Gates means a whole-souled belief of the truth in regard to what they are, of what they teach, and a whole-souled living such belief, in all thought, action and life, in all relations of life, in every sphere of action, the writer believes in such immanent God, in such immanent Christ, in such immanent Holy Spirit, and that each is immanent in the same, and to the same extent as the others. The writer does not believe that human beings are possessed and obsessed by either an all divine being, as demoniacs were possessed by demons, through direct, mechanical, hypnotic influence. The only rational moral influence that one spirit can exert over another spirit, is through the rational moral power of truth, and of truth alone.

Jesus is immanent in men to the extent that they believe, love, live his teaching, his life, his character. God is immanent in nature, in the universe, now as fully as he ever has been in the past, but the evolution of nature, of the universe, manifests that immanence in phenomena differing from the past. God is immanent in the phenomena of natural law, as truly as in the "signs" recorded in the Bible. The signs of the Bible were not supernatural. They were superhuman, a higher use of nature, laws of nature, than was possible to man. There may be a danger of pantheism in the idea of the immanence of God. If the conception is that absolute reason, absolute spirit, is the self-existent, unconditioned, absolute, eternal being, the origin of all being, the first cause of all phenomena, the power that controls the universe, then there is no pantheism in the conception of the immanence of God. That God ever has been, is now and ever will be immanent in that sense, is rational theism.

The Book World

THE STORY OF THE NEGRO, by Booker T. Washington. Few men have had more influence in shaping the thought of any generation regarding one whole section of the human race than has Booker T. Washington in his interpretation of Negro capacities and values. Mr. Washington has not only built up a great educational plant for the training of his people to competence and industry, but he has written a series of volumes which now run to some seven or eight titles, in further explanation of his life work and ambitions for his race. He has recently published a two volume work, "The Story of the Negro." It is an accurate and interesting narrative regarding the black race from its beginnings in Africa to the present time. It is divided into three parts: the Negro in Africa, the Negro as a slave, and the Negro as a free man. The first part is full of interesting material regarding the land and the people which Mr. Roosevelt's recent trip has done so much to make themes of interest to western readers. In the second part, which deals with the Negro as a slave, Mr. Washington has spoken in an impartial and constructive manner on a most difficult theme. But it is in the third part in which the Negro as a free man is considered that the real value of the work lies. The problems of the Reconstruction period, the obligations of society to a dependent race, the ability of the Negro to perform his part in the social order when he is given an opportunity, and some of the results of Negro education and industrial training are set forth in a narrative which adds incalculably to the available materials for a study of this great social question. (New York: Doubleday, Page & Company. 2 vols. Pp. 332, 404. $3, net.)

THE SLAVERY OF TODAY by Chas A. Swan. This is the story of the slave trade in Angola, the Portuguese territory of West Africa. Angola lies just south of the Congo Free State. It is a vast region, rich in resources but its population has increased little under Portuguese rule on account of the exploitation of the natives and the trading to them of rum. Mr. Swan has been a missionary there for more than a score of years and writes from a thorough first hand knowledge and with numerous illustrations whereby the camera furnishes coroborating evidence. His book is of interest just at this time when practically all the great cocoa manufacturers have signed the agreement not to use cocoa from the Portuguese plantations until the slave trade is stopped. San Thome, an island on the coast is the scief scene of the traffic. The native traders in human beings have been to no small extent replaced by whites and even the officers of the interior stations make it a means of profit. The story is revolting and civilization should demand that it cease. (Glasgow: Pickering and Inglis. Pp. 202. Profusely illustrated.)

IN AFTER DAYS. The subject of the future life is so full of significance to the Christian that it is not strange that there should be presented from time to time some further statement in the effort to bring the discussion up to date. Perhaps the most significant series of utterances on the theme is that provided by the Ingersoll Annual Lectures at Harvard. These have summed up the evidence regarding the future life and have given the testimony of some of the acutest, scientific, philosophic and literary workers during recent years. In a recent volume "In After Days," whose subtitle is "Thoughts on the Future Life," a series of essays on this subject is presented. Such writers as W. D. Howells, Colonel Higginson, John Bigelow, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, Julia Ward Howe, H. N. Eldon, Dr. W. H. Thomson, Henry James, and Professor Ferrero, have discussed the matter from various angles. Several of these treatments are more or less emotional in their character. Perhaps the most valuable is the study made by Henry James, in which he traces his own personal growth in appreciation of the future life from a position of agnosticism and indifference to one of appreciation and personal interest. Professor Ferrero reviews the subject from the historical side of the doctrine The book is an interesting survey of some of the considerations which modern workers in various fields face when they reflect upon one of the most fundamental doctrines of the Christian life.

THE LIFE OF ST. CLARE, ascribed to St. Thomas of Celano of the Order of Friars Minor, A. D. 1255-1261, translated and edited from the earliest MSS. by Fr. Paschal Robinson of the same Order, with an appendix containing the Rules of St. Clare. The little town of Assisi, among the hills of northern Italy, is famous as the home of two saints of the Middle Ages. One was St. Francis and the other St. Clare. Each has a church in that pilgrimage town, and each founded a religious order, the one, the Franciscans, the other the Sisters of Charity, or Sisters of the Poor. A recent volume from the Dolphin Press of Philadelphia contains the life of St. Clare from a work which is believed to be from St. Thomas of Celano of the Order of the Friars Minor. In this beautiful little volume, printed on cream paper in the brown ink and abundantly illustrated with admirable reproductions of the chief places of interest in Assisi, we have a statement regarding the chief sources for the life of St. Clare, a narrative of that life, a list of the miracles related of Santa Clara, and an appendix containing the rules of the order of poor sisters which she founded. The volume is a charming contribution to the memory of this Saint, and also to an appreciation of the art which her story has inspired. (Philadelphia: Dolphin Press. $1.25, net.)

THE EARLIEST SOURCES FOR THE LIFE OF JESUS, by F. Crawford Burkitt, M. A., D. D., Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge, England, is as clear and readable a statement and solution of the so-called synoptic problem as has appeared. The author characterizes Matthew as "a fresh edition of Mark, revised, rearranged, and enriched with new material"; while Luke is "a new historical work, made by combining parts of Mark with parts of other documents." The chief of these other documents is the so-called "Logia" or "Sayings of Jesus" which, however, our author prefers to symbolize by the letter Q because he does not regard it as a mere collection of sayings but as including certain narratives as well. He cautions against too positive assurance in such attempts as Harnack has made at reconstructing the "Logia." Professor Burkitt argues for the historical faithfulness of our Lord's ministry as sketched in Mark, and contends earnestly against the assumption that there is any essential deviation from Mark's picture in either Matthew's or Luke's gospel. (Boston: Houghton & Mifflin Company. Pp. 131. $.50, net.)

ASPECTS OF CHRIST, by Principal W. B. Selbie, the successor of Principal Fairbairn in Mansfield College, Oxford. Principal Selbie is a writer and speaker of force, well known in the Free Churches of England. His recent volume gathers together a number of articles prepared by him for various journals, notably the Expositor, all of which, however, have the central theme of the character of Jesus as set forth in various pronouncements of biblical and modern times. After a preliminary statement regarding Christian doctrine, he reviews the portrait of Jesus presented by the synoptic Gospel, Paul, the Apocalypse, John, the testimony of Jesus himself, the creeds of Christendom, the teachings of the Reformation, and the churches of today, concluding with a chapter on "The Churches and the Faith." The message of the book is not critical, but it is sufficiently constructive to be of genuine value to all who concern themselves with the central problem of the Christian faith. (New York: Hodder and Stoughton. Pp. 276. $1.50, net.)

TWICE BORN MEN, by Mr. Harold Begbie, is called by its author "a clinic in regeneration." It is a collection of religious experiences which might serve as an interesting side-light upon Professor James' "Varieties of Religious Experience." Mr. Begbie has gathered into this interesting and sometimes thrilling bundle of portraiture a good many telling features in the lives of rough and ready folks such as the lower orders of London society furnish. Perhaps the trained psychologist will have some questions to ask regarding the final results of the religious lives of these converted people. But the increasing wonder of religion is made clearer by the narratives here set forth. (New York: Fleming H. Revell Company. Pp. 280. $1.25, net.)

LOST FACE, by Jack London. Jack London is a writer whose themes are nearly all selected from the region of travel and adventure. His earlier work was wholly concerned with the new regions of the Yukon and Alaska, and in a recent volume, whose title, "Lost Face," is the theme of the first story, he has gathered a number of narratives of a very readable sort. The rough and ready life of the North, the summary justice meted out to criminals, the perils and sufferings incident to the extreme cold of the region, and the charm of woman's presence in a country where there are so few, all find treatment in this collection of a half dozen stories out of the far North. (New York: The Macmillan Company, 1910. Pp. 240, illustrated. $1.50.)

THE LAWS OF THE INNER KINGDOM, by Henry W. Clark. The author is perhaps best known as the author of "The Philosophy of Christian Experience," though several other volumes have come from his hand, including "The Gospel of St. John" in the Westminster New Testament. The present work is a collection of sermons on such topics as "Paul's Conception of Conversion," "How Christ Suits the Soul," "The Christ in the Christian," "The Sword of Christ," "Christ as Test and Divider,' etc., to the number of twenty. Excellent materials are these studies for private reading as aids to the religious life. (New York: Fleming H. Revell Company. Pp. 278. $1.25, net.)

THE LEADING FACTS OF AMERICAN HISTORY. A new revised edition, by D. H. Montgomery. A graphically written recounting of the events considered as the most commanding in our nation's history. It gives a history of the nation by means of what the author considers the turning points and the beginnings of movements. It is profusely illustrated and has many excellent maps. The style is interesting and is adapted to the demands of youth. (Boston: Ginn & Company. Pp. 400. $1.)

A STORY OF THE TRUSTS

BY JANE RICHARDSON

CHAPTER XXVII—Continued.

Clark ran wildly onward, the rain dashing in his face. His distracted mind suddenly fixed itself on Mullens. Instantly he was possessed of the idea that he was the appointed instrument of divine retribution. For he had planned the man's destruction with that of his own children. He had watched him secretly and of late had haunted his grounds after nightfall. He knew he would probably find him at this midnight hour, working over his papers in his private study—a small retired room with a French window opening into a secluding nook surrounded by a thick shrubbery. He had been foiled yonder—yes, by the dead—he would try again elsewhere, and make a finish of this part of the work which he was appointed to do.

Inspired by the thought he quickened his steps, and hurried on through the flooded streets, across the gloomy campus, the wind twisting the trees above his head, and snapping off branches which fell crashing about him. He avoided the gate of Mullens' grounds and bursting through the hedge, crept silently toward the house.

The man was there. The casement window stood ajar, the lamp on his desk guiding Clark's stealthy footsteps. Mullens had removed his coat and, unconscious of all else, his grizzled head was bent above the rows of figures, by which his attention was absorbed.

If there are about us unseen intelligences to whose eyes the approach of evil—the presence of danger is apparent, they seldom, if ever, interupt the course of destiny. The riven tree breaks across the traveller's path; the avalanche loosened by a dropping pebble, crushes the creature waiting dumbly in its track; the victim unconsciously bares his breast to the assassin; the fatal bullet speeds unerringly to its mark. No voice whispers a warning, no power, intervening, stays the hand of doom!

Mullens, his eyes bent upon his papers, was oblivious to all about him. The sputtering of the light as the half-opened window blew further ajar, interrupted him for an instant; he arose, and without closing it made it secure.

Upon that act his life hung trembling. Clark without, watched him with glaring eyes. Had he closed the window—shot home the bolt—the man intent upon murder must have retraced his steps, balked for a time.

In that peaceable community Mullens had no fear of his life. He had taken no precautions for his safety, even after closing the Works, and he liked this quiet room, isolated and cut off from the rest of the house where he could be secure from intrusion. He seated himself once more, so intent on what he was doing that he scarcely knew he had left his chair.

Clark, drenched and dripping, crept forward, and from the threshold sprang upon his enemy from the rear and clutched his throat with fingers of steel. The attack was so sudden, so furious, that the strangling victim could not recover himself. He attempted to rise, to loosen that suffocating grip, but he could have as easily burst the slowly-contracting folds of a python!

With the superhuman strength of a madman Clark dragged him to the floor, never relaxing his hold. Mullens writhed and struggled in agony, his eyes protruding, his face black and contused, his lips, dripping with blood and foam, parted in a ghastly grin. Again the window was shaken in the gust and the flame of the lamp flared up and was extinguished.

Clark temblingly felt for his victim's heart. It had ceased to beat. As he bent over the lifeless body he imagined that he heard footsteps approaching. Impelled once more by the instinct of flight and escape, he leaped over the threshold as he had come. He had thought of this—the final act—that should conclude the tragedy which he had slowly evolved.

To the west, in the heart of the woods, was a sheet of water known as "The Devil's Well," dismal and forbidding, hemmed in by almost impenetrable thickets. There were strange fissures in its bed where it was said no soundings had ever been made and this ill-omened water now lured the maniac to destruction. As he ran he glanced back once; the room which he had quitted was still in darkness. Suddenly the window shone, and another, and yet another, till the whole house was quickly alight. He did not look again. He ran onward with quickened haste, skirting the fields, avoiding the road, until he reached the woods. The path lay before him as he remembered it; for in the darkness and his mad blindness, he could see nothing. He crashed through the dripping reeds, tore apart the interlacing alders and came to the edge of the water. He stood upon its verge, lifted his face to the sky, tossed his writhing hands above his head, leaped, sunk, and the stagnant waters closed over him.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Teddy's Tribulations.

Teddy remained in the shabby West Side boarding house until the first of May. He had a room at the opposite end of the hall corresponding to that of his friend. It was a little less dreary in that it was at the front of the house, but it was not much better than Jackson's shabby little den. Teddy, with his womanish knack of keeping things tidy, took matters into his own hands and at length made the place more habitable.

He was almost unable to eat the food provided for the boarders after Susan's well cooked fare, and he did not wonder that the men bolted the meal with all possible speed, and immediately adjourned to the nearest beer saloon. He, from the country where even the poor may keep clean and live decently, if they choose, found it almost unendurable. His fellow-boarders were, with few exceptions, employees of the neighboring mills and factories and showed no desire for anything better. Teddy wondered if this were due to their innate coarseness and brutishness; or if it were the inevitable results of steady deterioration effected by surroundings they could not alter. Their reading was a sensational newspaper, servile in its toadying to millionaires, and false and treacherous in its shallow profession of sympathy for the poor.

Not far from the boarding-house, as Teddy speedily discovered, was a branch of the Public Library with a good reading-room, and here he spent many of his evenings and endeavored to forget his troubles. Meantime he was still idle. Jackson had done his utmost for him, and he began to grow tired of ineffectual attempts and of Teddy's troubled countenance, which was becoming more and more careworn.

At first Teddy felt justified in using the street cars, but he soon realized that he must not spend a cent needlessly. He had come with strong credentials from Randall, who had many friends in Chicago, but with none could he find a place. If he could not find employment in his own line of work he would gratefully have accepted anything, no matter what, so that it was honest work. He tried other quarters of the city but was turned away, often with a churlish "No." At many places he found posted on the doors, "No admission" or "No hands wanted." When he could secure an audience with a foreman, or, still more rarely, with a member of the firm, the duties proved unfamiliar, and when he asked if he might not be given a trial he was brutally informed that "they were not taking on apprentices of his age."

Several weeks passed in this way, when he was given a little encouragement in a small factory in South Chicago. The proprietor appeared to be favorably impressed with him, asked him many questions, and manifested interest in him, personally. The wages offered were small, but Teddy reflected that the money would keep him, though inadequate for the support of a man and his wife; so that the longed-for home was as far in the future as ever.

It was apparently settled, and he went back to the boarding house to impart the good news to Jackson when he came to dinner.

"I told you it'd turn out all right!" said Jackson optimistically, "All a fellow needs is a little sand, he's bound to git on in Chicago; it's a great old place!"

Teddy rose at daylight, put on his working clothes with as much pride and satisfaction as a soldier dons his uniform for action. He took his lunch with him, and set out with a grateful heart. He was to report at the office, which he did. The man to whom he had talked was not there, and a young man was temporarily occupying his place:

"Is Mr. Rivington here?" asked Teddy. "I was to report to him this morning."

"No; he was called suddenly to New York last night. He didn't leave any word with me for a new man. Sometimes Mr. Rivington makes promises like that—to let men down easy!" and the young man laughed.

Teddy felt distress that he was not able to conceal, and the young man was sufficiently touched by it to say:

"If you're willing—I could give you something just for today. We are short of laborers and you can help about the yards."

Teddy replied huskily: "I'll do anything that'll keep me from tramping the streets!"

He was sent out into an open space behind the shops, where he sorted old metal, and helped load, and unload trucks, and turned his hand willingly to whatever there was to do.

At six o'clock he was paid one dollar, and asked anxiously if he should come back again the next day. He was told "No." Then he remembered that even for this poor, rough work, other men had already been engaged. He went home with his wage in his pocket. It was the first money he had earned since he had left Carlinville. The little he had brought with him was almost gone.

Shortly after this he came upon Randall on State street and would have slipped past him without speaking, but Randall saw him, stopped and held out his hand.

"I'm glad to see you, Teddy. How are you prospering?"

"Not very well," said Teddy, with a melancholy smile, "but I'm tryin' to stick it out."

"That's right," said Randall, "and you know I'm ready to do anything I can."

Teddy was well aware of it, but he had been so confident of success, of finding work at once, that in his humiliation he was trying to keep the truth from his friends in Carlinville—above all from Mary, from Susan, and from Randall himself.

Randall took in the situation at a glance, Teddy's whole appearance had altered for the worse; his clothes were shabby—inevitable in the smoke and soot of a dirty city—his shoes were broken and worn from his long and fruitless tramps, he was thin and hollow-eyed and seemed to have quite lost his old vigor and hopefulness.

"I've met you just in time," said Randall. "I'm on my way to get a little something to eat. Come and lunch with me, and we'll talk it over."

"My clothes are too shabby—I'm not hungry!" Teddy replied, shamefacedly.

"Nonsense!" exclaimed Randall. "Your clothes are all right, and you'll be all the better for a good beef-steak."

"No! no! I can't, indeed——" and Teddy smiled faintly. But Randall was not to be put off and they walked away together. An abundant and appetizing meal was ordered, the first that Teddy had had since he left Carlinville. He discovered that he was hungry and ate heartily, feeling his spirits and courage return.

Randall did not at once inquire into his affairs, but cheerfully answered the eager and numerous questions Teddy asked about Carlinville, which betrayed hopeless homesickness. He had read the account of Mullens' murder, and of the inquest in which Clark's insanity and his attempt to kill his own family had been disclosed; of the big funeral that had been attended by eminent people from all parts of the country. He had also read, later, of the discovery of Clark's body, which had been saved from burial in the Potter's Field by Randall himself, as Mary had informed him.

"The poor girl, Jessie, was ill for days from the shock, and she will never be quite herself again. The poor little children would have been in terrible distress, but they were cared for by Brainard's sister and Miss Crofton. Nobody is ever neglected in Carlinville."

"And what will the Mullens family do?" Teddy inquired.

"The reports of B. F.'s will were true, it seems. He left the bulk of his property to his wife during her life time, with a sufficient provision for the girls, but no mention was made of Billy. No one knows where he is. Even his mother hasn't heard from him for a long time. He's probably stranded somewhere, or dead. The house is to be sold if a buyer can be found, and the family will move to New York in the fall, I believe."

"And that's the end of Mullens. I'm glad of it!" said Teddy, vindictively.

"Come! Don't talk like that!" Randall replied, rebukingly. "Clark was mad, or he would have known that the murder he committed was useless. Nothing but harm comes of such crimes; nothing was ever accomplished by assassination. Working men—and above all—working women, suffer wrongs that cry to heaven for redress; but the moment they begin to stab and shoot they alienate all law-abiding people; and any help that they may ever get must come from this source."

"They're mighty slow to act!" muttered Teddy.

"You forget, too, that Mullens was but one of thousands—the natural product of a system fostered by our institutions, which has been developed and thrives with the full knowledge and consent of the government. Single-handed he could have done nothing!"

Teddy listened thoughtfully, and admitted that Randall was right.

"What a splendid fellow he is," he thought. "If there were more men like him in business, in politics,—everywhere, it would be a blessed thing for the country."

Randall asked him a few kindly questions about himself; but Teddy's answers were evasive and guarded. Randall knew pretty well how matters stood.

"I have a friend out on Canalport avenue—not much of a place—but I'll see if he's got anything. I'm going back home tonight, but I'll go out there this afternoon and I'll drop you a line this evening," Randall said.

Teddy gave him his address and thanked him as well as he could; it had been a long time since anyone had shown a human interest in him, aside from Jackson's first desultory friendliness.

"If you're short of money I can let you have what you need until you get on your feet."

"No, no," said Teddy hastily, "I don't need any now; if I should, later, I'll let you know."

They left the restaurant together. Teddy watched him board the street car with the emotions of a man who sees a friendly face fade and disappear upon the deck of an outbound ship, he left behind, a stranger in a strange land.

The promised letter came in the morning. "It is not much of a job for a skilled workman, but better than nothing,"—the old makeshift, thought Teddy bitterly,—"but I would advise you to try it till something better turns up."

He did, and for two weeks went daily to the place where he once more performed the coarse, heavy, ill-paid work of a common laborer. He received a dollar and a quarter a day, and this furnished his car fare and enabled him to meet his board and laundry bills. He decided to move over in the neighborhood of the factory and gave up his room. He bade Jackson good bye, to his great relief; for Teddy's dejected face was a decided kill-joy to the careless, kindly fellow, though he had really tried his best to find work for him.

Teddy found another, ever worse boarding-place, with a rougher lot of men, poorer food, a poorer room, and the same dirt and discomfort. But he saved ten cents a day on his street car fare and fifty cents on his board, which enabled him to endure it. It was not long before he felt himself failing physically for want of proper food, inability to sleep, and lack of congenial companionship. He came home at night worn out with the strain of the dull toil to which he was unaccustomed, and was glad to go to his bed early. He had no money to spend on the better theaters, and the vulgarity of the poorer was repulsive to him. Sometimes he sat in a saloon where there was really good music, for the price of a glass of beer; but he soon found that such places were the resorts of criminals and abandoned women, whose like in shamelessness and wickedness he could not have believed existed. With his good looks he could not possibly escape their notice, whether he resented it or not. The very grossness of the evil he encountered in such places was his salvation, for after a few experiences he went no more.

In need of some relaxation he at last found another reading room in the neighborhood, a philanthropic institution, but after he had looked over the stale newspapers, the old magazines which had evidently been rescued from the waste basket, and the dull books, many of them heavy, theological treatises which had burdened some one's shelves and had been discarded, he gave that up also. The religious texts on the walls irritated him—he was not a heathen, and he wondered why such places of refuge were so dreary and why they so persistently offered texts to the wretched loiterers there who were in dire need of bread and shelter.

He kept the place Randall found for him, though it was unrelieved drudgery, without the slightest prospect of betterment in any way. He rose one morning, went down to his breakfast, and read in the morning paper, on the front page, a flaunting scare-head:

"BRYANT AND DUVAL'S PLANING MILL DESTROYED BY FIRE."

He hurriedly swallowed the coarse food that was set before him and walked over to see the ruins. He found the other workmen there, scores like himself, thrown out of employment, many of them with dependent families.

Out of work! The ominous phrase had become a terror to him. The long, weary search must begin again. He set about it without delay—and spent the whole day, asking for work, walking from place to place but refused everywhere. The next morning he set forth again. He had but two five dollar notes left; one he secreted carefully about his person, the other he placed in his pocket-book and set off to the business district. He walked the entire distance and in a side street, in the "tenderloin" district, he had to force his way through a crowd collected in front of a dilapidated tenement in which the police were making a raid. The patrol wagon stood at the door, the onlookers jeered and hooted, with the wolfish instinct that is gratified with the capture of their kind. Teddy passed on and thrust his hand into his pocket. He had been robbed; his money and watch had both been stolen!

It was the last blow. He crawled home again, wondering if it were worth while to try any longer. There were easy ways to end it—the lake and the slimy river had closed over hundreds of wretches like himself. But he thought of Mary, and the despair in which he was plunged passed over him.

The Call

By Phillips Brooks.

The while I listened came a word—
  I knew not whence, I could not see;
But when my waiting spirit heard,
  I cried: "Lord, here am I; send me!"

For in that word was all contained—
  The Master's wish, the servant's joy,
Worth of the prize to be attained,
  And sweetness of the time's employ.

I turned and went—along the way
  That word was food and air and light:
I feasted on it all the day,
  And rested on it all the night.

I wondered; but when soon I came
  To where the word complete must be,
I called my wonder by its name—
  For lo! the Word I sought was He.

Stick to the Farm

"Stick to the farm," says the President
  To the wide-eyed farmer boy,
Then he hies him back to his White House home,
  With its air of rustic joy.

"Stick to the farm," says the railroad king
  To the lad who looks afar,
Then hikes him back on the double-quick
  To his rustic private car.

"Stick to the farm," says the clergyman
  To the youth on the worm-fence perch,
Then lays his ear to the ground to hear
  A call to a city church.

"Stick to the farm," says the doctor wise
  To those who would break the rut,
Then hies him where the appendix grows
  In bountiful crops to cut.—New York Sun.

Lost

BY Z. I. D.

"Good morning, little girl. What do you want and who are you?" inquired Mrs. Keems of the small stranger standing at the door in the dim light of dawn.

Vainly waiting a few moments for an answer, she went closer and taking her gently by the arm, she suddenly exclaimed, "Bless me! if the child isn't walking in her sleep."

At the shrill words of surprise, the long fringed eyelids flew open. "Who called me? Where am I?" she cried, looking about her in bewilderment.

"Come in, child," urged the motherly woman. "I am afraid that you are lost. But sit down and rest until we have breakfast and then, may be, you can remember where you live."

"It is indeed odd where she came from," remarked Mr. Keems, sharply eyeing the newcomer as his wife briefly told him at the breakfast table the little she knew of her.

"I am acquainted with everyone in the neighborhood," he continued, "but I don't know you," and with a kindly smile he gave her a generous helping of ham and eggs.

"Where do you live?" asked Mrs. Keems with deep interest.

"I am visiting my uncle and aunt, but papa and mamma live in the city of D——. They expect me home today. My uncle's people think that I took the early train, because they knew that I intended to leave before daylight."

"I was awake," she added, "nearly all night for fear I would miss the car. Our missionary sunbeams meet once a month and today it is my turn to have them at our house. Soon after I fell asleep, I dreamed it was time for me to start. I have no idea which way I came, but I think I must have walked a long distance because I feel so tired. I do not know how I shall ever get back," and the little girl began to cry.

"Eat your breakfast, Minnie," urged the kind woman, "and do not worry, for I am sure we can help you to find your home."

"The city that you live in is fifty miles from here. After awhile I will drive down to market and you can go along and take the train then, if you want to," said Mr. Keems, comfortingly.

"But," she replied in a troubled tone, "my purse is in a box at Uncle's where they will not think of looking."

"There is some one driving up the lane in a carriage with a span of horses. I wonder who it can be," said Mrs. Keems, glancing out, as the beautiful ponies pranced up to the gate.

Some one knocked and Mr. Keems opened the door. There stood a tall, handsome gentleman in black. "Have you seen or heard anything of a little girl, wearing a blue silk kimona and dressing slippers and having her head uncovered? She has yellow curls, large blue eyes and is of the age of twelve years. We have traced her as far as here from Four Towns on the north turnpike where we live. She intended to take the early morning train, but we found that she had not been at the station, and we have been searching everywhere for her since we missed her."

"There is a little girl here who answers to that description," said Mr. Keems cautiously, not knowing how far he could trust the stranger.

The King's Highway

By Jean C. Gulick.

"She never brought my book back, and she has gone to Hastings, to be gone, I don't know how long."

"Who has gone, and what book has she taken?"

"The King's Highway—my pretty new book of stories that Uncle Fred gave me. And that horrid Clara Fletcher has taken it and gone!" Betty sank upon the couch in despair and sought comfort in tears.

"Perhaps it is not as bad as that, Betty dear," said Aunt Lucy, comfortingly.

"Oh, yet it is! At first she said she would bring it and then she got cross every time I mentioned it, and wouldn't speak to me."

"She may have lost it and has no money to buy another to replace it, and does not know just what to do."

"Oh, but then why doesn't she say so, so that we can be friends? I can never, never feel the same towards her now!"

"That is very true, Betty; I have felt that way many times."

"Did any one ever act in that way towards you, Aunt Lucy?"

"Yes, indeed! I have had, I believe, more than my share of lending."

"Won't you tell me about it?" Betty brightened visibly at the prospect of sympathy in her misery.

"Well, not so very many years ago I took a cottage at the seashore for the summer. I am very fond of young people, and I gathered about me a crowd of the boys and girls, and prepared for a jolly house-party. I must not be too hard upon my guests, but I must tell you just what I learned of their characters in those two weeks. My chief annoyance was a young girl of sixteen, pretty, attractive, and delightful company, but who possessed this habit of borrowing. She was of well-to-do and well connected family, and for this very reason perhaps I was the more disappointed when she fell in my estimation. First of all, she neglected to send her clothing to the laundry until she was reduced to her last clean suit, then wore that until she was positively disgusting to behold. There was nothing to do when she reached this stage but to loan her an entire suit of my own, for being small myself, they fitted her exactly. Strange to relate, also, she objected to anything which was not of the very latest cut and design. Frequently I have had her pout and sulk in her room and threaten not to come downstairs at all, until I have been obliged to lend her one of my prettiest costumes. Then, in the matter of little things. Her grandmother's home was not far from my cottage, and often she would go to see her, sometimes spending the night—and frequently I have had to send my maid to the house to get my rain-coat or umbrella, or something else she had borrowed, before I could go out myself. It was entirely against her principles to have bathing stockings, towels, pins, garters, belts or handkerchiefs, not to mention stationery and stamps,—these I must have loaned her by the dozen, and they were worn or torn or stained beyond recognition, when at length, after much coaxing, I persuaded her to return them. The things I actually lost I will not attempt to number, but two things especially aggravated me. I had a weakness for dainty white sunbonnets, and one of these I loaned her to go crabbing one day, but, alas! It was I who was 'caught.' She wore it all that day and the next on the beach, and the following day I saw it gracefully adorning the head of a Jewess, who passed me on the street. Then there was my little scarf pin (not valuable, but just a keepsake of mine that I thought a great deal of on account of its associations), I happened to lend her to pin her belt one rainy night when she had gotten wet and a change of clothing was necessary. This she wore without compunction, and was still wearing when she bade me good-bye. The sunbonnet she declared she had returned to me.

"All these things were mere trifles, too trivial to mention, or to be remembered, but I cannot let this incidence go by without a word as to the effect it had upon me. I had never been a borrower, but I saw more clearly than ever before the demoralizing effect such a habit, persisted in, has upon the character. All these little things I would gladly have given the girl had I felt that she needed them, but I realize that it was only on account of her careless and shiftless ways that she was so unprepared when the emergency came. No matter how many times I supplied her needs, the very next day she would be in the same dilemma. Thus it happened, that, as you say, Betty, I never have felt the same towards her. There was the worry, the wasted energy in trying to get my belongings back, the coaxing, begging and reminding, that was almost unbearable. I have never asked this girl to visit me again, nor ever shall— not for this reason alone, but because this fault of hers, together with other petty failings which have grown out of it, have labeled her 'an undesirable guest.' This is only one of the many experiences I have had, but it is enough to make one stop and think."

"I feel so much better now," sighed Betty. "It doesn't make up for my lovely book, but you know, Aunty, that 'Misery loves company,' and I am afraid that I am no exception."—Presbyterian Banner.

Life Lessons

Learning lessons every day—
So the story's told.
Some are youthful lads and gay—
Some are scholars old.
Though the locks o' them be gray.
Learning lessons every day!

Learning lessons sad and sweet—
So the story's told;
Winnowing the chaff from wheat—
Gathering the gold.
Lessons long, of calm and strife—
Lessons ended but with life!

Atlanta Constitution

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, MAY 1.

Theme for the Day—A Morning Prayer.

Scripture—O Jehovah, in the morning shalt thou hear my voice; in the morning will I order my prayer unto thee and will keep watch.—Ps. 5:3.

For a moment we may guess Thee
From thy creatures that confess Thee,
When the morn and even bless Thee,
And thy smile is on the sea.

O the hush from earth's annoys!
O the heaven, O the joys,
Such as priest and singing boys
Cannot sing or say!

There is no more pain and crying,
There is no more death and dying,
As for sorrow and for sighing,—
These shall flee away.
—F. W. H. Myers ("Sunrise").

Prayer—Holy Father, on the morning of this day of rest and service, we invoke Thy blessing upon us. It is a day made sacred by the most precious memories of our holy religion. May all believing souls find joy and strength in the fellowship and worship of the day. Keep us from sin, we beseech Thee, and may we come to the evening with the consciousness that it has been one more day's work for the kingdom of God, and that we are a day's march nearer home. We ask in Jesus' name. Amen.

MONDAY, MAY 2.

Theme for the Day—May-day Happiness.

Scripture—Thou makest the outgoings of the morning and evening to rejoice. Thou visitest the earth and waterest it. Thou greatly enrichest it. Thou crownest the year with Thy goodness, and Thy paths drop fatness.—Ps. 65:8, 9, 11.

When all the birds have matins said,
And sung their thankful hymns; 'tis sin,
Nay, profanation to keep in,—
When-as a thousand virgins this day,
Spring, sooner than the lark, to fetch in May.
—Robert Herrick ("Going Maying").

Prayer—Merciful Father, in this gracious season of the year, when all nature is bright with Thy presence and vocal with Thy praise, we find our hearts full of thankfulness. All Thy works praise Thee, and we would not be silent through all the generations. Youth has gone forth into the wonder and mystery of forest and field to celebrate the full glory of the spring. Teach us the lessons of joy, reverence and good-will which ought to make their way into all open hearts. May we accept Thy blessings with humility and appreciation. May the whole household, old and young, share the happiness and the thankfulness which Thy mercy inspires. For Christ's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY, MAY 3.

Theme for the Day—Christ on the Sea.

Scripture—They beheld Jesus walking on the sea and drawing nigh unto the boat; and they were afraid. But he said unto them, It is I, be not afraid.—John 6:19, 20.

Christ walks upon the sea;
Men shrink away in fear.
"Who is it on the waters?"
It is the Savior near.
And when He whispers, "Peace, be still!"
The obedient sea can work no ill.
—Marrianne Farningham ("The City Sea").

Prayer—Our good Father, we thank Thee for life, for breath, for sanity, and for cheerfulness. We praise Thee for our daily opportunity of worship and of work. Our Savior's example of constant regard for the welfare of his disciples, and of tender solicitude for their growth in knowledge of him inspires us with trust in his guidance and love. Help us to behold him in every emergency, even as the disciples saw him walking on the sea. And may our alarm, either at the troubles that surround us, or at the strangeness of his coming, give place to assurance and peace in the comfort of his words. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 4.

Theme for the Day—A Morning without Clouds.

Scripture—He shall be as the light of the morning, when the sun riseth, a morning without clouds, when the tender grass springeth out of the earth, through clear shining after rain.—II Sam. 23:4.

To hear the lark begin his flight,
And singing, startle the dark night
From his watchtower in the skies,
Till the dappled dawn doth rise;
Then to come in spite of sorrow,
And at my window bid good-morrow,
Through the sweet briar, or the vine,
Or the twisted eglantine.
—John Milton ("L'Allegro").

Prayer—Father, Thy gifts are new every morning and fresh every evening. Into Thy covenant of grace Thou hast called us, and we are made increasingly aware that to those who seek the kingdom of God and his righteousness, all good things are added. We praise Thee for the freshness and beauty of the day, and for all days that teach us of Thy love and that lead us further into the mystery of Thy providence. Incline our hearts unto Thee, and may any will find ever truer embodiment in our lives. And this we ask in the Savior's name. Amen.

THURSDAY, MAY 5.

Theme for the Day—The Vision of Him Who Reigns.

Scripture—He is wise in heart and mighty in strength—that commandeth the sun, and it riseth not, and sealeth up the stars; that alone stretcheth out the heavens, and treadeth upon the waves of the sea; that maketh the Bear, Orion, and Pleiades, and the chambers of the south.—Job 9:4, 7-9.

The sun, moon, the stars, the seas, the hills and the plains—
Are not these, O soul, the vision of Him who reigns?
—Tennyson ("Higher Pantheism").

Prayer—O God, Thy glory fills the heaven, and earth is full of Thy praise. Thou art the Creator of all the wonders that we see, and all of them speak of Thy power and wisdom. May we rejoice in the lesson that nature teaches us, and be led to more discerning knowledge of the divine meaning of all the universe. Quicken within us the sense of Thy care for us, and the holy vocation which is ours as Thy servants. Restrain us from all unworthy thoughts of Thee and of our own part in Thy purposes. And may our lives in some true sense illustrate the nature of our Lord. We ask in Jesus' name. Amen.

FRIDAY, MAY 6.

Theme for the Day—The Road and the Rest.

Scripture—We are journeying up to the place of which Jehovah said, I will give it to you.—Num. 10:29.

None shall be weary nor stumble among them; none shall slumber nor sleep; neither shall the girdle of their loins be loosed, nor the latchet of their shoes be broken.—Isa. 5:27.

Does the road wind up hill all the way?
Yes, to the very end.
Will the day's journey take the whole long day?
From morn to night, my friend.
But is there for the night a resting place?
A roof for when the slow, dark hours begin.
May not the darkness hide it from my face?
You cannot miss that inn.
—Christina Rossetti ("Uphill").

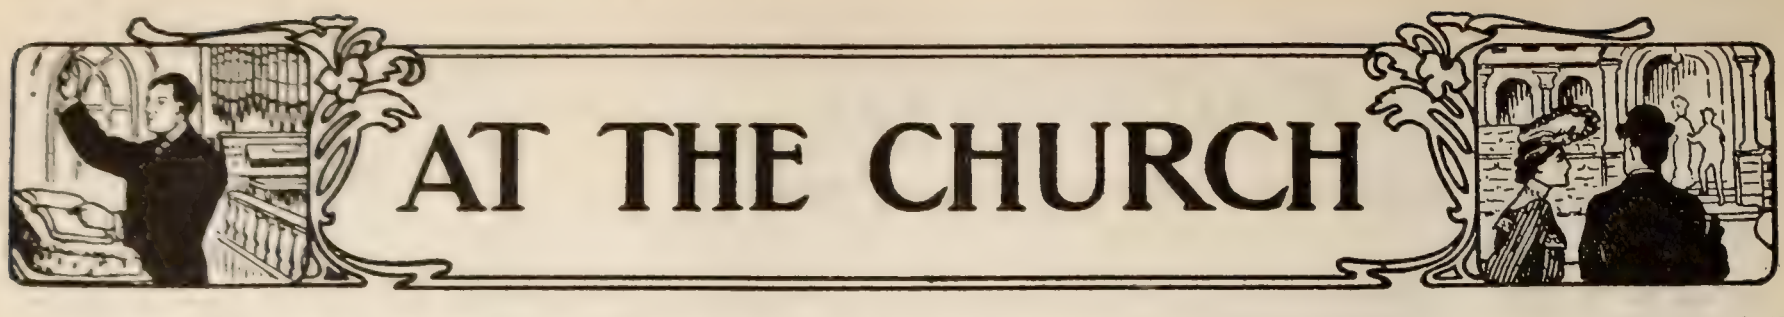
Prayer—Merciful Father, we thank Thee that so little of our life is known to us. If we were able to know all the future, if we saw the road rising ever in wearisome hills before us, we might grow faint-hearted, and turn back. But thou leadest us as little children should be led, a step at a time, and givest us strength for each day's work. May this be our best consolation, and may we grow happy in the assurance that there remains a rest for the people of God. For Christ's sake. Amen.

SATURDAY, MAY 7.

Theme for the Day—God's Treasure.

Scripture—And they shall be mine, saith Jehovah of hosts, even mine own possession, in the day that I shall make up my jewels and I will spare them, as a man spareth his own son that serveth him.—Mal. 3:17.

Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father.—Matt. 13:43.



Then shall the good stand in immortal bloom,
In the fair gardens of the second birth;
And each bright blossom mingle its perfume
With that of flowers, which never bloomed on earth.
—Longfellow ("God's Acre").

Prayer—Unto Thee, O God, do we lift up our souls. In comparison with Thy power and goodness we are less than nothing, and vanity. But when we think of the love wherewith Thou hast loved us, we are overwhelmed with a humbling joy that seems unspeakable and full of glory. Help us to prove in some degree worthy of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus, our Lord. May neither pride nor shame separate us from Thee. So may we be accounted fit for Thy presence in the day when Thou shalt make up Thy jewels, and all the praise shall be Thine, world without end. Amen.

Just Being Happy

Just being happy
Is a fine thing to do:
Looking on the bright side,
Rather than the blue:
Sad or sunny musing
Is largely in the choosing,
And just being happy
Is brave work and true.

Just being happy
Helps other souls along:
Their burdens may be heavy,
And they not strong:
And your own sky will lighten
If other skies you brighten
By just being happy
With a heart full of song!

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The Fight with the Saloon*

The teachers who have the task of interpreting the temperance lessons must not be discouraged by the fact that the same passages of Scripture recur so frequently in the assignment of lessons on this theme. It is, of course, well known to us all that the number of temperance passages in the Bible is small. The problem of sobriety in those ages was one of purely personal character. The man who drank to excess brought disgrace to himself and poverty to his family. But it was nobody's business in particular, except as it is the duty of the community to look after anyone who seems unable to take care of himself.

At the present time the problem has assumed gigantic social proportions from the fact that the business of manufacturing drunkards is the chief industry of one of the most colossal combinations of capital and unscrupulousness the world knows. The business of the saloon, in America at least, has long since passed out of the stage in which it was the mild and harmless enterprise of supplying needed stimulants to an honest, industrious and sober population. Whatever may be claimed for the business of intoxicants in other lands, it has certainly crossed the line, in our own country, into the domain of a public menace, regardless of civic virtue, preying upon individual weakness, and boldly attempting to widen its scope of operations by entrapping multitudes of young people and children into its snare.

What Men Do for Money.

It is difficult at first to see how any man could gain his own consent to participate in a business so hostile to public good and so regardless of the ruin brought upon innocent people. But the answer is not far to seek. It is the enormous profit that can be won from the manufacture and sale of the products of the brewery and distillery that holds men in the business. An ordinary and legitimate trade is content to make a reasonable profit, but not so with the saloon. It has been estimated that nearly 75 per cent of the money paid by the consumers of whisky and beer in America is pure profit in the pockets of the sellers and manufacturers. Confronted by this opportunity for securing a large return from a small investment, men with little conscience are willing to accept the stigma of public disapproval and pocket the profits of the black business. It is this which makes the problem of the saloon so big in our country today.

Just now the whole nation is engaged in the beginnings of a deadly struggle with this conscienceless and grasping organization. The liquor men are banded together in a combination furnished with enormous resources, entirely devoid of scruple or conscience, and directed by men long accustomed to study the best methods by which law can be limited, evaded or overthrown. In spite of these tremendous odds and the fact that the liquor men are fighting with desperation in view of the advancing tide of sobriety which threatens to stop forever their immense profits, the victories which the temperance sentiment has won by means of prohibitory laws and local option enactments, are among the most encouraging successes which the cause of righteousness has achieved in many years.

Temperance Instruction.

The methods by which the fight with the saloon must be kept up and made effective include many forms of activity. It is a wise provision that there should be temperance instruction in the public schools in many of the states. Great care needs to be exercised lest this temperance instruction should be largely physiological in character rather than ethical and social. It is very easy by means of charts to produce upon the minds of a child exaggerated ideas as to the effect which alcohol has upon the human system. The facts themselves are sufficient warnings against the sin of indulgence in strong drink, when these facts are simply and urgently set forth. But some of the experiments tried and some of the statements made in the textbooks used for the study of the subject leave the impression that any use of alcohol is an immediate and overwhelming poison. Then the children are led to compare such statements with the experience and condition of men who have used liquor for years, and they wonder whether the whole body of instruction upon this subject is not exaggerated and misleading.

The emphasis in temperance instruction in the schools ought to be laid upon the right kind of both eating and drinking. It should be laid upon the moral evils that flow from intemperance. It should be laid upon the degradation and vice which result from the rule of the saloon. These are far more convincing facts than are to be found in the accurate and scientific statement regarding the physiological results of liquor in the human body. This latter is not to be overlooked, but it needs to be proportioned to other and more important sides of the question, and especially to be kept within the actual bound of fact.

The Ruin of Rum.

Similarly in the Sunday-school every child should have the benefit of frequent and emphatic statements regarding the dangers and distresses that arise from the use of intoxicating liquors. John B. Gough used to tell pathetic and tragic stories of the lives and homes of drunkards, and temperance literature was largely filled with such recitals. There are just as many of these experiences today as ever in the places where the liquor traffic remains. Drunkards are just as loathsome, incompetent and brutal as ever. Their children and wives are just as wretched and neglected. The sufferings caused by intemperance are simply beyond reckoning, and every Sunday-school pupil ought to be made to feel something of the disgrace which comes upon the nation through this vile thing.

But especially is it the business of the teacher to point out the significance of the widespread use of liquor of various sorts by apparently respectable people. In the hotels and restaurants it is not at all uncommon to see people partaking of beer, wine and whisky. In this bad practice women and even children often share. What is the Sunday-school teacher going to say about such practices, and about the use of wines and liquors upon the tables of people who are supposed to be refined, and even sometimes members of the church? Every child ought to be provided with a conscience that condemns these things, and it is the business of the Sunday-school teacher to see that every child in the class is provided with such a conscience. The teacher can easily gather enough facts to make impressive the lessons of abstinence.

Temperance at Home.

But in the last issue it is the duty of the home to make the lesson of temperance plain and binding. Parents can never escape the responsibility of setting before their children the right kind of examples, and of making them understand by direct instruction the danger and sin of the use of liquors. Many a child is given the taste for stimulants by highly seasoned food or by the use in one way or another of liquors themselves at the family table. The results of this practice are often of the most unhappy sort in after years. The people who imagine that social customs compel their indulgence in strong drinks show themselves less than courageous in the face of one of the most deadly dangers which threatens the nation.

The political duty of aiding in the suppression of the saloon is being borne in upon the conscience of the Christian voter in new and startling ways. If he imagines that the fight with the saloon can be won in a single battle, or a single campaign, he misjudges the strength, the audacity or the desperation of his enemy. Even if in the first or some later engagement he is successful, he must never suppose that the saloon is going to give up the fight without a struggle that will move every possible factor involved in the contest. There is too much money to be made out of this unholy traffic to permit any saloon keeper or brewer to rest night or day if there is even a fighting chance of holding his own or of winning back lost territory.

No Such Thing as Failure.

No true temperance man will be discouraged by defeat. It is only by long and patient fighting that the final victory is to be won. It must be remembered that there is no one class of people who stand committed to the cause of temperance as do the liquor men to the saloon. If people were making money out of temperance, as the liquor sellers do out of their traffic, if the practice and advocacy of temperance gave as much political power as does the business of the saloon, then the liquor traffic would not last a year, because there would be a deeply interested class who would fight the battle, and all the interests of good order, temperance and righteousness would back it up. But as it is those who fight the saloon have no such personal concern. Theirs is not a selfish motive. They are contending for the public welfare, and so their efforts are not so forceful and the progress they make is slower. But progress is being made. The map is slowly being cleared of the black stain of the saloon, and before many years have passed the last stronghold will have fallen. In this victory the parents, the Sunday-school teachers and the teachers of the public schools will have an important part.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

Topic May 8: The Christian Graces. I Peter 4:7-11; Col. 4:6.

He who would achieve a Christian character must in the process acquire Christian graces. Indeed, they are the manifest evidence of the presence of Christian character. They are Christian character in action. In fact, it is not too much to say that they are the component parts of a Christian character. They are acquired in the same way any person becomes a great artist—by practice. Paderewski is reported to have said that he could notice a difference in his playing if he failed to practice for a single day. If he failed to practice for two successive days his intimate friends could tell the difference, and if he neglected for three consecutive days his audience could detect that there was something wrong. This only goes to show the great artists of the world acquired their lofty heights only by extraordinarily hard work and remarkable persistency. Nor can Christian men and women do less if they would attain to worthy heights in their Christian work. The soldier could never become an expert rifleman without practice. Neither can the commercial student become an expert business man without experience in the real world. And neither will the Christian possess high attainments unless he seek with diligence and patience to acquire them.

Our faith in the saving power of Jesus Christ will not grow strong so long as we do not trust him. When we give our lives over into his hands and follow his leading and allow him to demonstrate to us in our own experiences with him that his life is the best life, that his way is the true way, our faith will increase, but it will not increase otherwise. We must practice. And the inevitable result of this process is that it will add virtue to one's life. Who can have faith in Christ, and give his life over into his hands and not forsake evil practices. Vice and sensuality have no place in Christ's teaching. The body with all its appetites and longings are made subservient to a higher and loftier purpose. As a means to this higher end they furnish a dwelling place, and place at our disposal instruments by which this higher life is worked out. The life that is thus directed is virtuous in the broadest and in the highest sense. Naturally enough such a life seeks knowledge. It longs for it as the traveler of the desert thirsts for water. It gives vision and purpose and, therefore, helps shield from danger and death. Knowledge anchors us in our purposes and sustains us in our efforts. And in all this there must be government. Self-control must be exercised by every life. All of us are in the midst of a world of goodness. All things are in themselves good. Things become bad only when we abuse them. All the dens of vice and crime where human beings have all but sunken below recognition as human beings, but represent the abuse of functions and appetites which in themselves are good and necessary for the perpetuation of the race. These places are but an exhibition of an utter lack of self-control. Thus in the making of a life there must be these and the other Christian graces which the apostle mentions—patience, and godliness, brotherly kindness and love. These are great ideals which we are to keep ever before us as we go about in our daily lives seeking to extend the kingdom of God among men. "If ye do these things ye shall never stumble: for thus shall be richly supplied unto you the entrance into the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."

The New Century Convention

By Charles A. Finch

The stir and bustle in preparation for the convention in October is evident in Topeka and splendid reports are coming in from other states. Brother Nichols, editor of the Christian Union of Des Moines, visited us last Lord's Day for the express purpose of writing up the convention. He says that Iowa will come by the hundreds and advices from Colorado, Oklahoma, Nebraska and Texas, together with the entire Pacific coast, have set the committee on entertainment to work to prepare for the hosts that are coming. Missouri is at our back door two thousand strong. And this time the raid which they will make on Kansas will be one of peace and power, led by the great leaders in and about Kansas City.

Topeka itself is raising $100,000 for a State Fair, and the sum is well on toward completion. A great building is to be erected on the fair grounds, which will seat fifteen thousand people. This will afford a magnificent place for our communion service. The Commercial Club and business men of the city will do everything in their power to make this the best entertained convention of recent years. The interest of the prominent men of the state, from the Governor down, has been enlisted and all rejoice in this opportunity of revealing to the brotherhood of Disciples the meaning of Kansas hospitality.

At the big mass meeting at the First Church just before we left for Pittsburg, the well known wit and newspaper man, now candidate for Congress for this district, Tom McNeal, made a speech in which on behalf of F. D. Coburn, our famous secretary of agriculture, whose text books are used all over the country and in Europe, he said that Mr. Coburn would furnish fried chicken daily to the convention, whereupon the secretary smilingly replied, that if he did that he ought not to be expected to contribute any money.

After we returned from Pittsburg an unknown Kansas poet caught up the promise of Secretary Coburn and immortalized it in mellifluous verse. The occasion of it was a note to the writer from Mr. Coburn in which he said: "I am constantly mindful of my poultry obligation and I expect to set one hen next week. I heartily congratulate you on your success at Pittsburg." Evidently this served as an inspiration for the following: Preachers please take notice:

Hatch them eggs, you poor old hen,
Hatch them o'er and o'er again,
Preachers coming here next year
And next year will soon be here.
Million pullets needed then,
Hatch them o'er you poor old hen.

Pullets fat with yellow legs,
Say, old hen, just hatch them eggs.
Chicken gravy, rich and brown.
Preacher's chin a-running down,
Giblets, white meat and the rest,
Say, old hen, get on that nest.

Poor old hen, you got to set,
Got to hatch them eggs, you bet.
Preachers' appetites are good.
Eat more chicken than they should,
But them preachers got to eat,
Say, old hen, climb on your seat.

October in Kansas is the most delightful part of the year,—just enough warmth and just enough cool to make a man feel like a boy out of school. Those who have heard the call of the prairie are bound to come again, and those who have never inbreathed the ozone of freedom and stalwart citizenship in a state where saloons are unknown, and have never yet seen a capital city of 50,000 population free from the domination and vice of the liquor traffic, will find the lure of the prairie in their blood if once they visit us, and doubtless many thousands will continue to act as other thousands have done and add their citizenship to a community built up largely by a class of people who put environment and educational privileges and municipal righteousness above mere money making and become a permanent part of our civic life in the great free west. We are getting ready for you, brethren, we are going to take care of every one of you, and even now the tramp of oncoming feet is heard. Work up your delegations and send in your names. The Sunflower State is yours.

Topeka, Kansas.

Trust

By Retta Bryson Titus.

I do not ask
That all along my pilgrim way
The path be light;
I only ask that I my trust
On thee may stay, through darkest night.

Nor do I ask
That joy supreme, unmixed with pain,
My portion be;
But only, that whate'er thy love
For me ordains, be shared by thee.

I dare not ask
That from my lips the bitter cup
Withheld may be;
Since thou, my Savior, on the cross
Didst drain it to the dregs for me.

I do not ask
That, here and now, life's mysteries
Unveiled may be;
For well I know whatever comes,
Thy changeless love o'ershadows me.

With tear-blind eyes
The way I take I can not see;
But I will lay
My trembling hand in thine, dear Lord,
And walk by faith the way with thee.

And, some glad day,
O, precious thought! when I have reached
The better land,
Earth's mists shall roll away, and I
Shall clearly see and understand

Twice-Born Men

Wonderful Story of Conversion in the London Slums

SEE "THE BOOK WORLD" PAGE.

He is the son of fairly respectable people who came gradually down and down, till their home was a loft in some mews patronized by cabmen. It was here that the consciousness of the Puncher received its first stimulus of ambition. There was in the yard, working among the cabs and horses, a young man pointed out by the denizens of that dirty place as a wonderful hero. He had fought someone in a great fight on Wormwood Scrubbs, and had beaten him to bits.

"I remember distinctly, just as if it was yesterday," said the reflective Puncher, speaking in his low voice and looking sadly away from me; "I remember distinctly the feeling that used to come over me whenever I looked at that man. I don't remember life before that. It seems to me that I only began to live then. And this was the feeling. I wanted to be like that man. I wanted to fight. I wanted people to point at me, and say: 'There's a fighting man!' I never thought I should be as big a man as the cock of our yard; I only wanted to be something like him; something as near to him as strength and pluck could carry me. But the day came" —he added, with a touch of pride—"when I stood up to that very man, a bit of a boy, I was, too—and I smothered him. Yes; I smothered him. Ay, and afterwards many a man bigger than him; a lot bigger."

His animal spirits got him into trouble at school. There was no master able to influence his character. He was pronounced utterly unmanageable; his temper was said to be ungovernable; the authorities said that he endangered the lives of other boys by flinging slates about as if he wanted to kill someone. He was turned out of nearly every school in Marylebone.

He was still a boy when he stole a bottle of rum from a grocer's barrow, shared it with some of his mates, and made himself so hopelessly drunk that he fell into Regent's Canal. At the age of seventeen he was put to work. Work, it was thought, might tame his wild spirits. Moreover, it was necessary for him to earn bread. He became a porter at Smithfield Meat Market.

It was at this time that he began seriously to discipline his fighting qualities. He trained under a man whom middle-aged sportsmen will remember, the redoubtable Nobby Thorpe. In a few months he was a hero, and a man of substance.

He fought sixteen famous fights at Wormwood Scrubbs, and won them all. Then came a challenge to meet Eycott at the Horse and Groom Tavern in Long Acre. In those days certain of the public-houses patronized by sporting noblemen had covered yards at the back of their premises for the purpose of prize-fights. It was in one of these places that the young porter from Smithfield Market met Eycott, a rare champion. The fight went through fourteen rounds, and the Puncher was declared victor. Eycott objected to this decision. The Puncher was game, and they fought again. In three rounds he had won easily.

This victory meant not only money, but fame and the patronage of powerful men. The porter from Smithfield became the flash fighting-man, a terrible type of humanity. He swaggered with lords and shook his fist in the face of the world.

With his pockets full of money he married, bought a laundry business, took a comfortable house, kept servants, a carriage, and a pair of horses, went to race meetings, associated as a hero with the rich and powerful, and lived a life of racket and debauchery.

His body held out. He was perfectly strong, perfectly fit. The truth is his whole system was singing with the joy of success. His brain was on fire. He felt himself capable of enormous things. He was drunk nearly every day of his life. Nothing mattered.

When he began to feel the days of his fighting drawing to a close, he looked about him for another means of earning money quickly and easily. He had not far to look. He started a racing business.

His name, so famous to the sporting world was advertised as "A guarantee of Good Faith." Under the cloak of this name he tricked and cheated in a hundred cunning and disgraceful ways. He became the member of a gang.

But suddenly some of these schemes, advancing in boldness, attracted the attention of the police. The Puncher lost at a stroke his fame, his popularity, his good name. He was designated a low blackguard, and fell from wealth to poverty. His wife and her relations, who had sunned themselves in his wealth, became scornful and antagonistic. The Puncher felt this treatment, and it made him worse. Again and again he went to prison; each time he came out it was to find his wife and children sinking deeper into poverty, and showing him a colder and a deadlier hatred.

In one single year, from October, 1904, to October, 1905, he was seventeen times convicted, chiefly for drunkenness.

He lived now in the common lodging-houses of which I have written—lodging-houses occupied by the lowest, most desperate, and infinitely the most loathsome creatures on the face of the earth. He found no horror in these places. He was their king. No one dared to interfere with him. He was more terrible in his rags and madness than in the days of his splendor. Murder shone in his eyes; it was a word often on his lips. If he hit a man, that man fell like a stone. The Puncher, fed by alcohol, was something that spread terror through the district. As a prize-fighter he had been an object of awe; now he was an object of fear. Then he had been a man; now he was a devil.

After serving a month's imprisonment in the workhouse he came out with a determination to murder his wife. The two came out from the house, as they passed down the street, a door opened and a Salvationist, who knew the Puncher and knew his son, came out and joined them. He asked if husband and wife were coming to the meeting. The Puncher said, No. The Salvationist—himself a converted drunkard and wife-beater—turned and looked the prize-fighter in the face. He told him simply and straightly, looking at him as they went down the street, that he could never be happy until his soul was at peace. He said this with emphatic meaning. Then he said, "God has got a better life for you, and you know it." The Puncher struck across the road and entered a public-house. His wife waited at the door for her murderer.

He says that while he stood drinking at the bar, feeling no other emotion than annoyance at the Salvationist's interference, suddenly he saw a vision. The nature of this vision was not exalted. In a flash he saw that his wife was murdered, just as he had planned and desired; that he had died game on the scaffold, just as he had determined; the thing was done; vengeance wreaked, apotheosis attained—he had died game; he was dead, and the world was done with.

A wave of shame swept over him; he came out of his vision with this sense of horror and shame drenching his thought. For the first time in all his life he was stunned by realization of his degradation and infamy. He knew himself.

Drunk as he was, he went straight out from the public-house to the hall where the Salvation Army was holding its meeting. His wife went with him. He said to her, "I'm going to join the Army." At the end of the meeting he rose from his seat, went to the penitent's form, bowed himself there, and like the man in the parable cried out that God would be merciful to him, a sinner. His wife knelt at his side.

He says that it is impossible to describe his sensations. The past dropped clear away from him. An immense weight lifted from his brain. He felt light as air. He felt clean. He felt happy.

Whatever the effect upon himself, the effect of this conversion on the neighborhood was amazing. The news of it spread to every foul court and alley, to every beerhouse and gin-palace, to every coster's barrow and street corner, to every common lodging-house and cellar in all that quarter of the town. There is no hero to these people like a prize-fighter; let him come down, as the Puncher had come down, to rags, prison, and the lodging-house —still, trailing clouds of glory does he come, and the rest worship their idol even when he lies in the gutter.

When the Sunday came and this great hero marched out of barracks with the band and the banners and the lasses, there were thousands to witness the sight—a dense mass of poverty-stricken London, dazed into wonderment by a prize-fighter's soul. "The Puncher's got religion!" was the whispered amazement, and some wondered whether he had got it bad enough to last, or whether he would soon get over it and be himself again. Little boys swelled the multitude, gazing at the prize-fighter who had got religion.

He had got it badly.

His home became comfortable and happy. He appeared at all the meetings. No desire for tobacco or drink disturbed his peace or threatened his holiness. The neighborhood saw this great fighter going every night to the Army Hall, and marching every Sunday to the meetings in the open air.

Then they saw something else.

The wonder of the Puncher is what Salvationists call his "love for souls." This is a phrase which means the intense and concentrated compassion for the unhappiness of others which visits a man who has discovered the only means of obtaining happiness. The Puncher was not content with the joy of having his own soul saved; he wanted to save others. He did not move away from the neighborhood which had witnessed his shame, but lived there the life of a missionary. Every hour of his spare time, every shilling he could spare from his home, was given to saving men with whom he had companied in every conceivable baseness and misery. This man, as other narratives will show, has been the means of saving men apparently the most hopeless. To this day, working hard for his living, and with tragedy deepening in his life, he is still to be found in that bad quarter of London, spending his time and his money in this work of rescuing the lost. I never met a quieter soul so set upon this bitter and despairing task of rescue.

Church Life

A. B. Cornell leaves New Sharon, Iowa, for the pastorate at Prairie City.

C. G. Kelley leaves Houston, Texas to take up work at Fishertown, Texas.

The new church at Carthage, Mo., is nearing completion. The building costs $40,000.

W. E. Babbitt, Woodland, California, will likely lead the churches of Colusa in a union meeting.

N. M. Ragland, recently of the First Church, Springfield, Mo., is now pastor at Hugo, Okla.

The convention of the churches of South San Joaquin District was held in Fresno, Calif., April 18-20.

Chas. Darsie, Uhrichsville, Ohio, will lead his Endeavor Society in a study of missions in China.

A. C. Stewart has gone from Clarkesville, Iowa, to the pastorate of the church at Schaller, Iowa.

Charles E. McVey, singer, has been assisting in a meeting at Marvill, Kansas. His address is Hardy, Neb.

The new Centennial Church, Bloomington, Ill., will be dedicated May 1. J. H. Gilliland is the pastor.

Students of Drake University are enthusiastic in their demonstrations for continuing the medical school.

Richard Martin, Chicago, is now in a meeting at Greenfield, Mo., with large audiences in attendance each evening.

Frank S. Ford, senior pastor of San Francisco, has suffered from a few days' illness which kept him from work for a time.

The church at Red Bluff, Cal., grows rapidly under the ministry of L. O. Ferguson. There were four accessions last month.

The church at McKeesport, Pa., was rededicated April 17, by Geo. L. Snively. The improvements in the building cost $4,800.00.

The Capital Hill Church, Des Moines, has definitely decided to erect a new building to cost $50,000. The old building will be sold and work upon the new begun in a short time.

H. O. Breeden, after a meeting in Houston, Texas, in which there were 101 added to the church, has gone on to Fayetteville, Ark., for a meeting, after which he will return to his home in California.

The Berean Bible class, Nelsonville, Ohio, has an attendance of over 300 men each Sunday. On a recent Sunday they devoted the hour to music led by E. M. Hackleman, Indianapolis.

The Evanston church had to postpone the laying of the corner stone of its new building from April 24 till May 1. Dr. Willett makes the principal address, at 3:30 p. m. Evanston's mayor will be present at the ceremony.

T. T. Thompson and the little church at Elyria, Colo., are starting a movement for a new church at Englewood, Denver, where Temple R. Axton has organized a Sunday school, and holds services in a little red brick school house.

Robert E. Henry is just closing four years' work at Moline, Ill., and goes from there to Mantic, Ill. Mr. Henry has accomplished a good work in Moline, building up a good church and successfully leading them through a building campaign.

At the last meeting of the Northern California Convention two timely papers were read—one by Dean H. H. Guy of Berkeley on "Higher Criticism and the Old Testament," the other by H. J. Loken, "Higher Criticism and the Ministry."

J. C. Todd, Bloomington, Ind., recently visited Louisville and Lexington, Ky. In Lexington he was the guest of President Crossfield, and while there addressed the chapel assembly, the Bible college, and a class in practical theology.

Evangelist Roy L. Brown, Bellefontaine, Ohio, has just closed a meeting at Rochester, Ind., with fifty-four accessions to the church. Earl S. Farmer, pastor, writes that the meeting left the church united, strengthened spiritually and financially, and optimistic.

W. J. Lockhart will close his service with the Union Ave. Church, St. Louis, Mo., June 1, and re-enter the evangelistic field. B. A. Abbott will take charge here September 15. During the interim, Irving S. Chenowith of New York City will have charge of the work.

Walter M. White, pastor at Mexico, Mo., has accepted a call to the church at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, vacated by G. B. Van Ansdall. Mr. White has accomplished an unusual work at Mexico. He will begin work in his new field September 1.

A campaign now being waged in Des Moines to raise a fund for the Drake Medical College is meeting with generous response in the city. The goal for which the great committee is working is $150,000, and they now have in sight $42,000.

"Is the Church, as We See It Today, Necessary?" was the subject for a debate at the last meeting of the brotherhood of the church at Steubenville, Ohio. It might be urged that such subjects should be tabooed as tending to disturb people's faith in the church. But faith isn't afraid of questions.

J. H. Smart, Decatur, has been preaching at Lane, Ill., one-half time for one year. There were nine confessions during the year At Dalton City, where Mr. Smart gives the other half of his time, there have been recently five additions to the church.

J. M. Porter, pastor at Mason City, Ill., has resigned, to take effect within sixty days.

The church at Liberty, Mo., in the future will support Dr. Paul Wakefield in China. This is a new recruit to the living link rank. He will spend Sunday, April 24, with that church.

The work of the First Church, Chickasha, Okla., is prospering. They have had forty-five additions so far this month; 107 during the winter and spring, and all at regular services. The church is very much alive. Andrew P. Johnson is minister.

Bert Wilson, who has been engaged to supply the pulpit at Bethany, Nebraska, during the absence of the pastor, H. H. Harmon, is a graduate of Cotner University, and Nebraska State University, and has recently been elected to the chair of English Literature in Cotner University.

During the last six months $5,412 have passed through the treasurers of the South Broadway Church, Denver, Colo. This was all in regular offerings and without special effort, but by systematic giving on the part of the majority of the members of the congregation.

The corner stone of a new building has been laid at Paris, Mo., where Frank W. Allen is pastor. The building when complete, will cost $35,000, and will be a credit to this old church, now with seventy-five years' life back of it. The building will be one of the best in northeast Missouri.

LeRoy M. Anderson, pastor at Ader, Okla., is making good use of some choice advertising space in the daily papers. In an issue at hand he addresses, "Mr. Busyman," and urges upon him the need of two hours a week in religious service and announces the Christian church as the place.

William Oeschger, Vincennes, Ind., preached morning and evening in the church at Warren, Ohio, April 17. In the bulletin of the church the pulpit committee urge Mr. Oeschger's strength as seen in the fact that he has built up in Vincennes a church of over 1,300 members. The Christian Century hopes the courting may be successful.

The cornerstone of the church at Evanston will be laid Sunday afternoon, May 1. Dr. Herbert L. Willett will deliver the leading address. All Chicago Disciples are invited to attend. The ministers of the various churches of Evanston are invited. The mayor of the city will be one of the speakers. O. F. Jordan is pushing things with admirable energy.

The pulpit committee of the First Church, Milwaukee, have invited L. O. Bricker of Maryville, Mo., to visit the church May 4 and 5 with a view to considering the pastorate. The Maryville church now has a membership of 1,035 and this fact commends Mr. Brecker's work to tre Milwaukee church while Milwaukee is hoping that the larger field she presents may enable them to induce Mr. Bricker to come to them.

The churches of Wichita, Kansas, working with the enthusiasm engendered by the Laymen's Convention there, have raised for missions $33,285, or $3,285 in excess of the amount pledged at the Laymen's Missionary Convention. This makes the contributions of this year more than three times that of last year, and still the money comes in. In this giving Presbyterian churches were first, Methodists second, and Disciples third.

Tuberculosis Sunday will be observed by the Lenox Ave. Church of Disciples, 74 West 126th Street. In the evening, Dr. W. Bayard Craig will use the stereopticon, showing pictures collected by the Charity Organization Society in the campaign against tuberculosis. The subject of the address is "Health and Happiness." The public is invited to join in this effort to teach that consumption can be prevented and cured. The morning topic is "Life and Joy."

W. J. Lhamon's two lectures brought the church in Beaver City, Neb., $152. The church insisted on a five weeks' meeting before releasing him, and gave him a unanimous return call. His afternoon lectures were attended regularly by all the preachers of the city, and the high school superintendent gave the history class credits for attendance at the lectures on comparative religion. Mr. Lhamon is acting as a temporary pastor for the church in Wellsville, N. Y., till the opening of his chautauqua season.

A children's communion service was inaugurated last Sunday morning at the close of Bible-school at the Lenox Ave. Church of Disciples, 74 West 126th Street. The service was preceded by a short address telling the story of the Lord's Supper. Dr. Craig, the minister, believes this will be a helpful feature in teaching the significance of this ordinance to the younger members of the church. As far as can be learned this is the first service of its kind among the Disciples of Christ. The outcome will be watched wiah interest by other churches.

H. H. Harmon, pastor First Church, Lincoln, Neb., for the past four years has been granted a three months' leave of absence to make a tour of Europe, with expenses paid by his congregation. He will visit Naples, Egypt, and Palestine. In four years the membership of this church has increased from 450 to 1,237. Prof. Burt Wilson, who will have the chair of English Literature in Cotner University next year, will supply the pulpit of the First Church during Mr. Harmon's absence. Mrs. Harmon and the family will spend the summer in Lincoln.

Edgar DeWitt Jones, Bloomington, Ill., is preaching the following series of Sunday morning sermons in the First Church: "The Tragedy of the Overbusy," "Real Rest," "When Knighthood Was in Flower," "Paul's Classic on Love," "The Glory of Going On." His evening sermons, announced for the same period are: "Modern Idolatry," "Matthew Levi, the Publican," "John Mark of Jerusalem," " Luke, Physician and Companion of Paul," "John the Beloved," "Bearing the Yoke in Youth."

Thirty-three young men and women from the congregation of the church at Bethany, Neb., volunteered for the foreign field at the close of a recent missionary service, when Pastor H. O. Pritchard had presented the cause of missions earnestly and thoughtfully. Such work speaks eloquently of the work of pastor and church. It is not hard to see a new day for foreign missions as the sociological and moral significance of such work is seen.

Owen Livingood, pastor at Weatherford, Texas, publishes in the parish paper some facts for thought. In this little city of 6,300 people, 5,500 of whom are white, only 2,300 attend any of the churches. Of this number less than 1,500 can be counted active church members. The conclusion is that Weatherford needs a revival. Doubtless! But of what sort? Is it to warm up the indifferent and convert the sinner? Or is it one that will convert the churches to a different kind of life until they shall perform their function in the community? Do the people of the community believe that the church lives and speaks for God? How shall we remove their unbelief?

Make Annuities Do Double Service

Those are glorious forward steps which are being taken by the president and secretaries of the American Christian Missionary Society. The Crescendo Campaign, led by Grant K. Lewis, and the "Ainsley-McCash Parliaments" which are being held in the principal cities of the land where the Disciples are strong, are sure to increase the offerings for American Missions. These resourceful men will surely bring success to the society.

In these days of promise and opportunity, when we are all so anxious that the work of the society be enlarged, why could this not be realized in part by making the annuity money of the society do double duty? George W. Muckley of Church Extension fame never tires of saying that when one gives to that work on the annuity plan he helps both his Lord and himself at the same time. If the annuitant be sixty years old the board promises him six per cent, payable semi-annually, through his entire lifetime. The board in turn loans the money to some church with proper securities at the same rate of interest. The church was thus enabled to do what would otherwise have been impossible,—erect a new house of worship—and the donor had the benefit of the money which he gave to the Lord's work.

The American Christian Missionary Society also receives considerable annuity money from time to time. Why could not the American Board do a similar thing with it, and thereby enlarge its work? This seems to have a number of advantages with few or no disadvantages. To loan the money in and around Cincinnati, or most any other large city will not clear over four and one-half, or five per cent at the outside, while the annuity bond which the society gives to the donor calls for six per cent, payable semi-annually. The money, therefore, is not only not working in the Lord's kingdom during the lifetime of the annuitant, but it is an actual expense to the society.

The only practical advantage of money given to the society on the annuity plan then is that it comes into the full possession of the society at the death of the annuitant without further legal processes. But if this money were loaned with proper securities to some church which wished to build, it would not only enable a particular congregation to erect a house of worship, a condition absolutely essential for the effective work of any congregation, but the society would also enlarge the field of its labors, make for itself warm additional friends, and effect a saving to its treasury.

A particular church is known to the writer which is in sore need of $10,000 to complete a building which is now in process of construction. For lack of funds the work is at a standstill. Aside from giving a deed of trust on the building which, completed, will be worth $30,000, men, members of the congregation, whose aggregate wealth is estimated by real estate authorities in the county and community where they reside, to be more than three-quarters of a million dollars, would sign a joint note as personal security. This sounds overdrawn, but it isn't. Did space permit, it would be easy to give the facts in detail, and show why it happens that with such security the money cannot be secured from other sources. But quite apart from particular instances, the point is, that as a matter of policy it would be a good thing if the American Board would use its annuity money to build churches where the security is satisfactory, rather than loan it to men and institutions where it will enter the regular channels of commerce. Why not make this annuity money do double duty?

This is nothing new. Other societies do it.

The Foreign Christian Missionary Society uses its money in precisely this way to enlarge its work in their fields of labor. Besides this cannot interfere with the work of the Board of Church Extension, because that board cannot begin to answer all the worthy appeals which come to it. Many more reasons might be given in support of this position. What are the objections?

The Best Way

Why should I wear my sorrows
For all the world to see,
Why should I let life's bitterness
Cast its shadow over me?

Could I serve the Master better
If I wore a solemn face,
If I let each bitter heartache
Too plainly leave its trace?

O, didn't he make the sunshine,
And didn't he make the flowers,
And do the hearts that love him
Love him less in life's sunnier nours?

Why not laugh, if the laugh is kindly?
It is better than looks forlorn,
The dear Lord made the lips that smile
As well as the lips that mourn.

Progress Toward Union

A few weeks ago we announced that C. R. Scoville had written to Chicago urging a union of the Metropolitan Church with the Jackson Boulevard Church. We are glad to announce this because the interests of the Disciples in Chicago demand that the work in each neighborhood be done by one church. The cause of union for which we fundamentally stand is bound to suffer when two of our churches are planted a little over a block apart.

Now comes the announcement that the Jackson Boulevard Church has appointed a committee of four, and has asked the Metropolitan to appoint a like committee, to consider the question of amalgamation. The brotherhood will watch the outcome of this conference with deep concern and earnest prayer. We have always considered it unfortunate that the Metropolitan Church was planted less than two blocks from the Jackson Boulevard Church, especially unfortunate when we remember the vast stretches of territory in Chicago in which we are not represented at all.

Nelson H. Trimble, who is now the minister of the Metropolitan came to Chicago from Baltimore last fall, giving up an institutional work there of some promise, to inaugurate his ideas in Chicago. We have asked him for his opinions and hopes relative to the outcome of the conference of the two committees. He says, "Of course there are some families in the Metropolitan, especially those who went through the sad and sorrowful days when the church was divided, who probably would not go back with the Jackson Boulevard people on any basis. Yet these do not represent the bulk of the membership. When the union comes, if they find it difficult to forget the past, they will very likely go into some of the other Christian churches in Chicago. In the adjustment of this whole matter I am urging "my people" to pray that the interests of the Kingdom of Christ shall settle every question, and not individual feeling or human desires. Every hope and vision that the Metropolitan has had in its nine years of life can be realized in a larger and better way through union than alone."

ANNOUNCEMENT TO SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS

There is both pleasure and regret in our announcement that our orders for Bethany Graded Lesson Supplies for the Spring Quarter have so far exceeded our calculations that we are unable at the present moment to send out even a sample leaflet or manual. We have been compelled to decline a considerable number of new orders the last few days on account of the fact that our stock has been consumed to the last leaflet. We have the promise of the printing house that our greatly enlarged order of supplies for the Summer Quarter will be delivered soon, in plenty of time for those who wish RETURNABLE SAMPLES, to examine them, and have their order filled before the new quarter opens, July 1.

It will be well for those schools which have decided to begin the Bethany Supplies with July 1 to send their order as early as possible.

We hope to begin filling orders for RETURNABLE SAMPLES in two or three weeks.

NOTE THE FOLLOWING OFFER: The Publishers of the Bethany Graded Lessons will send out Returnable Samples of the complete line of Supplies—Beginners', Primary and Junior—(excepting the large Beginners' pictures). Accompanying the samples a bill will be sent for $1.09, the regular price of the set. The recipient may do one of three things: (1) He may return the samples uninjured after examination. (2) He may remit $1.09 and keep the samples. Or (3) he may return the bill with his Sunday School's order for Supplies and the publishers will mark it "paid." In writing for samples please say "RETURNABLE."

Laymen's Convention in Lincoln

W. H. Zenor.

The Laymen's Convention met here in Lincoln, Neb., March 15-17. It opened with a big banquet at the Auditorium, with one thousand five hundred and eighty persons seated side by side at the tables—all men, all thinking of, and planning for the things of the Kingdom of God—think of it—men—big men, little men, rich men, poor men, all as brothers eating together at the same table, in the Father's own good pleasure.

Enthusiasm, well I should think there was quite a good deal, not of that excitable sort, usually found in the old fashioned camp meeting, but of that thoughtful reverential sort that is becoming to thoughful men. There was all through the service that deep devotional spirit, that seemed to say, for twenty centuries, Oh, Lord, we men have been negligent of this thy work, now help us to get a better vision of the field, and then set our souls to the task, that our fathers should have done, in the long ago past. Oh, how the speeches stirred the hearts of the men, who for the first time listened to the crying needs of the foreign field.

We as a people, where were we? Yes, we workers, Brother E. W. Allen of our own board, Brother M. B. Madden of Japan, who has seen fifteen years of actual service in that field, and our good Brother Hensey of Bolenge, Africa, who told us his thrilling story of the greatest missionary work done in any country. He told of that people so far away in the heart of Africa, where we have a church of almost six hundred members who do not know that the church at home is divided into waring factions of sectarianism. Oh, how it thrilled our hearts when he turned to us preachers, and asked, "Do I need to tell them of this sad condition? Do they need to know, brethren in order to be Christians?" Isn't that the biggest thought of our plea—union—you ever heard? Doesn't that make you stop and think?

I was told by men of the convention that our brethren turned out better and took more interest in the work that we had done, than in any other place where they had yet been. You are now ready to say, can our men go into these conventions and stand true to our plea, without any compromise? Well they did, and right here in Lincoln, and if here, why not anywhere in the wide world? Brother Allen preached from the following words, "And they continued steadfastly in the Apostles teaching, in fellowship, and in prayers." He told them that the "Christian Church" was organized on pentecost, and the people listened to it as if it was a new message—just from heaven -new doubtless to many of them. And all through the entire sermon e rung the changes on the scripturalness of the church, its work, its unity, its powers, and its great need—a united front to a sinful and dying world. What is true of Brother Allen is also true of all of our men in this great movement, they were free, unhampered and ring clear the peals of true discipleship, for which we were all proud. Also we were happy to know that we had no secondary part in that great meeting; for our men were equal to the very best men on the entire program.

The city of Lincoln has been doing as well as the usual city of its size, for the cause of missions. Last year the Protestant churches of the city gave a little less than $12,000 to the evangelization of the world. At the close of the convention, it was unanimously adopted, as the sense of this convention that for the next twelve months we give not less than $25,000 for the evangelization of the world.

What were the immediate results? Well no one can tell; but suffice it to say, that we had put off our offering until we should catch the spirit of the convention. At the First Church it was decided to add another "Living-Link" in the foreign work. At the East Side the offering was almost four times times that of last year, and if I am not misinformed the largest in the history of the church in recent years. I think it is safe to say that if we could have had the majority of our membership at this convention, our missionary offerings would have been increased ten fold more than they were. I can't think that our great big stalwart Christian business men, are not missionary, or are opposed to mission work; but they don't know the need, and therefore are seemingly lethergic, in their response to the call.

Conditions at Batang, Tibetan Border

Writing to a friend in Kansas, Dr. A. L. Shelton says: "This winter is going to be very trying, for it promises so many deaths from starvation. The conditions are very distressing. I've invested what little money I have in wheat, barley and corn, but I can help so very few. The condition of a subjugated people is always trying. What do you think of this for a policy to prevent war: 'To tax the people so heavily (fifty per cent of their crop) that they will always be too near starvation to make war.' This is the avowed policy of the Chinese here. I am glad to believe, though, that the Chinese who come here are the worst class.

"The work goes on as usual. I am trying to fix up a room in a mud house for a hospital, for there are cases constantly that need to be taken in and it breaks my heart to tell them I have no place. A house fell down not long ago and nearly killed five people. I took them into the chapel for three weeks and sewed them up, set the broken bones and was glad to see them all get well. Have had thirteen victims of these mud houses this year. Four have died, but nine got well."

Notes from the Foreign Society

Eugene Homan Faris, who was at Bolenge, Africa, April 11, 1904, died at Waco, Texas, Sunday, April 10, 1910. Mr. and Mrs. Faris, his parents, were missionaries to Africa. He and Polly Dye, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Royal J. Dye, are the only missionary children born at Bolenge. Thousands will sympathize with Mr. and Mrs. Faris in their great loss.

Ella Amanda Dye, infant daughter of Dr. Royal J. Dye and wife, put in her welcome appearance at Chicago, March 2. This is their third child. Mrs. Dye is sojourning at Eureka, Ill. It is well understood that Dr. Dye is at Bolenge, Africa.

The pastor of the native church at Battalagunda, South India, has recently been elected mayor of the city. Although born in one of the lowest castes he is cordially received in the Brahman quarters. This is one of the more remarkable instances of the conquest of caste which is going on in India.

The Four Square League started in St. Louis in connection with the Laymen's Missionary Movement admits as members only those who pledge four things: To give $1,000 per yeaar for foreign missions or a larger sum with four figures; to persuade three other men to follow their example; to labor to persuade their church to increase its contributions fourfold; to urge Christians generally to devote at least one-fourth of their giving to foreign missions.

There should be much earnest prayer for the great National Missionary Congress which meets in Chicago May 3-6, as a climax of the Laymen's Missionary Movement campaign.

The church at Carrollton, Mo., has raised $600 to make that church a living link in the Foreign Society and will in the future support Miss Edith Parker, Tokio, Japan. She went out from Carrollton. G. L. Bush is the pastor. This is the second living link church under the ministry of this good man. The first was Gainesville, Texas.

Cook in Comfort

You no longer need wear yourself out with the weakening heat of an intensely hot kitchen. You can cook in comfort.

Here is a stove that gives no outside heat. All its heat is concentrated at the burners. An intense blue flame (hotter than either white or red) is thrown upwards but not around. All the heat is utilized in cooking — none in outside heating.

New Perfection
WICK BLUE FLAME
Oil Cook-stove

entirely removes the discomfort of cooking. Apply a match and immediately the stove is ready. Instantly an intense heat is projected upwards against the pot, pan, kettle or boiler, and yet there is no surrounding heat — no smell — no smoke.

Cautionary Note: Be sure you get this stove—see that the name-plate reads "New Perfection."

Why? Because The New Perfection Oil Cook-Stove is scientifically and practically perfect. You cannot use too much wick—it is automatically controlled. You get the maximum heat—no smoke. The burner is simple. One wipe with a cloth cleans it—consequently there is no smell.

The New Perfection Oil Cook-Stove is wonderful for year-round use, but especially in summer. Its heat operates upward to pan, pot, or kettle, but not beyond or around. It is useless for heating a room.

It has a Cabinet Top with shelf for keeping plates and food hot.

It has long turquoise-blue enamel chimneys. The nickel finish, with the bright blue of the chimneys, makes the stove ornamental and attractive. Made with 1, 2 and 3 burners; the 2 and 3-burner stoves can be had with or without Cabinet.

honor of furnishing the first room or ward in the new hospital to be built at Batang on the border of Tibet. Since Dr. Loftus went out from that church and gave his life to Batang, and since Dr. Hardy, also from that church, is to succeed him their request seems altogether fitting.

G. B. Baird, Lu Choo Fu, China, says that the hospital at that point is full and overflowing and even the gate house is being used as a ward. From one to two hundred patients come to the clinic every day for treatment. One Chinese helper spends the entire morning with the patients, preaching the gospel and talking to them of their soul salvation.

Dr. C. L. Pickett, Laoag, Philippine Islands, reports 1,489 patients treated. During that month he made eighteen visits outside of the city.

During the year 1909 there were 837 conversions in the Philippine Islands through the efforts of our missionaries.

The Gospel and Liberalism

than intellectual soundness. Paul dealt gently with superstitious practices that he might not disrupt the church.

Jesus' Consideration for Doubters.

The liberal lacks definiteness of conviction. Jesus treated doubters with great consideration and answered their doubts patiently but he ever insisted that it was faith that was the great dynamic of life. Doubt is but the kindergarten in which a man learns to believe. The liberal is all wrong when he confounds conviction with dogmatism. Those great liberals who have really done things are men who finally got to feel real sure of something or other.

Liberalism has lost something of the horror of sin which once characterized the church. Sin with him may be an incident of development and the fall a fall upward. "Liberal in morals" is a phrase which is becoming current and if it is the aftermath of liberty of opinion, it will sound the death knell of liberalism. Better clean lives with intellectual bondage than freedom with iniquity. The prophets were great reformers of doctrine but they were also great preachers of righteousness. Liberals like Washington Gladden have known how to be true prophets to their generation in both regards.

The liberal movement has not made enough of Jesus, the founder of the Christian religion. The Unitarians are dying for the lack of a great spiritual leader. It is this that has enabled the Disciples alone of the great liberal movements to come to power and great usefulness. They have made loyalty to Jesus their rallying cry and the sense of the unseen presence of the great head of the church has been strong among them. No attempt to create a new religion upon the ruins of an old one will likely come to much more than Dowieism. Once we heard in a certain "People's Church" the benediction, "May the divine spirit of Emerson brood over your hearts as you separate." We did not go away feeling any Presence in our heart.

Lack of Enthusiasm.

Finally, liberalism has been too lacking in great enthusiasms. It has openly sneered at enthusiasm as the mark of the childlike and naive mind. It has endeavored not to get excited about anything. Jesus had a religion of great enthusiasm, in the best sense of that word. He only sought to direct enthusiasm into useful channels and not to repress it. The liberal scorns our nose-counting evangelism. Then let him with equal enthusiasm create a new type equally solicitous about men's souls. The liberal wonders at the sacrifice of the missionary and may sometimes secretly regard him as an amiable idiot. The world will never so assess the missionary but is ever giving him a higher place. The men who bear the cross to foreign lands are the lineal descendants of the apostles and they, not the parlor theologians, will be the heroes of the church's history.

Liberalism has done its service. The next great task is to combine in the same church, the strength and truth of ancient orthodoxy with the sweetness and light of modern free inquiry.

Eureka College Letter

These are busy days for Eureka College. The Ministerial Association of the college recently had Mr. Stelzle here for a series of lectures. It was one of the greatest courses that the association has ever offered the students and the people of Eureka. Mr. Stelzle gave an interpretation of life and religion that will be a great blessing to our students always.

Marion Stevenson, National Bible-school superintendent, and Clarence L. DePew, Illinois Bible-school superintendent, have been with us the last few days and have rendered great service by their vital and vigorous message on this great department of work.

The Base Ball Club of Eureka College has a schedule with six of the leading schools of Illinois and will take a great interest in this part of college life. The first game was played April 14 with Knox College. Eureka College came off victor.

Our glee club returned from their first trip with many laurels. The club visited five of our best churches and had large crowds in each case. This will result in several new students next year.

The teachers and students of Eureka College took quite an interest in the Laymen's Missionary Convention recently held in Peoria for Central Illinois. This was a great opportunity for the group of students in Eureka College who are looking forward to missionary service. The Central Illinois Ministerial Association held just before the convention was attended by quite a number of our young men who are preaching.

The Endowment Campaign moves along quite nicely. We have our fund now to $45,000 and the prospects are growing rapidly for the successful termination of the work. The college will be represented at several of the District Conventions in the state and will be well represented at the State Convention in Springfield in September.

the East Side. T. T. Thompson of the Elyria, Leonard G. Thompson of the Littleton, J. A. Shoptaugh of the Berkeley, and Robert Pegrum is pastor of the Golden Church.

Within the last fortnight the daily papers, in Denver, have noted the organization of two congregations of the Christian Church in Colorado.

The church building in Greeley was dedicated April 3. This congregation was organized about seven years ago. Its recently consecrated home is one of the three best houses of worship occupied by the Disciples of Christ in Colorado. There are sittings for a thousand people. The irrepressible and popular Z. T. Sweeney was master of assemblies the day of dedication. Of course then provision was made for the payment of the debt incurred in the erection of the building. James Small, the evangelist, was present, and at this date is in the midst of a successful evangelistic campaign. A. E. Dubber is pastor, and to him more than to any other person is due the present success of the church in Greeley. Dubber is great! Greeley is an important center of radiating influence and this town is the home of the State Normal School.

The Colorado State Mission Board has two evangelists in the field—Charles William Dean and Clark Bower. Brother Bower gives his entire time to the Sunday-school work.

The following ministers reside in Denver, in addition to our pastors named: Sidney M. Bedford, A. Jay Garrison, Frederick W. Henry and R. H. Sawyer.

Brother Bedford is a graduate student in the University of Denver. He serves, on the Lord's Day, a congregation of Disciples not many miles distant from this city. A. Jay Garrison, almost in the list of veterans, is engaged in business, preaching as he has the opportunity. R. H. Sawyer, on account of his physical condition, is, only temporarily, I hope, incapacitated for service in the gospel. His book, "The Livery of Heaven," is having a large sale. It promises to become one of "the best six sellers." Frederick W. Henry, a most accomplished Christian gentleman, and an able preacher, is engaged in business, and has for some time occupied the pulpit of the Berkeley Church, on the Lord's Day.

Better men than those named in this letter cannot be found in the United States. The work of the Master moves on in Colorado successfully, with promise of greater achievements in the future. It is an inestimable privilege to live in such a time as the present and in so gloriously good a country!

Denver, Colo. B. B. TYLER.

New York City Missions

M. M. Smyser closed his work at the Edgewater Church, April 10, after five months of profitable ministry, during which time the church building was erected and the church organized. W. C. Bower, now attending the university in this city, has taken up the work. Under the splendid leadership of Bro. Bower, this church will give good account of itself.

During March, six were added to the Humboldt Street Church by confession and baptism. The pastor conducted noon shop meetings, each day during Passion Week at the Chelsea Fibre Mills and a children's meeting at the church each afternoon. These meetings were well attended and proved profitable to the general work of the church.

The Russian congregation is doing an effective work. Some meeting is held every night in the week. The classes teaching the English language meet four nights, and are proving very helpful. This work is proving a blessing to our general work in the city.

A meeting was called by the Ways and Means Committee of the Disciples' Missionary Union to meet at the 23rd Street Y. M. C. A., April 14. About forty men responded to this call and a profitable evening was spent. The object of the meeting was to consider the financial problems of our mission work in the city. W. B. Craig brought a western breeze into the meeting by giving an interesting and enthusiastic address on "How They Build Churches in the West." A statement of actual work accomplished was given by the superintendent of missions. An open discussion of the problems before the meeting was entered upon, led by E. J. Gantz. The Disciples of Christ in this city are appreciating the magnitude of the work before them.

Reports come from nearly all the churches of splendid services Easter Sunday, and a number were added to the churches.

Disciples coming to the city should locate our churches and have fellowship with us in the work. We shall take pleasure in notifying any, of the nearest church to their home or hotel.

There are several inviting fields in the city where a good work could be built up, if we had the means to enter upon it. Home Missions is one, also City Missions. A great offering the first Sunday in May will mean greater for the redemption of our cities.

The Price of Progress

It is natural for the student of history, especially religious history, to acknowledge the price that must be paid for every advance in enlightenment. Someone must undergo the pain of discontent with established custom. Someone must take up the pilgrim's staff and fare forth unto the unknown but alluring land of promise. There is the discomfort of limitation, the sadness of departure, the struggle with the hardships of the way, the regret at the misinterpretations sure to be put on such procedure by those who remain undisturbed, and say, "The Past is good enough."

Every prophet and reformer has paid this price. Amos paid it, when he exchanged the hardships of his farmer life in Tekoah for the still harder tasks imposed by his "Great Protest" in the market place of Bethel. Isaiah paid it, when he left the promising career of a rising statesman of the popular party in Jerusalem to take up the uncertain adventure of an opposition program, sure to meet with public disfavor. Paul paid it when he abandoned the splendid career for which his university training and his natural gifts so well fitted him, and became the champion of a new and hated faith. And Wyclif paid it, when he left the safe and profitable stronghold of the theological establishment of his time to organize a movement that was sure to bring antagonism to all and martyrdom to many.

Yet there are heavier prices than these that must be paid in the cause of truth. That which seems hardest, and brings most pain to the heart of the reformer is the inevitable loss that comes with every advance. There are many sincere and earnest people to whom the general situation in which they are implicit seems adequate. From their standpoint any change would be unwarranted. The heritage of the past is ample. Their faith is firm and sufficient. To them any prophet who comes with a new and disturbing truth seems a needless revolutionary. They have gotten snugly settled in their religious convictions and want no disturbance.

Then suddenly comes the new message. Some voice in the wilderness proclaims the need of a new vision of truth. There is insistence that the fallow ground be broken up. The valleys must be filled and the hills leveled down. God is revealing himself in new ways. Those who sleep must awake, and the crooked paths must be made straight.

Such an interruption is sure to bring disquietude, protest, resistence. And, inevitably, there will be three attitudes between which the disturbed members of the community will choose. Some will receive the new summons, as did the disciples of old, and consecrate themselves to its defense. Some will react against it, and become more than ever fixed in their former satisfaction with the past like the Scribes and Pharisees. These opposite and conflicting lines we always expect to find whenever any advance is attempted or any issue joined.

But there is a third group, usually smaller than either of the others, but not without significance, who, jostled by the conflict, disturbed from their serenity of a conformed and satisfied position by the presentation of the new ideas, make a faint and futile effort to understand the new, yet just far enough to become out of sympathy with the old, and with a certain resentment against both, betake themselves to denial, insisting that their faith is gone and they have finished with it all. This is the pathetic example set by men who have gone a little way in the path of progress, and have not the patience to follow it through to the larger light. Their defection from usefulness and happiness is one of the heaviest prices that light has to pay in its victory over shadow. Not one of these tragedies occurs that the conservative does not say to the reformer, "You see the evil of your work. Till you came, this man was contented and useful. Now you see the ruin you have wrought." And the anger with which this taunt is uttered is but a small portion of the prophet's burden, for the bitter reproof of the champion of the past, who feels that he has been happily vindicated by this evil consequence of the new message, is as nothing to the genuine regret felt over any loss of faith.

Yet, what advance has ever taken place without some measure of loss? Did an army ever cross a river that someone was not swept downward in the flood? Did an emigrant train ever thread its way over a mountain range that some straggler was not lost in the crossing? The prophets of Israel faced that peril and felt the burden of that loss. When they lifted their voices against the formalism of their age, and charged the time-serving interpreters of religion with professionalism and lack of timeliness, some of those who heard them gave up all faith in the religion of their fathers, and abandoned themselves to idolatry and the evil life. And when the conventional prophets of the age charged Amos, Micah and Jeremiah with the destruction of the religious convictions of the nation, and the weakening of the hands of the defenders of the faith, a part of the sting of the outcry was the fact that it was true. On the surface of things they seemed to tear down religion rather than build it up. They knew that in reality it was not so. But in the popular mind, and in the arguments of the pleaders for the past, a single case of apostacy was more eloquent than a hundred brought to a new sense of God through the prophet's work.

Jesus met the same reproach. His words cut away the sanctions from beneath the orthodoxy of his day. It was natural that the Jewish leaders and most of the people should identify that orthodoxy with the intimate form of religion. When, therefore, Jesus shattered it by his assaults upon legalism and ritualism, the inevitable result was the reaction of some from all religion. And therein lay the ground of those charges more than once emerging from the tumult of hostility raised against him by the priests, that he destroyed the faith of the people. Must it not have been one of the sharpest thorns that girt the brow of Christ that his revelation of the Father in the new and glorious terms of the gospel had actually resulted, in some cases at least, in making men dissatisfied with the old, without being able to win them to the new? That is always the danger of the man who, like Pilate, goes far enough in the new path to ask, What is truth? and then will not tarry for the answer.

Even more pointed and bitter were the denunciations of the apostles, especially Paul, by the conservators of accepted religion, on the ground that they subverted the religious convictions of the people. No doubt they did. And while some accepted their message, and went on to the new life, and most remained unpersuaded, and held firm to their old beliefs, there were some who were just enough influenced by their message to part with the past, but not able to possess themselves of the better truth offered them. These men drifted away, as such always will. It is the price of progress.

It is the lesson of all religious history. It burned itself into the souls of John Hus, Jerome of Prague and Savonarola. They were charged not only with the sin of making some men heretics, but also of turning others into disbelievers in all religion. It was the agony of Luther and Melancthan that men who had been content with the traditions of Rome were turned by the Reformation into deniers of all religion, so violent was their sense of the inadequacy of what they had believed. When England was stirred to its foundations by the historical inquiries of the last century, some men were so deeply shaken that they took refuge, like Charles Newman, in scepticism, or like Matthew Arnold in the dreams of the classic age. Others, like John Henry Newman, abandoned thought in the effort to find peace, and took refuge under the authority of the Roman Church. It was only the men who, like Frederick William Robertson, Alfred Tennyson and Arthur Hallam, were willing to reach through doubt an ampler faith, who fought through to the light, laid the spectres of the mind, and won freedom and power at last.

It is not otherwise today. Much is made, here and there, of the fact that the study of historical criticism, or of modern science, or of the social theories to which our attention has been directed so much of late, has overset some man's faith. Now and then some young man, recently started on his preparation for the ministry, and facing for the first time a view to which he has been a stranger, announces tragically that his faith is shattered, and he has abandoned all thought of preaching. This is disquieting, to be sure. It deeply grieves the men to whom the new view of truth is not acceptable, for they see in the young man's attitude the natural outcome of a dangerous theory. It is disturbing to the men who have reached the new standpoint by hard and constructive work, and know how great are its values in the interpretation of our faith. Of course, the chances are that most of these young men who thus dramatically announce their abandonment of faith, think better presently of their superficial decision, and determine really to think the matter through as honest men. If they are unwilling to do this, the ministry loses little by their departure.

But the prophets, and Jesus, and Paul, and the reformers and teachers of every age have known full well that even the costly price of such departures is not too heavy a price to pay for a living message and a stronger faith; that the few who are lost from the ranks are not to be compared with the great company who come to conviction and rest of soul through the new truth; and that wherever a man faces all the facts, with the determination to interpret them as the spirit of God gives him power and patience, his is sure to be a larger vision, a deeper faith, and a loftier courage.

Mr. Todd's Criticism

On "Our Readers' Opinions" page appears a communication from E. M. Todd, taking exception to our editorial statement in last week's Christian Century concerning the Baptist church and the immersion dogma. Mr. Todd says that our description of the Baptist denomination as a portion of the church of Christ organized around the dogma of immersion is a caricature of the Baptist position. The Baptists, he says, are organized around two principles, first, the spirituality of religion, and, second, the freedom of the individual.

We are glad that Mr. Todd has furnished us with a statement so true and at the same time so helpful in making plain the conception which the editorial in question sought to elucidate.

Any difference between The Christian Century and our esteemed correspondent is due to the fact that he is thinking of the Baptists from the historical point of view, while we were describing Baptists and Disciples in an actual present-day comparison with other evangelical bodies.

There is no doubt that the Baptists of Roger Williams' day and the earlier Anabaptists were "organized around" the principles to which Mr. Todd refers. The impulse which resulted in their organization as a separate sect was their reaction against sacerdotalism in the church, the control of religion by the state and the notion that the choice of another could make one a Christian. Stated positively, this reaction issued in the two principles Mr. Todd mentions, viz., the spirituality of religion and the right of freedom of conscience, together with a third—the necessity of a regenerated church membership.

But this is ancient history. The Baptists have waged a valiant fight—and won. Evangelical Christianity is today permeated with these principles which Baptist history has glorified. They do not longer distinguish the Baptist denomination. Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Methodists all subscribe to these doctrines and practice them.

The conditions which made necessary the formation of the Baptist denomination have ceased to exist. If these principles were endangered today, Baptists would not be more forward in their defense than other Christians.

Apart from historical and traditional sentiment, the doctrine of immersion is the one important surviving dogma distinguishing Baptists from the main body of evangelical Christians. Baptists hold to the practice of immersion only, because they understand the Scriptures to teach and Christ to command it, in opposition to the great majority of evangelical Christians who do not believe that the Lord has legislated on the matter at all.

In two other points of distinction, formerly vital, the dogmatic element is so fast fading out as to render them negligible considerations in case a passion for Christian unity once seized the evangelical bodies. We refer to polity and the practice of infant baptism. In polity the Baptists are moving away from extreme congregational independency toward a representative organization. The whole question of polity is becoming a question of practical statesmanship, not one of dogmatic interpretation. The decline in the practice of infant baptism in paedo-baptist churches makes not unreasonable the faith that the Baptist plea for a regenerate church membership in a united evangelical church would meet no insurmountable obstacle if the churches really wished to unite.

Mr. Todd's question, therefore, "Why did you write the editorial?" answers itself in the light of these facts. The Disciples, pleading for Christian union, stand upon different ground from that the Baptists occupy. The latter are a sect, coördinate with other sects of our divided Christianity. The distinctive dogma upon which their separateness from the rest of Christendom may be justified today, is their belief that immersion is the only form of initiation into the church that is pleasing to Christ.

The Disciples are not a sect. They are the brotherhood of those who, wherever found, believe in the duty of Christian union and strive to practice it. They are those who have come to the place where they see that no creed or dogma, no peculiar interpretation of religious doctrine, should stand in the way of the union of Christ's people. Therefore they go forth with a plea for union. They do not argue for any dogma. They do not make fellowship hinge upon acceptance of any dogma whatsoever, no more the immersion dogma than any other. They find fellowship with all those who, whatever their private beliefs may be, choose, for conscience sake and Christ's sake, to practice Christian union. They plead with all who are now practicing those things that divide Christ's church to cease such practices wherever conscience is not positively involved.

The reason The Christian Century is sensitive to the temper in which the gracious movement for the union of Baptists and Disciples proceeds is that we would regard it a calamity to the cause of Christ if the Disciples' ideals of union became submerged in a union based upon the triumph of the immersion dogma or any other dogma.

If Disciples and Baptists as one body join together to argue for immersion who then will remain to plead for Christian union?

But if Baptists and Disciples unite to plead for Christian union, who will be able to withstand their flaming appeal?

Laymen in Session

As we are closing the forms for this issue of The Christian Century the Chicago convention of the Laymen's Missionary Movement is in enthusiastic session. Mr. J. Campbell White said Sunday that the Chicago convention was surpassing all those previously held. Orchestra Hall, seating twenty-five hundred people, is being packed at most of the sessions. The great banquet of laymen which has been such a spectacular feature of the seventy-five conventions in other cities, had to be divided into denominational sections in order to accommodate the multitude of guests. No more significant gathering of Chicago Disciples has been held than the Laymen's banquet last Saturday evening at the City Club. Close to one hundred of the choicest men of our churches sat down together to eat and listen to missionary addresses. M. B. Madden, of Japan, awoke great applause in his characterization of the new Japanese national ideals which constitute a peculiar opportunity for American Christianity in that country. Guy Walter Sarvis, lately appointed missionary to China, supported by our own Hyde Park Church, connected the missionary enterprise up close with our ethical ideals. And Stephen J. Corey, Secretary of the Foreign Society of the Disciples, described the peculiar crisis of the oriental world, laying our Christianity under an especial commandment to carry the gospel to the last man.

Mr. E. M. Bowman, of the Bowman Dairy Company, one of Chicago Disciples' best leaders, was toastmaster. Everybody felt that this man had seen a vision which, if our churches could catch it, would wonderfully glorify their work.

General discussion of the resolutions was participated in by many, and a deliberate, not to say solemn, vote was taken to increase the Disciples' offering for missions by 60 per cent for the coming year.

Reports come to us of other great banquets, some of them attended by five and ten times the number of men present at the Disciples' function. Everywhere there was the greatest enthusiasm for the evangelization of the world in the generation.

A fuller report of the convention, and, especially, of the National Congress of Missions, which began Tuesday night in the great Auditorium theatre, will be given in next week's issue.

French Catholics Defeated

Early returns insure a resounding defeat to the French Clericals in their endeavor to overthrow the Briand government in the recent election on the score that the disestablishment of the church school system was enmity to religion and a menace to morals. Briand will doubtless have an increased majority and with this clear declaration of the public will can go on to a completion of the work of giving France a public school system freed from sectarian influence.

The Church and the Poor.

That the efforts of the church in behalf of the poor may be wisely directed it is necessary that the poor be classified in accordance with the causes of their poverty. There are not fewer than three general classes—those who are unable to help themselves, those who are able to help themselves but prefer to live upon the labor of others, and those who have the ability and the willingness to work but lack the opportunity.

Of those who are unable to help themselves many will be dependent upon public and private charity to the ends of their days. The duty of the church to these persons is to give them the consolation of religion and to create a sentiment that will insure for them kind and considerate care. Education will remove many from the class of the inefficient and give them ability to care for themselves. The men who cannot do a piece of work today may be able to do it well tomorrow if there is some one to instruct him. The church ought to give encouragement to those who are trying to train men for their work. Industrial education for all the children of the nation is a requirement of morality and religion. The man who cannot do some kind of work as it ought to be done is morally defective. The church has for its aim the development of complete persons. It is interested in the comfort of the poor, but its chief concern is for their character. What it does for the permanently helpless is of less importance than what it does to help the poor to help themselves.

Those who can work but choose to get their living by begging or stealing deserve to travel a rough road. The church has no business to be sentimental about persons of this sort. Perhaps they, too, need education. They may have been taught that work is to be shunned by free men. They may have been wronged. Very well. The worst thing that can happen to them is to let them feel that society will tolerate professional thieves and beggars. The tramp ought to find that the only place where he can get food is one provided by the public and that the conditions of his being fed are work and a bath. The street beggar who can work ought to be set to the task he can do best. The church has the duty of teaching that indiscriminate giving is often an encouragement to idleness and crime. Society should organize to protect itself against those who will not bear their share of its burdens. Sympathy and sense are not antagonistic; neither is complete without the other.

Of those who have the ability and the willingness to work but lack the opportunity, the late Justice Brewer said: "True charity to them is a place for labor. There is something in this class which makes a strong appeal. Here is seen the weakness of human nature, the pathos of life. To walk the streets alone, beholding through the windows of the many homes evidences of comfort and joy; to realize that all these have come, not as the dew from heaven, a gift to those who dwell there, but as the rewards of faithful and continued work; to be willing to do like work, and yet see before you only the cold, dark wall of a world's indifference, no inviting light, no welcoming voice, is a loneliness than which the world has none more terrible, none more appealing for the sweet touch of sympathy." What can the church do for such men? It can teach the world to be intolerant of conditions which subject men to the humiliation of unemployment. It is not of the Lord that families should starve because the bread-winner cannot find employment. The sufferings due to human ignorance and greed ought to be relieved by the intelligent action of believers in Jesus Christ.

For all classes of the poor the church can raise up friends and this is the best service it can give to them. The helpless poor can get some joy out of life if they have friends who understand them and have the privilege of ministering to them. The inefficient will take heart and try hard to learn if they know that some one cares for them and will rejoice in their success. There is absolutely no hope of reforming friendless criminals. We need not despair of any man who has a friend and knows that he has. The friendship which is based on faith in the God of our Lord Jesus Christ holds men up and keeps them out of the dependent classes. The honest toiler out of work needs friends. Friends can find employment for him. They can help him in a thousand ways until he is able to care for himself and family. He can endure the heartlessness of the world if there are a few whose sincere friendship is made evident by loyalty in a time of misfortune. The preachers of the gospel cannot solve all the problems of industrial society, but they can teach the religion of friendliness.

Lords Defeated by Democracy

England's democracy has the Lords on the hip. They are due for a fall in the first round at least. The Irish will support the Liberals straight through a program that means the passage of Lloyd-George's Budget and the Asquith resolutions on the Veto. The Lords will pass the Budget and without doubt veto the veto resolutions. They can only evade the crisis by offering amendments to them and seeking a compromise with the ministry on the basis of a reorganization of the House of Peers. Otherwise the prime minister will ask the king to "swamp" the Tories by "elevating" enough Liberals to pass the veto and if he refuses, go to the country on the single issue of abolishing their veto. The success of such an election will hinge on the kind of a proposition the Liberals put up. If it is radical and practically reduces parliament to a single house it will doubtless be defeated for the English people "do dearly love a Lord." If it is moderate and only modifies the upper house by allowing certain hereditary rights to seats with others filled in by a selection of those not peers the English proneness to make haste slowly will not be so apt to defeat their most needed legislative reform. Until a liberal government can have some assurance of a Liberal majority in both houses when given power by the people the fight will not end.

Taft's Greatest Declaration

President Taft has said many good and wise things together with some with which we cannot all agree. In moral effect he has made his greatest declaration in contending that questions of "national honor" should be submitted to arbitration. This "national honor" is the last refuge of militarism, which means it is the last relic of barbarism in international affairs. Just as our various federated states are deprived of any withheld questions of "commonwealth honor" and must submit all differences to the Federal Supreme Court the nations of the earth can submit every question of honor to an international court. The reservation of "national honor" leaves a fatal weakness in the matter of international arbitration. It is a refuge for all the excuses the stronger nation cares to make when it quarrels with the weaker and leaves no difficulty mandatory to the Hague Court. It leaves a sort of national "code duella" and of course is the refuge of those who think to gain more by strength than by judicial conciliation.

Secretary Knox's endeavor to have the International Prize Court made a supreme international tribunal for the arbitrament of all questions opens the pathway of least resistance for such an accomplishment and follows good precedent in the evolution of such events. President Taft's administration would win lasting fame if it could bring such a greatly to be desired consummation. Mr. Roosevelt mars his triumphant progress through the nations of the old world by sounding the strident war note in the name of peace. Would that his unsurpassed might were hallowed with a little more dominating idealism. Mr. Carnegie rouses the mirth of the paragraphers by declaring there is nothing to be gained by disarmament, the mirthful wits averring that it is so in good truth so far as steel is concerned.

The time is growing riper for another Hague Conference and no nation ever had our opportunity to lead in the quest of peace by boldly declaring for compulsory arbitration.

The Deathless Demand for Privilege

"Ship subsidy" is again dead. But it will rise again. It is one of those demands for privilege that are deathless. It seems to be a natural human frailty to demand some special right to the public pap. Its advocates have renewed their demand at every session of congress for years. It has seemed at times to be very near success but the public voice has defeated the scheme. There are perhaps enough men in congress committed to the paternalistic scheme of things to pass the bills but they fear the voices of the farmers and others who demand that no business be subsidized. The effort is always attended by a powerful lobby of the shipping interests. The plea is always that it is for the dear people and to build up commerce. Let the plea be made that we restore our one time shipping supremacy by removing the tariff on those articles of which ships are builded until we can compete with those of other nations who buy our steel and then build ships of it cheaper than we can build them of that same steel simply because they can buy it cheaper than we can. Or let the absurd law that forbids any foreign built ship from flying our flag be repealed and it would be found quickly that we are really doing a considerable part of the world's shipping under the flags of other nations because of the ridiculous effort to compel builders to use American material in spite of all the laws of trade and manufacture.

Pullman Rates Reduced

The figures given in these columns some weeks ago have been verified by the Interstate Commerce Commission and they have ordered that certain rates be reduced by the Pullman Company. The principle is established that the upper is not worth as much as the lower berth and the rates fixed at about three-fourths that charged for the lower. Rates from Chicago to the coast are reduced in the special case under consideration. These rulings must in time be brought to apply to all rates unless the company obtains a reversal in the courts. The report of the commission cites the fact that the company has made profits more than equal to its capital in ten years.

A Temple of Peace

The dedication of the building erected for the use of the American Republics was not attended by as much acclaim or given as much newspaper space as a skirmish in a Central American rebellion would receive. It was not spectacular but it was prophetic. In giving impetus to the design Mr. Carnegie has made one of his most significant benefactions. Every nation on the continent, excepting Canada, made a contribution and will find there a center for future comity. As between all nations, parties, and sects there is much more of common interest than of conceivable difference between the American Republics. In his recent tour of the South American countries, Mr. Bryan found the ideals of American democracy everywhere held. That the sister republics have not been able to live up to them is not more significant than that we ourselves have not been able to do so. We have come nearer to them and our remissness has not been that of these less mature peoples but we have also misjudged them, judging their affairs at a distance, basing our judgments on misreports and badly colored news, and passing our judgments in an unsympathetic manner. Mr. Bryan was received everywhere as if he were an official representative of our people and his messaage to all is "God has made us neighbors; may justice make us friends." His unofficial journey has done much to enlighten the nations there as to the real ideals of our nation and to assure them that the people of the United States desire only comity and not exploitation. In unofficial ambassadorial journeys like this our greatest American idealist and Apostle of Peace plays his best role.

Mr. Bryan's Temperance Platform

The Great Commoner returns home to find his temperance promulgations both championed and assailed with undue temper and to find himself the usual victim of abuse and misconstruction. On the one hand he is accused of championing a new cause to increase political prestige and on the other to get even with some who deserted him. He replies with his usual equanimity and sets forth his position with his usual clearness in a recent issue of the Commoner.

He reminds his detractors that there is little to be gained politically by defying the powerful liquor interests in the Democratic party and that it will cost him the friendship of many men who have supported him on other issues. He also reminds his over enthusiastic prohibition admirers that he has not espoused national prohibition nor does he expect to see the issue in national politics soon. But he says emphatically that the liquor interests have become too dominant in politics and that the evil nature of the trade forbids its having anything to do with political matters. He is against the influence of any particular interest in political affairs and above all of such an one as that of liquor. He is for local option because it is a cardinal principle in self-government and no people ought to be deprived of the right to abolish an evil like the saloon if they desire to do so. To that end he will advocate county option in Nebraska and lend his voice to severe restrictive legislation for those counties that retain the saloons. He condemns those Nebraska legislators who defeated the Initiative and Referendum bills last winter at the behest of the liquor lobby as undemocratic. He also renews his advocacy of such legislation as will forbid the issuance of federal licenses in territory that has been made "dry" by the will of its citizens. If it is unconstitutional to deny an internal revenue license in one place without denying it in all he would then compel every applicant to present his request to local officials at the same time he sent it to Washington and also require that its issuance be published in the local press where issued. After a fair trial of it Lincoln recently went "dry" by a majority practically three times as great as in its first vote and in an election that polled more ballots than any in its history.

Another Anti-Tariff Landslide

The "stand-patters" must be getting somewhat shaken out of their bourbonistic self complacency and easy assurance that because things are so they must therefore always so be. The landslides in the election of De Armond's successor in Missouri and of Foss in Boston is now followed by one in Rochester, N. Y., that is quite as significant. The normal republican majority has been 6,000, but in the last election it was 10,000. Now, Havens, a democrat, who conducted his campaign entirely on the tariff issue, is elected by 5,000. It is true that Aldridge, his opponent, had an unsavory record, but Havens denies making that an issue and claims the victory for the opposition to the Aldrich tariff. The "insurgents" also so interpret it.

The announcement of the intention of both Aldrich and Hale to retire at the close of the present congress is hailed with satisfaction by all progressives and general relief by the country. They have been the chief representatives of special interests in congress for a generation and were so adept at the political art that they virtually controlled the senate through the deeply rooted party systems and the precedents of the body. Both states may put reactionaries in their places, but they will only count for two, while these two able senators of another day counted for all but a majority against any opposition.

A few years ago Senator LaFollette was boycotted by his colleagues when he attempted to address them. He reminded them that he would speak some day to their successors and would be heard. A few days ago he made one of his characteristic forays and was listened to with intense attention by the whole senate and a great crowd in the galleries. His lonesomeness has been relieved by a number of such new recruits as Bristow and Cummins and the winning of a number of such old ones as Dolliver and Beveridge. Their power waxes while that of the Aldriches and Hales wanes.

What a Tariff Costs the Consumer

Senator Dolliver figures that the tariff costs the people of the United States more than $2,000,000,000 per annum. The cost is not in what the government gets, but in what it brings in increased prices on all protected articles. For every dollar the tariff brings the government in revenue, the consumer pays seven dollars in the increased prices the tariff creates in commodities. If all this accrued to labor there would be no complaint, but Judge Groscupp joins Dolliver in saying that but a modicum of it goes to labor, while the trust eats up the larger part. Never in the history of the world have great fortunes been made so rapidly as in this country in the past generation under our tariff and in things on which the tariff prevents any foreign competition. Never in the history of the world did money make money so rapidly, and it is doubtful if the chasm between the wealth of the tenth at the top and the seven tenths at the bottom was ever so great.

It has been cited as a proof that the new tariff was a revision downward, that it reduced the tax on articles of which we used $5,000,000,000 a year. Of this great sum, metals total a billion and a quarter, and prices have risen since the passage of the bill. Lumber represents a half billion, and Canada, our only competitor, is discriminated against until lumber interests are better protected than before. Sugar represents a third of a billion and the reduction was about one dollar per ton. Agricultural articles represent another half billion and have steadily risen since the passage of the law because they need no protection really. Soft coal represents almost another billion, and the reduction was so slight that no over-sea competitor will be able to benefit by it. And so fully four-fifths of the grand total represents no benefit to the consumer. Meanwhile, the great trusts sell more cheaply abroad than at home.

The Saloon and the Divorce Court

One divorce out of every five is granted directly for intemperance. In twenty years, 184,568 divorces have been granted for that one cause in the United States alone. In nine cases out of every ten the husband was the offender. This says nothing of the thousands of wives who suffer in silence, nor of the thousands of divorces granted where liquor is a contributing cause.

The Preacher in the English Parliament

An Interview with Rev. C. Silvester Horne, M. P.

By Leslie W. Morgan

An interview now and again with some of England's prominent men in the field of religion, social welfare or politics may be of interest to Christian Century readers. To me nothing is more interesting than life, and men of action are the highest expression of this. Perhaps no man in England more fitly or more worthily represents the three fields of activity named above than does the WHITEFIELD'S.

Rev. C. Silvester Horne, lately elected to parliament from Ipswich. He is a preacher of commanding ability, a platform speaker on social and political themes who has no peer and a social worker who stands in the front rank, as evidenced by the work being done at Whitefield's Tabernacle in Tottenham Court Road, London, of which he is the superintendent.

A Good Golfer and Generous.

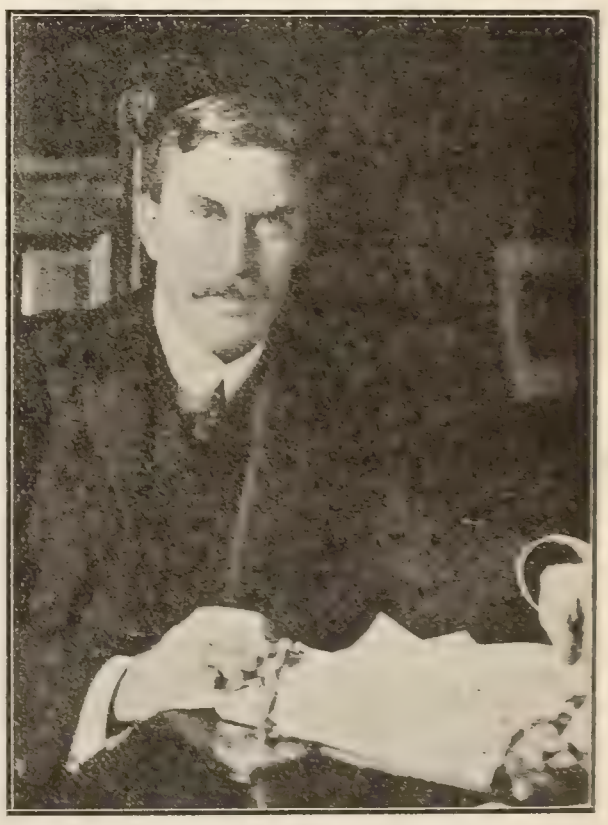
The pleasure is frequently mine of meeting Mr. Horne on the golf links here and there as the Free Church ministers get together now and then for friendly competition among themselves, or to meet a team composed of members of the House of Commons, members of the National Liberal Club or perhaps London Journalists. We were playing the latter one day at Walton Heath, the course made famous by James Braid, who is the professional there, and four times open golf champion of Great Britain, and Mr. Horne and I happened to be thrown together in the afternoon's foursomes. Some attempt was made at an interview, but the absorbing interest of even an ordinary game of golf leaves but scant thought for other things, and this was not an ordinary game as we must win a point for our side, which we did, in spite of Mr. Horne's characteristic generosity in suggesting that we should not claim two strokes due to us. But whether winning or losing, Horne is always a hail fellow well met on the links or anywhere. His dominating note is cheerfulness and optimism.

It was at the House of Commons a few days later that the opportunity for a quiet chat offered itself by appointment and I assumed the role of an inquisitor. Asked about his boyhood, the first remark that was forthcoming (in view doubtless of his interviewer being an American) was that he had always counted it a marvelous escape that he was not called Lincoln, having been born on the day that America's first martyr President died; Rev. J. D. Jones, of Bournemouth, Mr. Horne's nearest ministerial friend, also escaped although he was born on the day Lincoln was shot.

Began Preaching at Sixteen.

Asked about his university days, Mr. Horne said he began preaching at sixteen, too young he admitted, and afterward went to Glasgow University, and then to Oxford, studying at Mansfield. It was in the university debating society at Glasgow, of which he became president, that Mr. Horne got his first experience in what will now stand him in good stead as a member of the House of Commons. Drummond was at Glasgow during that period and he recalled the wonderful influence he had over the students and lamented his early death. His was the most striking combination of scientist and evangelist he had ever known.

Mr. Horne was asked whether he had seen many changes in his twenty-one years' ministry in London, the first twelve years at Kensington Chapel, a fashionable district, and since then at Whitefield's in Central London. The reply was that the changes were not so striking or so great as some tried to make out. True, the "week-end" habit had grown, but that did not affect the Free Church as much as it did the Established Church, as the week-enders were from among the well-to-do. Perhaps if Whitefield's had less drawing power than it has, its genial superintendent would find that the increased facilities for travel in London in the last ten years would empty his part of the city at service times, but on account of its great magnetic power, the increased facilities for travel enable people from all parts to get to, not away from, Tottenham Court Road, when anything is on at the "Central Mission." This is a phase of the situation that doubtless gave color to his opinion but which modesty would forbid him to mention. The truth is that the situation in London has changed adversely for some men. It depends upon the man.



Believes in a Persuasive Religion.

It would obviously be impossible to hold such an interview and not mention religion and politics, even if it had not been held immediately after the Free Church Council gatherings at Hull when one of the live themes was a consideration of the question as to whether the work of the Free Church Council should not be confined to strictly religious activities. The reply of Mr. Horne to my question on this point was as certainly anticipated as if the question had been put to Dr. Clifford himself, the Nestor in matters religio-political. "It is a mistake to divide life into air-tight compartments. Life is a unit. Religion has to do with everything. It should be the controlling element in every thing. It should predominate in business, in the home, in politics and in society as well as in the church. The Roman Catholic idea is right, although the method is wrong. We must take the idea, we must avoid the method." There is not a better embodiment of such endeavor than the speaker.

It was in his maiden speech in the house a few nights before that he had sounded a note that is too infrequently heard in such circles, a call for dependence not upon the construction of more Dreadnaughts so much as upon a strengthening of the moral fiber of the nation. Predictions are rife as to whether this popular platform orator will make his mark in Parliament, and some are saying that his style of address is not suited to that august body, being too fiery and passionate. At least the maiden speech was a success and had a freshness and buoyancy about it that the House liked. Mr. Horne may be passionate and at times almost vehement in his delivery, but he is sure of his facts, gives the impression that he knows what he is talking about, and is ever ready with his wit if interrupted. When Lloyd-George is Prime Minister and Winston Churchill is Chancellor of the Exchequer, let us hope Silvester Horne will be Secretary of Peace, an office yet to be created.

Flourishing Institutional Work.

When that time comes what will become of Whitefield's? At present its presiding genius is under promise not to allow his parliamentary duties to interfere with the progress of the work there. In nine years the work at Whitefield's has taken front rank as an institutional church, rivaled for first place only by S. F. Collier's famous Central Mission in Manchester. "A Year's Work in Central London: the Story of Whitefield's in 1909-10," reads like a romance. Institutional church work received a great impetus when nine years ago Mr. Horne resigned his fashionable charge in S. W. London to undertake the superintendency in behalf of the London Congregational Union, of their central mission in Tottenham Court Road, in the heart of the business district. The situation is ideal for such a work. True, it would be easily possible to fail with a weak man at its head, but with a strong man there, it has been proved to be gloriously possible to succeed. Some say, "Who could not succeed with such helpers, rich financial backers, speakers of the front rank, singers of national reputation and social and political lights who would of themselves draw?" Just so, but who commands their attendance, who makes it worth their while to come, who directs the work with such accurate skill that no plan fails? It is not his man Friday, although he has several of them, but Crusoe himself.

It would take nearly or quite a column to but little more than enumerate the multiform activities carried on at Whitefield's. There is the Men's Meeting, held on Sunday afternoon, with a membership of 1,700, and an attendance always of at least 1,500, where a speaker of national reputation is sure to be heard, then there is the social and tea hour before the evening service when 1,000 to 1,500 people gather in Toplady Hall and drink tea and chat together, and a repetition of the same after the evening service, with the substitution of coffee perhaps, as a drink. Then there are the clubs of a dozen different kinds for men and boys, women and children. All sorts of games are provided for the former, from billiards downwards. Then there are the Saturday night concerts when leading artists of all kinds are secured and there is a packed house. The Sunday afternoon men's meeting is becoming almost as world-famous as Dr. Parker's, now Mr. R. J. Campbell's, Thursday noon service. The entire world is made to yield its tribute of speakers. A number of Americans are very popular at Whitefield's, and pay a visit every time they come to London. They could not go to a better place to see the optimistic side of London religious life. The spirit of optimism is in the atmosphere. A journalistic friend of Mr. Horne's told him the other day that he wished he was as certain of even one thing as he (Mr. Horne) seemed to be of everything. This is the spirit that conquers.

Mark Twain's First Story

"The Jumping Frog," which Mark Twain wrote away back in the '60s was the first story to give him prominence. It was told to him in the dilapidated tavern in the mining camp of Angel's by Sam Wheeler, of whom he inquired concerning a Rev. Leonidas W. Smiley, a young minister of the gospel, who had at one time been a resident of Angel's camp:

"Rev. Leonidas W.—H'm—Reverend Le—well, there was a feller here once by the name of Jim Smiley in the winter of '49. * * * He was the curiousest man about, always betting on everything that turned up you ever see, if he could get anybody to bet on the other side, and if he couldn't he'd change sides. * * *

"Well, this yer Smiley had rat-tarriers, and chicken-cocks, and tom-cats and all them sort of things, till you couldn't rest, and you couldn't fetch nothing for him to bet on that he couldn't match you. He ketched a frog one day and took him home, and said he cal'lated to educate him; and so he never done nothing for three months but set in his back yard and learn that frog to jump. And you bet he did learn him, too. H'd give him a little punch behind, and the next minute you'd see that frog whirling in the air like a doughnut—see him turn one summerset, or maybe a couple, if he got a good start, and come down flatfooted and all right, like a cat.

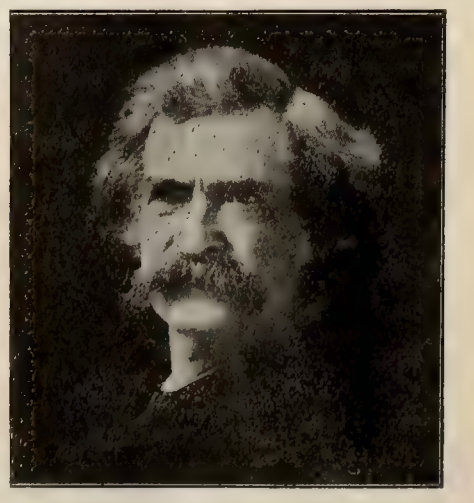
"He got him up so in the matter of ketching flies, and kep' him in practice so constant, that he'd nail a fly everytime as far as he could see him. Smiley said all a frog wanted was education, and he could do 'most anything—and I believe him. Why, I've seen him set Dan'l Webster down here in this floor—Dan'l Webster was the name of the frog—and sing out 'Flies, Dan'l, Flies,' and quicker'n you could wink he'd spring straight up and snake a fly off'n the counter there, and flop down on the floor agin as solid as a gob of mud, and fall to scratching the side of his head with his hind foot, as indifferent as if he hadn't no idea he'd been doing any more'n any frog might do. You never see a frog so modest and straightforard as he was, for all he was so gifted. And when it came to a fair and square jumping on a level, he could get over more ground at one straddle than any animal of his breed you ever see. Jumping on a deal level was his long suit, you understand; and when it come to that Smiley would ante up money on him as long as he had a red. * * *

"Well, Smiley kep' the beast in a little lattice box, and he used to fetch him downtown sometimes and lay for a bet. One day a feller—a stranger in the camp, he was—come acrost him with his box, and says: 'What might it be that you've got in the box?' And Smiley says sorter indifferent-like, 'It might be a parrot, or it might be a canary, maybe, but it ain't—it's only just a frog * * * he can outjump any frog in Calaveras County.'

"The feller took the box again, and took another long, particular look, and give it back to Smiley, and says, very deliberate, 'Well,' he says, 'I don't see no p'ints about that frog that's any better'n any other frog.' 'Maybe you don't,' Smiley says * * * Anyways I've got my opinion, and I'll resk forty dollars that he can outjump any frog in Calaveras County.'

"The feller studied a minute, and then says kinder sad-like, 'Well, I'm only a stranger here, and I ain't got no frog; but if I had a frog I'd bet you.' And then Smiley says, '* * * if you'l hold my box a minute I'll go get you a frog.' And so the feller put up his forty dollars alongside of Smiley's and set down to wait.

"Se he set there a good while, thinking and thinking to hisself, and then he got the frog out and pried his mouth open, and took a teaspoon and filled him full of quail-shot—filled him pretty near up to his chin—and set him on the floor. Smiley he went to the swamp and slipped around in the mud for a long time, and finally he ketched a frog, and fetched him in, and give him to this feller, and says:



"'Now, if you're ready, set him alongside of Dan'l, with his forepaws just even with Dan'l's and I'll give the word.' Then he says, 'One, two, three, git!' and him and the feller touched up the frogs from behind and the new frog hopped off lively, but Dan'l give a heave, and hysted up his shoulders—so—like a Frenchman, but it warn't no use—he couldn't budge; he was planted as solid as a church and he couldn't no more stir than if he was anchored out. Smiley was a good deal surprised, and he was disgusted, too, but he didn't have no idea what the matter was, of course.

"The feller took the money and started away; and when he was going out the door he sorter jerked his thumb over his shoulder—so—at Dan'l, and says again, very deliberate: 'Well,' he says, 'I don't see no p'ints about that frog that's any better'n any other frog.'

"Smiley, he stood scratching his head and looking down at Dan'l a long while, and at last he says: "I do wonder what in the nation that frog throw'd off for—I wonder if there ain't something the matter with him—he 'pears to look mighty baggy somehow.' And he ketches Dan'l by the back of the neck, and hefted him, and says: 'Why, blame my cats, if he don't weigh five pounds!' and turned him upside down, and he belched out a double handful of shot. And then he see how it was, and he was the maddest man—he set the frog down and took out after the feller, but he never ketched him. * * *"

Facts About the Late Mark Twain

Mark Twain (Samuel L. Clemens) America's great literary humorist who passed away last week, was born in the little hamlet of Florida, Mo., November 30, 1835, the son of a poor lawyer. After a few years of crude schooling young Clemens, at the age of twelve, entered a printing office at Hannibal, Mo., to which town the family had moved. After knocking about the country for some years the future literary genius turned his

James H. Gilliland: Man and Minister

A Character Sketch by His Colleague Pastor

Rev. Edgar DeWitt Jones

"If you would see his monuments, look about you." Right well might this historic epigram (slightly changed) be applied to James H. Gilliland and his twenty-two years' ministry in Bloomington, Ill.

Mr. Gilliland came to the pastorate of the old First Church here February 1, 1888. He was then a slim, boyisn-looking and (outside of the pulpit) eloquently quiet young man. But, my! how he could preach. The church prospered under his ministry from the very first. In 1890, the present First Church edifice was dedicated. To this day the building ranks with the leading church edifices of the city, being adequate in almost every respect, except the Bible school equipment, to house a congregation considerably above the one thousand mark.

In 1902, the membership of the First Church having reached 1,555, Mr. Gilliland resigned to build a second church, taking from the First a nucleus of 250 members for the new enterprise.

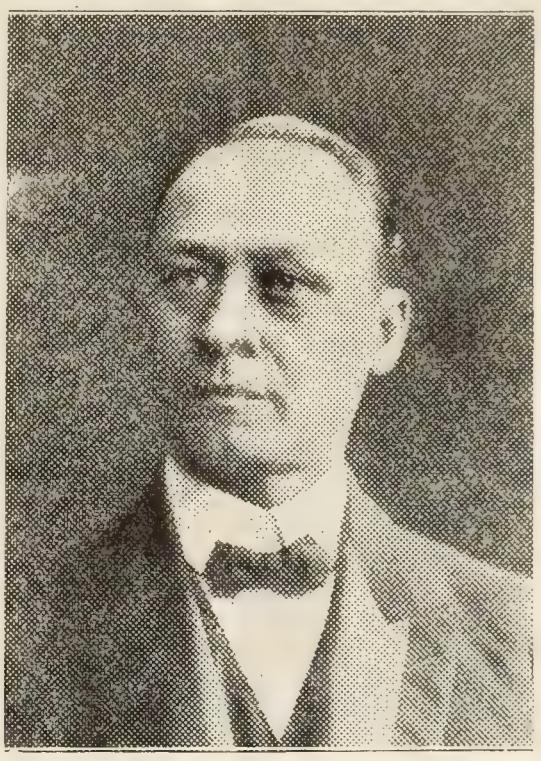
A handsome building was erected and Mr. Gilliland remained as minister until July 1, 1909, when he resigned the pastorate of the Second Church to organize on East Grove street the "Centennial Church." When Mr. Gilliland laid down the leadership of the Second Church, there was a membership of more than 600 there, ninety of whom followed him to his newest enterprise.

Sunday, May 1, the beautiful building on East Grove street (one of the finest residence streets in Bloomington) was dedicated, Mr. Gilliland preaching the sermon and the pastors of the First and Second Churches assisting. The Centennial Church cost in excess of $25,000, is modern, handsome, up-to-date, and everything else that a consummate church-edifice connoiseur could wish.

The Man.

Now, a few words as to this extraordinary man, James H. Gilliland.

To begin with he is modest and unassuming. He is not a convention or occasion man —that is, he does not care for a place on programs of that kind. Time and again our secretaries have tried without avail to get him on the National Convention platform. But Mr. Gilliland could not be induced to speak, and the loss is the brotherhood's; and Mr. Gilliland's, too, that such an able man's voice has not been oftener heard in our forums and councils. But whenever J. H. Gilliland does appear on a county or state convention program, as he does once in a while, he never disappoints the people,—never.



As a Preacher.

As a preacher among the Disciples Mr. Gilliland has no superior (I was about to write no equal) in the realm of doctrinal presentations and expositions of scripture. He is our MacLaren, without MacLaren's mellowness, perhaps, or versaltility, but in clear, sharp, clean-cut analysis every whit his equal. Mr. Gilliland never fails in his pulpit work. That is to say he strikes such a high average that no one is ever conscious of any weak or illy prepared sermons. He is not imaginative in style, seldom uses illustrations other than Biblical ones, and by the average hearer would not be called a "popular preacher." But he is a great preacher and that is still better. He is virile, philosophical, practical, biblical, earnest, but seldom humorous or pathetic.

As a Pastor.

As a pastor, Mr. Gilliland is as far removed from the bell-pulling parson as one could imagine. One seldom sees him on the street. He never makes calls unless he is really needed or people send for him. He doesn't tell funny stories or make after-dinner speeches. Yet when one comes to know him intimately he discovers a big-hearted, kindly man who at first impresses one as diffident and reserved.

Mr. Gilliland is a student, a buyer and reader of the great and scholarly books of this and other days. He has one of the finest private theological libraries in the state, if not the finest. He subscribes for the leading periodicals of both America and Europe. He takes most of the leading journals of the various denominations. He is mentally alert always, is strictly modern in scholarship, research and methods, but he never takes his tools into the pulpit. I dare say there is not a university professor among us better informed as to modern thought, than this modest, patient, independent, phlegmatic and loyal preacher, whose message rings clear and trumpet-toned for the Christ of Galilee.

Successful in Business.

Mr. Gilliland is a successful business man. Unlike most preachers, he is independently well off through wise and judicious investments. Had he devoted himself entirely to business, he would be very wealthy, so the best business men of his acquaintance say—maybe a millionaire!

As it is, he has kept the faith, accumulated a competence, built three churches in twenty years in the same city, brought thousands to the leadership of Jesus—and is only fifty years old. What may we not yet expect of him?

At the laying of the corner store of the Centennial Church last fall the writer in the course of a brief address, propounded a conundrum. It was this: "If J. H. Gilliland builds three churches in Bloomington in twenty years, and continues the pace, how many would he build if he should live to be as old as Methuselah?" How many would he?

For such a man and such a ministry we are profoundly thankful. May the Giver of all good spare J. H. Gilliland yet many years to his devoted wife and daughter, to Bloomington, to Illinois and to the world.

Popular Books

By Arthur Hoyle.

To read nothing but the popular books, and the books which require little real attention, the books which will fascinate the shallow and ill-formed, the books which will easily lend themselves to immediate use in the pulpit, may be the temptation of a busy man who is overdriven by the task of the day; but if he gives all his time to this kind of reading, and does not secure any sort of road-metal, he will have no very passable roads, and will have a mind over which there might, perhaps, with advantage, be written, "No Thoroughfare." If this could be done with the minds which really have no power of leading us anywhere, it would be a very just and righteous thing, would save us infinite trouble, and would be very shocking for some idols of the market-place. Of these minds, most are produced by the folly of hand-to-mouth reading, reading which will lend itself to immediate productiveness. It is the deep plowing that deepens the soil—or at least I hope it is, even in the matter of farming: I am sure it is in the things of the mind. It may not be that one will find the fruit at once, but it shall be found, after many days, and found in great abundance.

I remember talking once with Doctor Banks about Martineau's "Types of Ethical Theory." He seemed delighted that I had been reading such a book. He had some recollection of my earlier days, of my first sorrows and failures; he was thinking of an old student who, at any rate, tried. He said: "Ah! That is a book that puts iron in your blood." The phrase has stuck to me, ever since, and it has been a help to me all the time. It is the book which puts iron into the blood that really counts, and that makes a man. If one reads these books, and sticks at about a dozen of them in the year, and really masters them, there is no fear. On second thought, I do not know that it is quite necessary to tackle more than half a dozen in the year; but if a few of them are really tackled, and mastered, there is some likelihood that there will soon be found nothing at all in the popular productions which are so freely advertised, and which sell in so many thousands. They are superfluous; you can do all that kind of thing for yourself.—Methodist Recorder, London.

The Soul in the Face

It is said there is no thought that is good in the mind but soon looks good in the face. Heart qualities are artists that work, indeed, behind the screen, yet at last they strike through the canvas and become manifest in the facial illumination. Contrariwise, in men long inured to vice and crime, sinful thoughts within have so disposed of the facial tissue without that the countenance has in it something of the crawling serpent.

Our Readers' Opinions

"An Incorrect Classification"

Editors Christian Century: I think you are quite justified in entering a demurrer against the classification of the Disciples as Baptists, and in pointing out its unfortunate implications as seeming to widen the distance between us and denominations other than Baptists. But I believe there are deeper reasons for such a classification than the one you assign.

That both bodies are immersionists may be a sufficient justification for such a classification in the popular mind, but hardly so to a man like Dr. H. K. Carroll. But there is a real reason for treating the Disciples as "Baptist" in the wider sense quite independently of their common opposition to paedobaptism and advocacy of immersion. The impulse that made both these peoples immersionists and anti-paedobaptists is itself the family characteristic that proclaims their oneness.

I remember that Dr. E. Y. Mullins, at the Indianapolis Congress some years ago, said something to the effect that the movement led by the Campbells was the natural and logical development of Baptist principles, and that, in their day, it represented the true Baptist Church. That was a great and courageous thing for Dr. Mullins to say, and perhaps we may acquiese without overmuch self-consciousness.

Now, what are the principles, lying back of mere form, that ally the Baptists and Disciples, historically, as these bodies are allied to no other bodies in Christendom? In answering this question, I must take quite frank exception to a paragraph in the editorial in which you discuss this question. I do not wish to pose as a defender of the Baptists, but it is we, and not they, who suffer when we allow ourselves to misrepresent them, as I think you do, unintentionally, in the paragraph referred to. You say:

> The Baptist denomination is a portion of the Church of Christ organized around the dogma that the Scriptures teach, and Christ commands, immersion only. They are propagandists of this dogma.

Now I believe this to be a caricature of the Baptist position. It is not one whit more true of the Baptists than it is of the Disciples. There is not a leading Baptist in the world but would repudiate the statement, as doubtless you would do yourself when you see it in this bald form. Baptists are 'organized around' two principles, neither of which has anything to do with the form of baptism, except as they determine the whole Baptist polity and practice. The first of these principles is the spirituality of religion, and the second is the freedom of the individual. These are the two foci which determine the circumference of the Baptist faith. For centuries they stood almost alone for these principles. For a study of religious principles, as affects the Baptists and Congregationalists, no more instructive comparison could be made than between the sister colonies of Rhode Island and Massachusetts, —the former founded by Roger Williams as a retreat for men who wanted, not to be free, but to let other people be free; the latter founded by men who sought freedom for themselves, and whose attitude toward those who differed from them was one of bigotry and intolerance and persecuting zeal. The former was a Baptist colony, the latter an Independent or Congregationalist. If Congregationalists have in many cases become liberal and tolerant, it is because they have learned those graces from the Baptists—or from the New Testament—and not because they are essential principles of Congregationalism; and if some Baptists have become narrow and bigoted and intolerant of innovation, it is because they have forgotten, or never learned, their great traditions as a people.

The name 'Baptist,' or, in its earlier form, 'Anabaptist,' was not the choice of the people who wear it; it was flung at them by their enemies, and stuck to them, and has ever since been their heaviest handicap, as their leading men testify. And to write as though it described them is to do them greatest injustice—which I know The Christian Century would be the last to do. In the matter of their great traditions, the Disciples are related to the Baptists as they are related to no other people in the world, and I doubt if anything is to be gained by ignoring that fact. We have nothing to be ashamed of in our ancestry. The history of the Baptists is the Eleventh Chapter of Hebrews drawn out into cyclopaedic dimensions. There are no affiliations in the world that will be of more advantage to the principles for which we plead than Baptist affiliations. The Baptists and Disciples can, together,—if only they are faithful to their common glorious traditions as the champions of spirituality and freedom in religion,—do anything they determine to do; apart, they can only fail.

Now, of course you agree with all this; I know you do, because it is all mere commonplace and it is all true! and the Christian Century while rarely commonplace, is always true! But why then did you write that paragraph in the editorial?

Disciples, Baptists and Others

Editors Christian Century: I am delighted to see the last editorial of the Christian Century. What a joy it is to our hearts who had no mothers, fathers, grandmothers or grandfathers in the Christian Church to see this viewpoint now being thrust to the front. When I became a Disciple, I thought I was doing something to promote Christian union; I felt the urgency of our Saviour's prayer for the oneness of his followers. I was a professing Christian four years in the Y. M. C. A. work before I was immersed, and when I was immersed I said, "Now I can plead and pray and live for Christian union, because I have set my own feet upon a Christian union platform." But after saying this I feel that I am a better Baptist than many who allow themselves to be called Baptists. In the Baptist confession of Faith published in 1611 is the following article: "Every church ought according to the example of Christ's disciples in the primitive churches upon every first day of every week to assemble together to pray, to prophesy, to praise God and break bread."

The above is true to the New Testament; Baptists must once more get back to Christ which means Christian union. I also feel that I am a better Presbyterian than the modern members of that great religious body.

John Calvin said: "Every week at least, the table of the Lord should be spread for Christian Assemblies."

The Disciples here stand with John Calvin —because John Calvin stands on New Testament teaching and practice.

Again I feel that my brand of "Methodism" is superior to the one that is in current use. I have two bound volumes of John Wesley's sermons in my library.

From one of these sermons preached from the words, "Do this in remembrance of me," Luke 22:19, on "The Duty of Constant Communion," I copy the following: "Make not reverence to God's command a pretence for breaking it. Do not rebel against him, for fear of offending him. Whatever you do, or leave undone, besides, be sure to do what God bids you do. . . . Objection against constant communion is, that it abates our reverence for the sacrament. Suppose it did? What then? Will you thence conclude that you are not to receive it constantly? This does not follow. God commands you, 'Do this.' You may do it now, but will not; and to excuse yourself say, 'If I do it so often it will abate the reverence with which I do it now.' Suppose it did; has God ever told you, that when the obeying his command abates your reverence for it, then you may disobey it? If he has, you are guiltless; if not, what you say is just nothing to the purpose. The law is clear. Either show that the Lawgiver makes this exception or you are guilty before him." Again Wesley says: "I advise the elders to administer the supper of the Lord on every Lord's Day. . . . With the first Christians this Christian sacrifice (the communion) was a constant part of the Lord's Day's service." Wesley does not say "constant part of the Sabbath day's service," but the Lord's Day's service." The Methodists would be better Methodists of the John Wesley type if they should come back to the New Testament teaching and practice on the subject of the communion, but coming back to this position because Wesley stands there is a matter of indifference; but coming back to this position because the church of the New Testament was left here by Christ and the apostles is no matter of indifference. It means the "to-geth-er-ness" of God's people and this means the conquest of the world. Dr. Doddridge commenting on Acts 20:7 says: "It is well known the primitive Christians administered the eucharist (Lord's supper) every Lord's Day; and as that was the most solemn and appropriate act of worship, it is no wonder that it should be mentioned as the end of their assembling."

The time has come for us to show that our position is inclusive of all Christians, that we have made an honest, earnest effort to "prove all things," by the Word, and are now holding "fast to that which is good." Dr. Fisher of Yale, before his death, said: "The centrifugal forces of the church are already spent, centripetal action has now set in." May God grant our people a deeper appreciation of the majesty and the glory of that goal toward which they move and may The Christian Century magnify the means by which that goal is to be reached, viz., a sense of the power and teachings of Jesus Christ as these teachings are mediated to us through or by the scriptures. Sincerely,

Greencastle, Ind. J. M. Rudy.

Some Questions to Dr. Gates

Editors Christian Century: Your expressed willingness to receive criticisms or questions on Dr. Gates' recent paper leads me to send the following:

You say, "A new universe will mean a new deity; and that is what we have in the modern age."

1. Is God a religious concept somewhat as an atom is a scientific concept, or is He a Spirit having the attributes and relations assigned to him in the Gospels? If He be a concept, it is plain enough that men may from time to time need a new one; but if He is a Spirit, is the teaching of Jesus concerning him sufficient for the most accurate comprehension of the universe, or has science already shown that this universe does not and cannot stand in any relation to the God and Father of Jesus?

2. In substance you say, the mediæval man believed in a transcendent, extra-mundane God, while the modern man believes in an immanent, indwelling God. You agree with Professor Rauschenbusch that the Hebrews had a richer faith than the mediævals had. They (the Hebrews) went to school with a living God, etc.

No one cares to defend the mediæval man. His faults were many. It may be that in some time of religious zeal he may have cried out, "Oh that thou wouldst rend the heavens, that thou wouldst come down, that the mountains might flow down at thy presence; as when fire kindleth the brushwood and the fire causeth the waters to boil; to make thy name known to thine adversaries, that the nations may tremble at thy presence; when thou didst terrible things which we looked not for, thou cam'st down." Or when his soul was sorely afflicted he may have exclaimed, "My God, my God why hast thou forsaken me?" All this might be taken as clear proof that the mediæval man believed in an absentee-God, and had not the richer faith of the Hebrews, nor the clearer insight of the moderns. But when I read that the mediæval man believed in a transcendent God, and the modern man believes in an immanent God, I remember that there is another class including Aristotle, Paul and many others who have believed in a God who is over all, through all and in all. My question is with regard to this class. Is this faith to be rejected because it says that God is over all—is transcendent? If this faith of Paul and others should be found to be correct, what must be said of the faith of the mediæval man who said God is over all and of the faith of the modern man, who says, No, God is in all?

3. "The ethical is the divine."

Here we must understand ethical to mean right being and right doing. This proposition was probably obtained by saying, God does right, that is, the divine is ethical and then the terms were inverted. God is love. Does that mean that anything that any one may call love may be predicated of God? We read of the love of the chief seats in the synagogue. This love was certainly not divine. Love as predicated of God cannot be taken in a universal sense. If the proposition, The ethical is the divine, is an equation it must be put into the form, All the ethical is all the divine. Does that mean that everything that is called ethical is divine? If this is an equation, which is the known quantity, or, are both quantities but partially known? How can such an equation be solved? This recalls the conversation between Socrates and Euthyphron. The latter thought he knew what was right or ethical in any given case. Socrates wished to know how he knew this. He answered, whatever is pleasing to the gods is right. Socrates was able to show him that the gods were frequently at variance with each other, and therefore what was pleasing to one might be displeasing to another. Euthyphron failed to make good his claim because he had no infallible standard of right. Now if you had been there, could you have shown Socrates what would be ethical in every case?

4. I have often thought of the great advantage we have in being able to point to Jesus and say there is the infallible standard. In the difficulties and perplexities of life the answer I give to my soul is, this must be right, for it is what Jesus taught by word and deed. But if we must first learn from Jesus what is right, how can we prove that he is divine by showing that he did right?

5. The equation, The ethical is the divine, may easily invite the modern man to sit in judgment on Jesus and to pronounce his conduct ethical or otherwise instead of examining his own conduct in the light of the life of Jesus to see whether it is ethical or not.

Lest I be misunderstood, I will say, that I do not question the value of the above equation, when it is directed against legalism, as I believe it is in this case. No man can understand Jesus, that is, the divine, who has not an earnest desire to be right; and no man can know what is right who does not look constantly unto Jesus.

Eldon, Mo. H. C. GARVIN.

Response by Dr. Gates

1. Replying to the above criticisms by numbered paragraphs, I would say concerning the first, that what I meant by the modern age having a "new deity," was a new conception of deity. Not a new, either, for the Alexandrian theologians taught a doctrine of the Divine Immanence, under the form of the Logos doctrine (see Allen, Continuity of Christian Thought, pp. 23-94, et al.). But the modern age through its conception of natural law and order throughout the universe has revived the Greek idea. Prof. Bowne says: "In law itself we are face to face with God; and natural consequences have a supernatural meaning." (The Immanence of God, p. 131.)

2. In saying that "the modern man believes in an immanent deity" I neither said nor implied that he denied the transcendence of deity. God is both immanent and transcendent. I use the statement of Prof. Clarke (An Outline of Christian Theology, p. 130), and make it my own: "The ideas of immanence and transcendence are sometimes set in opposition to each other, and each has even had its advocates; but this, at least in the present age, is needless and wrong. Each concept needs the other. Transcendence without immanence would give Deism cold and barren; immanence without transcendence would give us Pantheism fatalistic and paralyzing." I commend Prof. Clarke's entire discussion of the doctrine of God both in his Outline and in his new work on, The Doctrine of God. (International Theological Library, Scribners, N. Y.)

3. "The Ethical equals the Divine."

With the proof or disproof of this stands or falls the distinction of modern religious thought.

My address was written to disprove the charge of unbelief that is made against modern religious thought. My subject was, "The Increasing Faith of Modern Religious Thought." I had the choice of two methods of proof: Either to show the modern believer's faith by his doctrinal confession, or to show his faith by his works. I chose the former method. I wanted to deal with the modern man's attitude toward the supernatural, in the light of his new scientific knowledge, and his new ethical feeling. In the realm of nature, he has to do with the reign of law, while in the realm of character he has to do with the reign of the moral ideal.

According to the old theology, faith is faith in the Divine as evidenced by the unnatural and abnormal—the miracle of power, (Signs and wonders) or of knowledge (Prophecy, Revelation, Foreknowledge), or of ecstatic utterance or infallible penmanship (Inspiration). The modern man is favored with none of these manifestations in their ancient biblical form; and yet he believes in the Divine, not to say the supernatural. But he is obliged to find the evidences of the supernatural in the natural and normal. The modern man has simply been forced to find new evidences of the presence of God in the world and in man since the old evidences were not forthcoming, nor were they capable of conclusive demonstration.

The primitive and mediæval church said: The wonderful equals the divine. But it was seen at the same time that the wonderful might equal the satanic. "If I by Beelzebub cast out devils, by whom do your sons cast them out." As Prof. Wm. James says: "The moment religious faith is made to rest upon the supernatural and the superhuman, the moment that things divine do not express themselves in the ordinary world and in the ordinary life of man, religion becomes indistinguishable from superstition. The only alternatives which such a dogmatism permits are either superstition or agnosticism."

The modern man has concluded that God is just as much in the world today as in ancient times. If so he is present in the natural and normal, for law and order reign everywhere. "In law itself we are face to face with God." Law is an unmistakable mode of the Divine presence in nature.

It is equally true that, In love itself we are face to face with God. Love is an unmistakable mode of the Divine presence in humanity. Thus testified John: "Every one that loveth is begotten of God, and knoweth God." "God is love; and he that abideth in love abideth in God, and God abideth in him."

Modern thought does not deny that Jesus was divine; it denies that signs and wonders, the unnatural and abnormal are the only evidences, or the strongest evidences of it. Jesus was divine not because he manifested miraculous physical power, but because he manifested a marvelous ethical nature. He is the highest that we know. "Unless we can imagine something higher that we want, we must confess that this is the highest." (Rowland). This is the singular thing about Jesus: Through all the changes of a progressing ethical ideal during the last twenty centuries Jesus has kept his place of ascendency. That is a scientific fact.

If God is love and love is of God, if the ethical is the divine, then it means that every manifestation of love in humanity is a manifestation of God. Love is the highest attribute of the Divine. But man shares the Divine nature. We are made in God's image and after His likeness. We need not be surprised therefore, if there should be manifestations of the Divine in every human form. God manifests himself in every human person in the degree of that person's "willingness or ability to receive him." That is the very ground of our acceptance of Jesus as divine. Nothing can enter into and get hold of man's spirit that does not spring from it, and in some way correspond to its need of self-expansion.

4. The plurality and variance of the Greek gods produced ethical uncertainty among the Greeks. Has the unity and agreement of the Christian Trinity produced ethical certainty among Christians? Do the demonstrations that hold to the infallibility of Jesus get rid of all their perplexities and doctrinal difficulties? In other words has a unified, objective ethical standard produced a unified religious life? "This must be right, for it is what Jesus taught" settles your conduct agreeably for yourself; but does it settle your conduct agreeably for all others?

I am simply answering one difficulty with another. Confusion among the people is natural enough when the gods disagree; but when there is entire harmony in the Godhead, is it not strange that the people differ? The difficulty goes too deep for full discussion here.

5. As a matter of fact does not every man "sit in judgment on Jesus and pronounce his conduct ethical or otherwise"? How can it be escaped? Jesus invited it. But every man's judgment of Jesus is judgment of himself as well. The only way we have of proving that Jesus is right is by being right ourselves. If we are wrong, Jesus will not seem right to us, and will not be right as far as we are concerned. If there is no music in us there will be none for us in the orchestra. If there were no music in any human soul there would be no orchestra at all. It would be possible to shut God out of the consciousness of humanity, if the Divine that is in us were blotted out. The possession of the Divine is the precondition of the recognition of it.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Still Lower Depths.

The month of May in Chicago is frequently more bleak and trying than midwinter, when it comes with piercing east winds and lowering skies. For ten days, rain chilled the marrow of one's bones, wind scourged like cruel whips, and during all this wretched weather Teddy kept up his ceaseless unavailing search for work. Bad as were his last quarters he has been compelled to find cheaper, and still worse. Jackson agreed to keep his trunk with what clothing he had left, and when they, too, were pawned he would be at the end of his resources.

In his last descent he found shelter in the cheapest lodgings furnished men for a few cents, with the privilege of sitting in the heated office. The patrons of the place were the lowest of the low, for the most part, wrecks, waifs and strays that had willfully cut themselves off from the decent influences of life—the hopeless drunkard—the half-crazed opium fiend, the incorrigible loafer and swindler; men with brutalized countenances, and a few who were simply worn out and broken-hearted, waiting on from day to day, in this last retreat before the alms-house opened its doors to receive them.

One bitter morning, chilled and drenched, Teddy straggled into a poor restaurant in Clark street and asked for some bread and coffee. He did not look about him and scarcely realized where he was, when the woman who had taken his order called him by name. He looked up startled.

"You don't know me," she said, "but I recognized you. I used to live in Carlinville. My name's Mag Lewis."

"Yes, I remember now," replied Teddy, recalling her as the woman whose name had been coupled with Billy Mullens'.

"I guess you wouldn't have known me," she observed.

"No," he answered. She had lost all her coarse good looks. The rouge was gone, her thin hair twisted into a small tight knot, and her faded dress hung in loose wrinkles on her hollow shoulders.

It was early, too early for the nighthawks who frequented the place; they slept late after their criminal prowlings and low debauchery, and the place was empty.

The woman brought him the coffee and bread, and with it a bit of smoking steak.

"I'm the head waiter here, and I guess the boss won't care if I treat a friend."

Once Teddy would have resented her familiarity—that of ignorance; but now he was so friendless, so solitary, that he could realize the gratitude which the prodigal felt for the companionship of the swine that he herded. He ate and drank gratefully, and was very glad when the woman sat down to chat with him. She, too, had known Carlinville in happier times, and that was bond enough.

"You're rather down on your luck, I guess," she observed.

"Yes," and he told her of his hard experiences.

"I know what it is! I came to Chicago to try and do better," she said with a faint blush, "and I had a hard time of it—me and my little boy. But I got into the Home of the Friendless, on account of the boy, and then after a while I got this place."

"How is the child?" Teddy asked kindly.

"Not very well, he misses the country; he's puny and ailin', but I ain't got nobody to take him. I've got a room near here, and I got an old woman to stay with me and look after him, for her livin'."

Teddy thought Mag was far better off than he; she had work and some poor semblance of a home, whatever she may once have been.

He came in again several times, always at the same hour; and Mag waited on him herself as at first, contriving to add to his order—which never varied—"something tasty." He could not refuse it, though he knew it was literally the bread of charity bestowed by a hand that he once would have despised.

The end was not far off; he had reached his last dollar; and after that there remained only the alms-house or—some swift and easy means of ending the whole business.

Mag set his coffee before him with some toast and an egg.

"You don't look very hearty this morning," she remarked. His head ached and his cheeks were flushed.

"No," he said, "I'd be all right if I only had a job; it's the idleness that's killing me!"

"Are you particular what it is," she asked with a little hesitation.

"Particular?" he cried. No—oh, no. What am I to be particular about anything—any more!"

"Well," she said slowly, "Black Charlie's got a good place as a porter on a Pullman car. The wages's nuthin' to speak of, but the public fees 'em, you know. Mebby—if you don't mind washin' dishes you could git the place there. It's nothin' to offer the likes of you, but you might try it till you can git somethin' else. It'll keep the life in you, anyway."

Teddy laughed bitterly, and cried: "Oh, yes, give me the darkey's job. I'll be glad to get it. He's the better man—he's proved it! I'm glad to step into his shoes!"

There was no reason why he should not begin at once, so he went into the dark, musty pantry off the kitchen, put on black Charlie's cast-off apron, rolled up his sleeves and went to work. The noisome hole was lighted by one grimy window so encrusted with dirt that the light could hardly filter through it; the floor yielded under his feet like melting asphalt, caked with mud and grease—the accumulations of months.

When he cleaned up the den he found that it commanded a view of an alley where rats prowled amongst the bursting, pestilential garbage boxes, in which Italian scavengers also delved and found food.

Day after day he bent over the steaming dish-pan, washed the thick plates, and cracked cups and saucers, iron knives and forks. He was given three dollars a week and his food. He still slept at the lodging house, which was fairly clean. His only consolation was that he was not an object of charity. He felt himself steadily deteriorating. His former life—Mary—all he once hoped and believed he might be, seemed part of another existence. He could now comprehend how a man degenerated from a mere pauper to a pronounced criminal.

His health had been seriously undermined by all that he had endured. His lassitude and fever increased; sickened by the constant odor of cookery he could eat nothing and at last, after a day of more than ordinary hardship, he failed to appear.

In the afternoon when business was slack Mag Lewis, suspecting that he was ill, went to the lodging house to enquire after him. She was told that he had been found unconscious, in high fever, and had been sent to the county hospital.

She returned to the restaurant, and that night she wrote to Mary Benson, telling her of Teddy's condition, but she refrained from giving her any details, knowing it would only add to her grief and alarm. She believed that Mary would come to him.

CHAPTER XXX.

Sad News from Teddy.

Mary Benson found Mag's letter waiting her when she came home at noon. The strange handwriting and the post-mark filled her with apprehension and she grew pale and her fingers trembled as she tore open the envelope.

Eleanor heard her utter a sharp cry, and ran to her. She found her weeping and wringing her hands. She had thrown the letter on the table and motioned Eleanor to read it.

"It has come! I have feared it,—have expected it. This dreadful trouble will never end till we are all dead!" she explaimed hysterically.

"Mary, Mary, control yourself! You will need all your strength, for I think you should go to him at once!" said Eleanor, drawing Mary's head down upon her shoulder, where she sobbed more quietly.

"You will have time to catch the two o'clock train. I shall go with you. Come now, and have your dinner."

Eleanor wondered a little how Mag Davis should have found Teddy, but she realized that people were constantly meeting under the most improbable circumstances, and in the most unlikely places.

Their preparations were soon made, they caught the train and as they rolled northward, Mary thought mournfully how Teddy must have looked out upon that same landscape which swept past them like an unfolding panorama. But he had seen it in all the dreariness of early spring. Now the grass was green, in the orchards, the trees were masses of bloom, and as they proceeded further north, the young oaks among the sand dunes which were unfolding their first young foliage, were ethereal clouds of rose and silver. In marshes the hyla was now piping plaintively, the blue crane rose slowly, spread its great wings, soaring away to other haunts. The "tweet, tweet." of the rice bird, swinging in the sunshine on the bending sedge, the flutelike notes of the swamp black bird were heard amongst the reeds. It was the season of singing and mating; the earth thrilled with love!—with the spirit of life which brooded over the hidden nests low in the springing grass, and aloft amongst tossing boughs.

Mary thought sadly that there might be no happy ending to the romance that had been so checkered with sorrow and tragedy from its beginning. Her keenest remorse lay in the consciousness that, until of late, she had neither appreciated or loved, as he deserved, the man whose wife she had promised to be.

If he were only spared, she would ask nothing more; and poverty, shared with him, would be happiness compared to the best that the world might offer, should he be taken from her.

They went immediately to the quiet hotel Eleanor had selected, and she telephoned at once to the hospital, inquiring about Teddy's condition and when they might see him. Eleanor was told that the crisis was at hand, and that by the next afternoon they might visit him, if all went well. The night seemed endless and the morning of the appointed day dragged as if it would never come.

Toward noon they were informed that he was better and soon after luncheon they started to the hospital. Half an hour later they sat in the reception room, talking with one of the house physicians, who assured them that there was every ground for hope, that

Teddy was suffering from a low nervous fever brought on by privation and trouble, and though the crisis was past, it was better they should not see the patient for some days yet.

Before they left the place they were shown the few available private rooms, one of which Eleanor selected, and requested that Teddy be removed to it as soon as could be done. They also found a boarding-place in the vicinity of the hospital.

Eleanor remained a week with Mary, and during that time she made it a point to see Mag Lewis. She went to the restaurant one afternoon—the address Mag had given Mary in case they wished to know anything further concerning Teddy.

The woman came staggering in with a heavy tray, the perspiration glistening on her forehead, her sunken chest bent under the load, which was almost beyond her strength.

She started and colored as she saw Eleanor sitting at one of the untidy tables—a sharp contrast to the women who ordinarily frequented the place. The few men there, stared and wondered—but as Eleanor merely picked up one of the stained newspapers lying before her, they ceased to notice her. When at length Mag was at leisure she came to Eleanor, blushing deeply in her embarrassment.

Eleanor frankly extended her hand and said:

"I want to thank you for your great kindness in letting us know about Mr. Wilkins."

Mag stammered: "It wasn't anything! I thought you ought to know—I couldn't do anything myself—"

"It was a great kindness for which we all thank you. I hope your friend in Carlinville told you we tried to find you after Teddy was—was—hurt."

"Yes; she told me."

"We wanted to make some acknowledgment, then. You undoubtedly saved Teddy's life at that time and it is strange that, once more, you have done him a service which may be beyond our power to repay."

Mag cleared her throat, and said huskily, "Yes it is queer—But I'd do the same for anybody that was as down on his luck as he was—But it wasn't much."

"It was everything!" said Eleanor warmly, "Because it was all you could do!" and she glanced around the squalid place.

Her delicate sympathy was unmistakable, and presently Mag confided to Eleanor something of her own pitiful circumstances and said that she had never heard from Billy Mullens—that he had never done anything for her.

"Don't you find the work here very hard?" asked Eleanor.

"Yes, awful hard; but I can't do any better on account of the boy. I've heard of good places, but they won't let me have him with me. I might go where folks don't know me if I could find a good home for him with someone that could do better by him than I can."

A thought flashed through Eleanor's mind. She remembered Mrs. Mullen's blind adoration of her son. She had been told of the child's strong resemblance to him, and, since the family were to leave Carlinville, she believed that Mrs. Mullens might be induced to take the child if Mag would give up all claims to it.

She saw Mag again before going home. She and Mary went to her miserable room, where they found the little lad with the old woman who took care of him. He was clean and warmly clad, but he was pale and drooping from lack of pure air and sunlight. Eleanor won Mag's heart by taking the boy on her knee and talking to him in the sweet, wise way she had with children, and he put up his fragile little hand and softly stroked her cheek.

Eleanor went home leaving Mary behind to bring Teddy back to Carlinville as soon as he was strong enough. He mended rapidly after hearing some news in one of Eleanor's letters. Randall had come to see her about Teddy, and had told her that the engineer of the Water Works had resigned, and the place was open to Teddy as soon as he was able to take it, that she might convey to him this news, and later, he too would write to him. This Randall did, and in his letter slyly intimated that the engineer in giving up the place also vacated a snug little house which he thought well suited to his future needs.

When Mary, in one of her now frequent visits blushingly read this to Teddy, he laughed feebly and told her to write Randall that they would take the house.

"What do you say?" he asked her.

"I've nothing to say about it. It's your own arrangement."

"I don't think you will say anything against it, it's much prettier than the other, and near the old Crofton place. You'll not want to live too far from Miss Eleanor, I know!"

"That's worth thinking about," she confessed—"But poor Susan, I almost feel we have no right to be so happy when I think of her desolation. She bears it bravely but I know her heart is broken!"—and she clung to Teddy's hand, thinking how nearly she too had escaped the loss of husband and home.

CHAPTER XXXI.

The Home-coming.

It was late in June when Teddy was finally discharged from the hospital. He urged Mary to be married at once and there was no good reason for delay. If she liked, Brainard and Eleanor could be told, and they might use their pleasure about being present.

They also took Susan into their confidence and Teddy wrote and asked if she could have them for a little while, until they could arrange once more for their housekeeping. Meanwhile Mary busied herself in reading over a letter she had just received from Eleanor.

His letter finished, Teddy threw himself on the lounge and asked:

"What did Miss Eleanor have to say?"

"Oh, a good many things, you'll be surprised to hear some of them."

"I'd like a good surprise by the way of a change; fire away then!"

"Well, for one thing, "Mary hesitated, "Miss Eleanor really did persuade Mrs. Mullens to take Margaret Lewis's little boy. I guess that there's no doubt that Billy Mullens is dead."

"Best thing that could happen to him", said Teddy.

Mary looked at him reproachfully then went on, "The whole family has moved to New York and their place has been turned into a big boarding house. And—now you will be astonished,—Horace Bannister is going to marry Arabella!"

Teddy gave a low whistle. Then he said. "Well things don't often turn out that way. Two families won't be spoiled with 'em, anyhow!"

"So he didn't break into politics. I can't see why, he's just the stuff! I suppose though, he can't do much now without 'B. F.' behind him!"

"Judge Brainard has sold Susan's lot for a good round sum. Mr. Randall's bought it and will put up Nail Works on that corner!"

"Glory!" shouted Teddy."Well he has got grit!" then his face sobered and he said, half to himself, "How long, does he know, will they let him run it? When he makes it a success the trusts will freeze him out again, and the whole thing'll be done over—men thrown out of work—homes sold—"

"We'll not borrow trouble!" Mary interrupted.

"You're right Mary, especially now!"

They were married early the morning that Teddy left the hospital with no one present but Mary's landlady and the nurse as witnesses. At last Mary wore the gown she had prepared for the day they had first chosen and which she had lain aside in sorrow and disappointment. They left at once for Carlinville. Susan made a brave effort not to sadden them with her own heavy sorrow, and met them at the door with outward cheerfulness.

Eleanor had not been able to attend Mary's wedding because her own was to take place the following week. It would be a very quiet affair, to Miss Abigail's manifest regret, who would have planned a great party to which half of Carlinville would have been bidden.

"Perhaps its just as well," agreed Miss Abigail, "for it would have been as mixed as the crowd that will gather on Judgment Day; both you and Robert know nearly everybody!"

"We are neither of us young," Eleanor said, laughing a little at Miss Abigails truthful observation, "and I think that a good reason why it should be as simple as possible."

A few days before, Brainard had made a strange request; he wished to buy the house where she and Susan lived. He knew that Eleanor was not attached to it and he assured her that Susan should not be disturbed.

"But, Robert, as all I have will be your's soon, and all you possess will be mine, I don't see why you want to buy the place!"

"I shall tell you—after a little, but not just now. But you must do as you like, I don't want to persuade you. We will live in the old home and revive it's past glories; I know how deeply you are attached to it."

The Wakefield house was regularly transferred to him, and all Carlinville gossiped and wondered.

Their wedding-day came; roses bloomed in the garden, the sky was cloudless, the air soft and balmy. Eleanor rose, drew the blind and threw open the window. The world was as pure and as unsullied as if it had come fresh from the hand of the Creator, and she accepted it as an omen of the new and perfect life upon which she was about to enter. Ann, hearing her stirring, came with the toast and coffee that she had ordered in her room, and on the tray lay a letter which Brainard had just sent.

He had thought it best to tell her by this means, and at this time that as an expression of thanksgiving for his own happiness, he had arranged to maintain the house which she had surrendered to him, as a permanent home for the club which she had founded. He would have liked it to bear her name, but he had heard her express her views on this subject and it should be known always as the "Neighborly Club"; Susan should be placed permanently in charge, as housekeeper. The letter closed with tender expressions of his love for her.

"How good how noble he is", she exclaimed. It gave her purer delight than any personal gift could have done and it was the crowning joy of her wedding day.

The Club were all present save Jessie Clark, a full hour before that set for the ceremony, putting finishing touches to the decorations and the setting of the tables which Eleanor had assigned to them. Mary wore her matronly honors with becoming dignity and in the absence of Eleanor, was appealed to on every occasion when the girls were in doubt.

As noon hour struck Eleanor came down the stairs on Brainard's arm, with no attendants. The old President of the college married them, and gave them his blessing, asking for them enduring love that nothing might lessen, with honor and length of days.

THE END.

The Road to Grumbletown

By Ellen Manly.

'Tis quite a straight and easy road
That leads to Grumbletown,
And those who wish can always find
A chance to journey down.

'Tis customary for the trip
To choose a rainy day—
When weather's fine one's not so apt
To care to go that way.

Just keep down Fretful Lane until
You come to Sulky Stile,
Where travelers often like to rest
In silence for awhile.

And then cross over Pouting Bridge,
Where Don't Care Brook flows down,
And just a little way beyond
You come to Grumbletown.

From what I learn, this Grumbletown
Is not a pleasant place;
One never hears a cheerful word,
Or sees a smiling face;

The children there are badly spoiled
And sure to fret and tease,
And all the grown-up people, too,
Seem cross and hard to please.

The weather rarely is just right
In this peculiar spot;
'Tis either raining all the time,
Or else too cold or hot.

The books are stupid as can be;
The games are dull and old;
There's nothing new and nothing nice
In Grumbletown, I'm told.

And so I've taken pains, my dears,
The easiest road to show,
That you may all be very sure
You never, never go! —St. Nicholas.

Help Bashful Children

BY HILDA RICHMOND.

If only more people could realize that bashfulness and extreme self consciousness in children are diseases to be carefully treated, a generation or two later a great deal of the timidity would be bred out of the boys and girls. The people who have never suffered from bashfulness cannot understand it, and usually they apply the wrong means of getting rid of the trouble. From time unknown a great many have supposed that they could "laugh the child out of it," the worst mistake anyone could commit against timid childhood, and it is only lately that fathers and mothers have set themselves to help the boys and girls. Sometimes the memory of an unhappy childhood will help in the case, for there are grown men and women who remember with a sinking feeling even now, the experiences of their childhood when things about them seemed possessed of the Evil One, and they were continually getting into trouble. Very often the boy who is called careless and naughty is simply a bashful child, trying with might and main to appear at ease, per instructions from father, mother and a lot of other relatives.

Perhaps the best way to help the bashful child is to ignore as much as possible his timidity. Resolutely determine to overlook blunders and "green" acts, for the sake of the poor suffering child, and you will take a long step forward in curing the disease. It is truly pitiful to see children in many homes nervously watching father and mother for fear of reproof, and so getting into all sorts of trouble, yet the parents imagine it is their duty to do so in order to guard the child. The sharp word rises so quickly even to mother lips when an awkward move breaks or upsets something, but if you can remember that the child is suffering a thousand times more than you are, with no vent for his feelings in a sharp word or a blow, you will speedily overcome the temptation to blame him.

Guarding the child from other children is also a great factor in curing bashfulness. The bright, pretty, self possessed little ones quickly crowd the timid ones into the back ground, unless the careful mother prevents this. The timid one will be "swapping" tasks, unless watched, so that the bright ones will go before the public, and he will hide away, but it is no kindness to the child to permit this. Without saying why it must be done, the timid one should go on his own errands, take his share of the buying at the stores—the little things children are entrusted with—answer the door bell, receive guests and never shirk a social duty. Once you begin shielding him the disease grows, and once the other children are allowed to put heavy tasks upon him, while they take the light and easy ones, you put the cure far into the future. Maybe the timid one would rather carry in all the wood and sweep the paths than go to a neighbor's on an errand, but no matter. If he is to be cured of his disease he must take his full share of the home life. The bright children who delight to shirk will quickly take advantage, and there will be disorder in the home kingdom.

Good clothes also help bashful children wonderfully, for the knowledge that a dress or suit fits well will carry a child over many an awkward situation. If anyone must wear ill fitting clothes let it be the bright, cheery, attractive child, who is able to be self possessed in spite of little disadvantages. Take particular pains to have the timid one in well fitting garments with colors well chosen, and then in a private talk you can impress it upon the childish mind that something of the debt he owes his parents must be paid in an effort to be bright and polite. Try to interest the timid children in observing good clothes and trying to keep them dainty. It will not make them conceited, though it might have that effect on the butterfly members of the home. It must be remembered that no general rule can be laid down for all children, and while one must be held in in the way of thinking much of fine feathers, others must be stimulated to want to dress up and go and be like other people.

Simpler rewards, especially the word of praise, when a child has done well, or even if he has really tried and failed, help greatly. A word of commendation is very precious to any child, but like manna to the hungry soul of the poor, bashful little creature shrinking from public gaze. Commend all you can, and never, never blame, if you want to see results. Over and over mothers by their painstaking work have helped their little ones over the painful period of likelihood into a brighter, better way of looking at life, and it can be done again. Blessing on the patient mother teachers who count no task too heavy, that will help relieve the timidity of their own boys and girls, or the children of their neighbors, for they are as truly doing missionary work as the faithful men and women laboring with benighted souls in foreign lands.

A Boy's Resolve Kept

Once there was a Danish boy named Tycho Brahe. When Tycho was about fourteen, a total eclipse of the sun was predicted for a certain day and hour, and when he saw the sun seemingly blotted out at exactly the moment named in the almanac, he was so filled with astonishment and admiration that he determined to devote himself to the study of astronomy.

This resolution he kept, and became such a famous astronomer that the King of Denmark built him a fine observatory on the island of Hveen, between Denmark and Sweden. He called it Uranienborg, or the City of the Heavens. Here for twenty-one years he carefully watched the stars and made many valuable observations which have been of great use to those who have come after him.

His friend and pupil, John Kepler, was one of the greatest astronomers. The observations which Tycho Brahe made, led John Kepler to make some of his most important discoveries.

Did you know that there are more than three thousand stars that can be seen without a glass, and many more that can be seen with a telescope? Even in the early times men watched the stars carefully, studying their rising and setting and their motions across the sky. Travelers and sailors were guided by them across the trackless desert, and over the stormy seas.

A Dog Hero

Rover, a collie, of Elk City, Oregon, is the hero of a tale in which the dog's almost human intelligence saved his master's life. James Parks, Rover's master, became seriously ill several days ago, and could not leave his cabin in the mountains. Gradually his strength failed and he began to fear death was approaching. In his extremity, Parks called the collie and, tying a message asking for help, about its neck, told the animal to "go." The dog finally reached the home of Parks' brother, and, upon being admitted to the house by his yelping, attracted attention to the message about his neck. A physician made a hurried visit to Parks, whom he found in a dangerous condition. Parks will recover, however, thanks to his dog's intelligence.

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, MAY 8.

Theme for the Day.—The Lord's Day.

Scripture.—I was in the spirit on the Lord's day.—Rev. 1:10.

And upon the first day of the week, when we were gathered together to break bread, Paul discoursed with them.—Acts 20:7.

Bright shadows of true rest; some shoots of bliss;
Heaven once a week;
The next world's gladness prepossessed in this;
A Day to seek
Eternity in time; time's bower;
The narrow way;
Transplanted paradise; God's walking hour;
The cool o' the day;
Creation's jubilee; God's parle with dust;
Heaven here; man on those hills of myrrh, of flowers;
Angels descending; the return of trust;
A gleam of glory after six days' showers.
—Jeremy Taylor ("The Sabbath.")

Prayer.—Our Father, we accept with gratitude this gift of a new week, ushered in by the day of rest. On this day our spirits take counsel with Thee, and we make a fresh start on our upward way. Let Thy Spirit come to more complete possession of our souls. May we not reserve any part of our being from His gracious sway. We would learn to make the Lord's Day an ever more precious part of the week. Aid us to use its hours that we shall not miss the love lesson of the day, nor tear away the sanctities by which it is held in the regard of others. And may the message of the gospel be received by those who wait in the sanctuary. For Christ's sake. Amen.

MONDAY, MAY 9.

Theme for the Day.—The Joy of Living.

Scripture.—There is nothing better than that a man should rejoice in his works.—Eccl. 3:22.

As a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, and rejoiceth as a strong man to run his course.—Psa. 19:5.

Whoever wakens on a day,
Happy to know and be,
To enjoy the air, to love his kind.
To labor, to be free—
Already his enraptured soul
Lives in eternity.
—Bliss Carmen ("The Twelfth Night Star.")

Prayer.—Gracious God, Thou art the source of life. The beautiful world is Thy handiwork, and all the universe is the work of Thy fingers. We rejoice in life, because it is Thy gift, and we thank Thee for all the blessings by which it is sustained. Help us to enter fully into the joy of life. May we find each day some fresh cause of satisfaction. May we never yield to the spirit of gloom, to dissatisfaction or ill-will. Help us to be obedient to the good and wholesome laws of life, and thus may we be at peace with all the world and with Thee. Pardon our unthankfulness, and lead us into more fruitful lives. For Thy name's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY, MAY 10.

Theme for the Day.—Sufficient Strength.

Scripture.—And he said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee: for my power is made perfect in weakness.—II. Cor. 12:9.

Somehow strength lasted through the day,
Hope joined with courage in the way;
The feet still kept the uphill road,
The shoulders did not drop their load,
An unseen power sustained the heart
When flesh and will failed in their part,
While God gave light
By day and night,
And also grace to bear the smart.
For this give thanks.
—Anonymous.

Prayer.—Father of mercies, we confess our sin and our lack of faith in Thee. We have gone aside into profitless ways, and we have hewn for ourselves cisterns that would not hold water. We thank Thee for Thy patience in bearing with our shortcomings. Help us, we pray Thee, to realize more fully the resources we have in Thy love and faithfulness. We make our tasks far too hard when we forget all Thou art to us and to all Thy children. May we content ourselves with our daily supply of food and strength, knowing that Thy grace is sufficient for our need, and that Thy love never fails. Lead us safely through all the way of life, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 11.

Theme for the Day.—The Garden of the Soul.

Scripture.—My beloved is gone to his garden, to the beds of spices, to feed in the gardens and to gather lilies.

I went down into the garden of nuts to see the green plants of the valley, to see whether the vine budded.—Song of Songs 6:2,11.

My mind to me a garden seems,
Where I can walk at will,
In Arcady, the land of dreams,
Where all the world is still;
Where purple clematis hangs low,
Around a rose-wreathed portico,
And on the hedge of golden glow
The light from cloudland streams.
—Marie Hemstreet ("In an Old-fashioned Garden.)

Prayer.—Dear Father, Thou didst walk in the garden in the cool of the day to bring Thy message of warning and love to man. And evermore Thou comest to us in the beautiful visions and voices of nature, and speakest to us Thy will. Help us to understand the wealth Thou hast committed to us in the rare fruits and flowers that may bloom in the gardens of our souls. May we spare no effort in their care, even as we labor for material good. Come and counsel us in the high tillage of our lives. And may the income at the last be for our enrichment and Thy approval. Amen.

THURSDAY, MAY 12.

Theme for the Day.—The Hearthstone.

Scripture.—And there was fire on the hearth burning before him.—Jer. 36:22.

While I was musing the fire burned.—Psa. 39:3.

The children gather wood, and the fathers kindle the fire.—Jer. 7:18.

Each man's chimney is his Golden milestone.
Is the central point from which he measures
Every distance
Through the gateways of the world around him.
Happy he whom neither wealth nor fashion
Nor the march of the encroaching city
Drives in exile
From the hearth of his ancestral homestead.
—Longfellow ("The Golden Milestone.")

Prayer.—Our Father, we thank Thee for our home. It is the joy of every day to us that Thou hast set us in a circle of loving souls whose lives we can influence, and whose purposes we can share. Bless the little children, the youth, the men and women of maturer life, and those who go down to the great deep. Bind us together in unity and helpfulness. May no ungentle word or ungenerous ambition creep in to mar the serenity of this good place. And may we all so shape our lives that hereafter we may renew our family circle and the Father's home. For Christ's sake. Amen.

FRIDAY, MAY 13.

Theme for the Day.—The Blessing of Little Children.

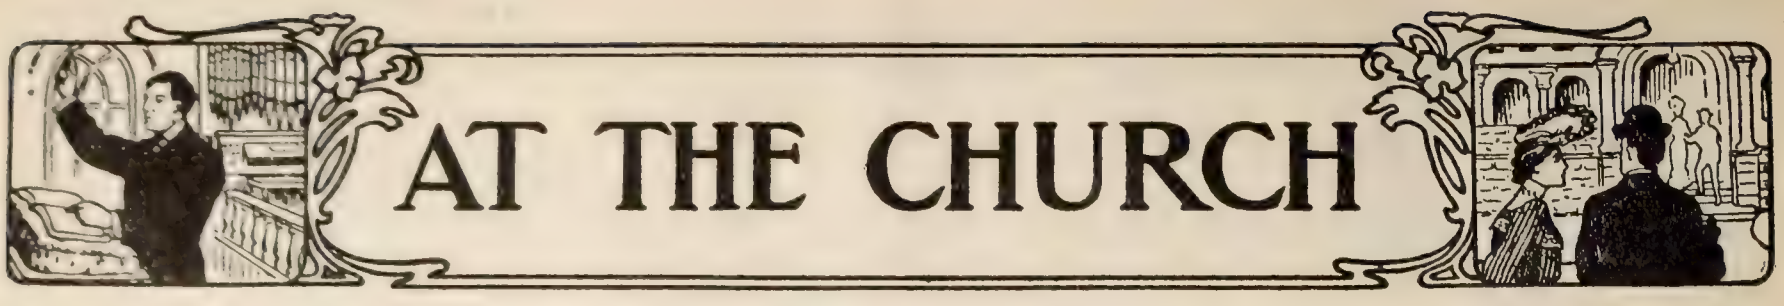
Scripture.—But Jesus said, Suffer little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me: for to such belongeth the kingdom of heaven.—Matt. 19:14.

The little ones before the font
He clasps within His arms to bless;
As long ago, so still His wont
On them to lay peculiar stress.
Besides, of such His kingdom is;
Him they betray not with a kiss.
—John Hake ("Old Souls to Mend.")

Prayer.—Father of all souls, Thou guardian of Thy children, we adore Thee for the tender care Thou hast bestowed upon us, and upon all who call Thee Father. We praise Thee for those gifts of Thine that have enriched our homes, the little children committed for a time to our guidance, that thus they may be prepared for the immortal life. Forbid, our Father, that we should neglect or slight such responsibilities as come to us in the training of the young. We bring their souls to Thee, Thou lover of all, that they may be safeguarded, nurtured and disciplined into beauty of soul, and love of the best. We ask Thy help in Jesus' name. Amen.

SATURDAY, MAY 14.

Theme for the Day.—True Manhood.



Scripture.—That he might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by everything that proceedeth out of the mouth of Jehovah doth man live.—Deut. 8:3.

I will make a man more rare than fine gold, even a man than the pure of gold of Ophir.—Isa. 13:12.

And a man shall be as a hiding place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest, as streams of water in a dry place, as the shade of a great rock in a weary land.—Isa. 32:2.

High thoughts and amiable words and courtliness,
And the desire of fame, and love of truth,
And all that makes a man.
—Tennyson ("Guinevere.")

Prayer.—Gracious God, we acknowledge Thy power and we rejoice in Thy love. Thou hast made men in Thy image, and though too often it is defaced by selfishness and brought low by sin, yet in the life and message of our Saviour we see all that humanity was intended to be, and we grow eager to realize in our own lives something of the nobility and glory of the true sons of God. May no ambition lower than the best allure us, but may we seek to be perfect, even as our Lord, in whose name we pray. Amen.

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

Deepening Opposition*

There are three well marked periods in the ministry of Jesus. They are not definite as to their length, but they form a clearly developing series of experiences in which the attitude of the nation passed through the three phases of indifference, devotion and hostility. The first of these periods was passed largely in Judea, and was contemporary with the popular work of John the Baptist in the region of the Jordan. Not much interest was taken in Jesus, for in comparison with the work of John his ministry was quiet and uneventful. The imprisonment of John made wise his removal from Judea to Galilee, and there the second period, that which was marked by great popularity, took place. The third section of the ministry was characterized by the growing opposition of the ruling classes. It began in Galilee, continued through Perea, and ended with the week of tragedy and triumph in Jerusalem.

The animosity manifested during this third division of Jesus' public work is plainly evident in the present study. The healing of a blind and dumb man, whose affliction was ascribed to demoniac possession, was the occasion of popular rejoicing and inquiry as to whether Jesus were not the son of David, the expected Messiah, the King for whose advent the nation had been waiting. Jealous of such regard bestowed upon one not of their order, the Pharisees spread the report that Jesus' works of power in curing disease and casting out demons were the result of a compact between himself and "the prince of the demons." The name Beelzebub or Beelzebul, was probably that of a local divinity of a Philistine region in earlier times. It had obtained local significance as one of the popular titles of Satan or some evil spirit.

Jesus pointed out the inconsistency of their charge in two ways. First, by showing that if it were true, Satan would be foolishly permitting the overthrow of his own power for a price; and secondly, that the popular trade of exorcism, or demon expulsion, was practiced by many Jews and yet they never imagined it to be an unholy calling. It was impossible to suppose that Satan was foolish enough to divide his forces to his own destruction. The only way to overcome and spoil the strong man is to meet all his power with definite and persistent opposition. No compromise is ever possible if victory is to be obtained. Therefore, any such charge as that Jesus was in league with evil was unfounded and unconvincing.

Then followed the great utterance regarding the sin against the Holy Spirit. Much attention had been given to this subject, and many fantastic theories have been constructed regarding its nature. Often it has been spoken of as "the unpardonable sin." But Jesus did not so describe it, nor did he give us warrant for believing that any sin in and of itself is " unpardonable." Sin is unpardoned as long as it is loved and practiced, but to call it unpardonable is to imply that there are limits to the mercy of God and the grace of the gospel. The unpardoned sin of refusal to accept the testimony of the divine Spirit in reference to Jesus is the theme of this paragraph. The Jews had accused him of a compact with the powers of evil. This was as much as to say that his gracious works and his loving message, both of which he attributed to the Spirit of God within him, were of unholy origin and for selfish and demonic purposes. Truly a man who took this view of Jesus' work was beyond the boundary of the divine fellowship, and would so continue as long as he held such distorted opinions or permitted himself such unholy sentiments. The sin against the Holy Spirit is the sin of rejecting the love of Christ, and this sin has no pardon so long as it endures, either in this world or any other.

In the closing verses of the lesson there is presented the familiar scene of a demand for miraculous work on the part of Jesus, to gratify the curiosity or to permit the criticism of the scribes and Pharisees. Jesus turned upon them almost fiercely with the rebuke that it was characteristic of such a group, selfish, fleshly and narrow-minded, to demand the lowest order of evidence, and then to quibble as to whether even that was to be taken seriously. He was not minded to work signs for such men. With weariness and indignation he always turned away from that order of insistence. He told them that for such men as themselves the sign of the prophet Jonah was sufficient, for that prophet had preached to a heathen city and it had repented at his words, but they had been listening to a far greater than Jonah for weeks, and were no nearer obedience to his message than at the first.

The parallel passage, Luke 11:29-32, seems to give the remark of Christ in its original order and setting. Here no reference is made to the miraculous deliverance of Jonah from the great fish, and many recent commentators have suggested that verse 40, which so definitely interprets the current of Jesus' thought by the intrusion of a wholly irrelevant incident from the narrative of Jonah, is actually a later addition, which may nevertheless have formed some part of a discourse of Jesus uttered at another time. But the point of the rebuke to the Pharisees lay in the fact that they had failed to receive testimony far more convincing than that presented by the prophet to the men of Nineveh, or by Solomon to the Queen of Sheba, both of which had resulted in faith.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

Topic May 15: Christ's Verilies. John 6:26, 32, 47, 53.

The verilies of which Jesus makes use in this lesson were the current emphatic forms employed by the speakers and teachers of his day. The single word originally was a verbal adjective meaning "firm," and was used metaphorically, as meaning faithful. Later it came into use as an adverb when it was employed to assert or confirm something. "Surely," "of truth," "truly" are the equivalents which we may employ. The repetition of the word as employed by the Saviour at the beginning of the discourse has the force of the superlative and may be very well rendered as "most assuredly."

Since Jesus made rare use of adjectives, emphatic and extravagant forms of expression, we can without question study with profit the truth which he sought thus to emphasize. What then are the things upon which he placed so much emphasis? Jesus had been preaching and healing near the Sea of Galilee. The Jews not only had not given heed to what he was preaching, but they were finding fault for his ministry of healing on the Sabbath day. A great throng of the common people had followed him to the other side of the sea because of his power to heal them. They were without bread and he fed them from the five barley loaves and two fishes. They were in a moment swept off their feet as in their extravagant imagination they dreamed of the glories of a kingdom with such a king. They would make him such at once, even by force. Jesus escaped the multitude and withdrew into the mountain knowing full well that they in no sense comprehended him. Though he eluded them for a while, they searched him out the next day. As he looked upon them his task seemed hopeless. His appeal to the soul had gone unheeded. Indeed his power to heal and relieve them from suffering were not the uppermost things in their minds. Jesus says, "Most assuredly, you seek me not because ye saw signs, but because ye ate of the loaves and were filled." Physical existence was their only concern. Food supply, the loaves and fishes, gain, accumulation, how familiar, how modern it is this struggle for the things that perish with passing days! Such was his discernment of need of the human heart—theirs and ours.

Jesus then again called upon them to seek that imperishable food which gives eternal life. It is the call to the higher life—the life of the soul which never perishes. The soul that can sympathize, and serve, forgive and endure, suffer long and be kind, control the life, making the body serve its lofty purposes can never be lost. The silent currents of its influence can never cease. Its benedictions will ever fall upon those who come within its radius. To this Jesus called his hearers then, his disciples and readers now.

To those who made inquiry of him he offered himself. "Most assuredly," he says, "he that believeth hath eternal life. I am the bread of life." Jesus holds that in him is the solution of the true life and calls all man unto him. What does he mean by it? Simply this, to let the principles which governed in his life control in ours. The forms which were predominant there and therefore must be in ours were justice, and kindness, mercy and patience, service and love, in a word righteousness. Not only that these are good things which we ought to do, but these are the things which will bring us into the kingdom of heaven, and without them there is no entrance. This was Jesus' way. He also says no man cometh to the father except by him.

Our Church Men

By John Ray Ewers

A Brotherhood Ritual

At the Columbia City, Indiana, Presbyterian church, the Brotherhood recruits church attendance by means of cards of invitation personally presented to strangers. Brotherhood meetings are conducted by the aid of a bit of printed ritual which, to say the least, is unique and suggestive enough to merit reproduction here:

BROTHERHOOD.

I.—Opening Order.

President—Brothers, by the favor of God we are again asembled in regular session to promote the interests of our worthy fraternity. Officers and brothers, assist me in opening our chapter.

Vice President—Worthy President, the officers and brothers of our chapter await your pleasure and will obey your commands.

Response by All—We will endeavor so to do.

President—Brother Chaplain, what are your duties at this time?

Chaplain—As our lives have been spared to enjoy another assembly, it is my duty to thank God for the same; to seek his guidance for our deliberations, and to lead the brothers in their devotions to the Most High God.

Let us read from the ritual of our ancient brethren:

Chaplain—Lord, who shall sojourn in thy tabernacle?

Response—Who shall dwell in thy holy hill?

C.—He that walketh uprightly and worketh righteousness.

R.—And speaketh truth in his heart.

C.—He that slandereth not with his tongue.

R.—Nor doeth evil to his friend or neighbor.

C.—He that hath clean hands and a pure heart.

R.—He that helpeth the widow and the fatherless.

C.—He that doeth these things.

R.—Shall never be put to shame.

Chaplain—Let us pray unto the Father of mankind.

(Moment of silent devotion by all.)

Prayer by All—Creator of the Universe and Parent of our race, behold us at thy foot stool, and extend thy hand of blessing upon thy children. Accept our thanks and guide our counsels, consider our desires and assist our intentions. Grant us a friendly and useful manner of life, that we may bear each other's burdens, and thus fulfill the law of Christ. Unite us in the brotherhood of man, in the house of our pilgrimage, and join us at length with all our brethren in the house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. Amen!

Chaplain—When we pray unto thee, O God, hear thou in heaven, thy dwelling place, and when thou hearest, Response—Forgive.

Chaplain—Let our prayers be set before thee as incense and the lifting up of our hands as the evening sacrifice.

Response—Amen!

Chaplain—Come, let us sing unto the Lord with joyful voice:

Song—"Who Is on the Lord's Side?" Tune, "Armageddon."

1. Who is on the Lord's side?
   Who will serve the King?
   Who will be his helpers,
   Other lives to bring?
   Who will leave the world's side?
   Who will face the foe?
   Who is on the Lord's side?
   Who for him will go?
   By thy call of mercy,
   By thy grace divine,
   We are on the Lord's side—
   Savior, we are thine.

2. Jesus, thou hast brought us,
   Not with gold or gem;
   But with thy own life blood,
   For thy diadem.
   With thy blessing filling
   Each who comes to thee
   Thou hast made us willing,
   Thou hast made us free.
   By thy grand redemption,
   By thy grace divine.
   We are on the Lord's side—
   Savior, we are thine.

II—Business Order.

President—Brothers, what is the object of our fraternity.

Response—The promotion of religion and morality and the cultivation of literary and social fellowship.

President—The chapter is open for the same. We will proceed to the regular order of business.

1. Reading of the minutes of the previous meeting.
2. Report of treasurer.
3. Report of permanent committees: Program, music, finance, entertainment, membership.
4. Election of members.
5. Introduction of new members.
6. Report of special committees.
7. Unfinished business.
8. New business.
9. Any sick brother or newcomer to be visited?
10. Election of officers.
11. Good of the order: Address, program, discussion, criticism, suggestions, remarks.

III—Closing Order.

President—Brothers, I thank you for your presence at this session. The labor of the assembly is now ended; the records are closed, and we may separate if all is well. Officers and brothers, have we been mindful of the principles of our fraternity?

Vice President—Worthy President, we have been mindful of the principles of our fraternity and all is well.

Secretary-Treasurer—All is well.

Chaplain—All is well.

President—Then let us part as brethren.

President—Let us not be weary in well-doing for in due season we shall reap if we faint not.

Vice President—Be kindly affectioned one to another in brotherly love.

Secretary-Treasurer—Let no false communication proceed out from your mouth.

Chaplain—Walk in wisdom toward them that are without.

Response by All—As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men.

Chaplain—Honor all men, love the brotherhood, fear God, honor the King.

Song, "America."

"My country, 'tis of thee, sweet land of liberty,
Of thee I sing.
Land where my fathers died, land of the pilgrim's pride,
From every mountain side, let freedom ring."

President—I now declare Columbia Chapter of the Presbyterian Brotherhood closed in due form, until again convened in regular assembly. Amen!

The South Lawrence Brotherhood, Wichita, Kansas

By Charles S. Voorhees, President L. B. D. C. No. 255.

Our first meeting was held on October 3, 1909. Only a dozen men responded. The first thing we did was to organize a "Christian Men's Club," and our membership immediately jumped from ten to thirty-four members. On the following Sunday, our pastor being absent, the men of the Brotherhood had charge of the regular services. We started meeting every Sunday afternoon as we found so much to do that we simply could not miss a Sunday. Our membership has steadily increased until now it includes all of the leading men of the church. Following the Centennial we held an "Echo" Brotherhood meeting with Brother Roth as speaker of the day. We next gave a Brotherhood banquet which was followed by a musicale, both of which were successes in every way. November 14 was "Men's Day" at our church and the men had charge of the meeting. Full chorus and speakers from within the Brotherhood. In one of our meetings we decided that we were keeping God's house and that when anyone called at our home we would have men at the door to meet them, especially strangers, and make them feel at home. If a friend calls at our own personal home we do not sit still and let him come into the house and find a seat and not speak to him. But is one home entitled to any less consideration than the other!

In January we again took charge of the church services in the absence of our pastor. We had a carefully arranged program and gave the seven Bible "Musts" by seven Brotherhood men, which has been previously mentioned in Christian Men.

In February we followed the World-wide mission program as arranged in Christian Mn. For speaker we had a man who had just completed a trip around the world. We also held the "Volunteer Service," and two of our men volunteered for the ministry. One of our Brotherhood volunteers hesitated for financial reasons, but our "Comrades of Paul Fund" which we will raise and pass through the General Brotherhood, has given him assurance of a safe passage and he will go. He says he hardly expects to draw on this fund, but it is an assurance to know that he can in case of necessity.

When our Brotherhood was first organized we had a Bible-school of 135 to 150. We had a men's class of never more than fifteen. On February 13, we had twenty-five men in the Brotherhood Class and 300 in the Bible-school, and the attendance has kept up every Sunday since. Last Sunday we had fifty men in the Brotherhood Class and had our pictures taken. Total in the Bible-school last Sunday was 519. Last year we gave for foreign missions about $65. This year we were apportioned $100. Some of the old-timers shook their heads and said. "We couldn't raise it." At last accounts we had raised $145, which is more than twice as much at last year. Somehow we just cannot account for all this. It seems that the men woke up and everybody got suddenly busy, and now we haven't room enough and will have to build a new and larger church. We are all saying, "Rah! for the Brotherhood!"

Covington, Kentucky

Charles R. Hudson of Frankfort, assisted me in a twelve days' meeting ending March 27, during which there were twenty-six additions. The meeting gained a hold upon the men of our church and vicinity as no other has done. The number of additions in no wise indicates the value of this meeting to our church. Mr. Hudson reached and maintained a standard unsurpassed by any evangelist I have heard. The condition of the work at Fourth street is wholesome and encouraging. We are contending with the hindrances too common to the down-town churches everywhere, but are accomplishing a work quite necessary to the welfare of the city and valuable in the extension of Christ's kingdom.

I have been the minister of this church five and a half years, during which I have seen one or more changes in every Protestant pulpit in the city, save one.

Milo Atkinson closes his work at the Fifth Street Church next month. The Disciples of Christ here and all other Christian people give him up with deep regret. He is a strong preacher, a splendid man and a factor in the civic life of our city, with which the self-seeking have been forced to reckon. We hope to see him located soon in a place of equal usefulness and one with more congenial climatic conditions than this.

The Central Church, though without a minister, continues to grow and will soon begin work on their new building. The ministers of other congregations have supplied the pulpit of this young church on Sunday afternoon since last November.

JOSEPH W. HAGIN.

In General

The Horrors of Socialism.

The socialist mayor of Milwaukee has made an announcement that is very shocking and little short of revolutionary. It is to the effect that hereafter employes in the city hall will be required to put in eight hours of work each day. Heretofore, he says, they have been doing about six hours' work, not neglecting, however, to draw pay for eight hours. Now is the time for the Milwaukee city hall employes to get together and firmly protest against this encroachment upon their personal liberty.

A Concrete House for $1,200.

Some months ago announcement was made that an architect in Washington contends that a sanitary six-room dwelling-house can be built of concrete for $1,200. The announcement aroused a good deal of skeptical comment, and not a few have expressed a desire to be "shown." The architect, Milton Dana Morrill, maintains that he is right, but says some of the conditions have been overlooked or ignored. The result can be accomplished, he says, if twenty or more such houses are constructed by the same contractor at the same time. Duplication would be the secret of the low cost.

Tobacco in the United States.

It is nothing to be particularly proud of, but the United States leads the world in the production of tobacco. In 1907, it produced 711,000,000 pounds, and in 1908, 718,000,000 pounds, valued at $74,000,000. British India comes next, with 450,000,000 pounds in 1907. The total product of the world for that year was 2,333,107,000 pounds, of which the United States supplied almost one-third. The people of the dark ages had one advantage at least over the moderns; they knew nothing about tobacco.

A Convention Age.

The world has had a stone age, an iron age, a bronze age, and several other kinds of ages, in its history, and perhaps it might not be amiss to call the present the convention age. People get together and confer on all manner of subjects, and no question has any standing until it is backed up by an organization which meets occasionally in its interest. This year the conventions seem to be thicker than ever. They are so numerous as to be in danger of bumping into one another—in fact, they sometimes do this. For instance, the following meetings are announced for the near future, and the list does not include a host of state, district, county and city meetings that are of local interest only:

National Conference of Charities and Corrections, St. Louis, May 19-26.

National Conference of Jewish Charities, St. Louis, May 17-19.

National Conference of Settlement Workers, at St. Louis during meeting of National Charities.

Child Conference for Research and Welfare Work, at Worcester, Mass., June 28 to July 2.

National Conference on City Planning, at Rochester, N. Y., May 2-4.

National Negro Conference, at New York, May 12-14.

International Congress for Study of Diseases of Occupation, at Brussels, Belgium, Sept. 10-14.

National Association for Study of Epilepsy, at Baltimore, May 7.

American Peace Society, at Hartford, Conn., May 11.

American Sanitary Society, at St. Louis, June 6.

The above, it will be observed, relate mostly to public health and welfare. There are countless conventions on religious, educational and other subjects. But this is not a directory.

Child Labor in New Jersey.

After July 4, 1910, no child under 14, and after July 4, 1911, no child under 15, be employed at night work in the state of New Jersey. This affects nearly all the manufacturing industries of the state, but the law is known as the "glass house bill," from the fact that no opposition to it has ever appeared except from the glass manufacturers. Similar legislation is now being sought in three other important glass manufacturing states—Pennsylvania, West Virginia and Indiana. The glass manufacturers of Pennsylvania have been threatening to move over into New Jersey in case their own state should enact such a law. They will now have to substitute some other state in their threat.

A Faithful Negro Officer.

The collector of internal revenue Atlanta, Georgia, is a negro. He has held the office thirteen years. No complaint has been entered against him by treasury officials. The total collections in that district for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, were $279,218.43. When he applied to President McKinley for the office he was endorsed by many of the leading business men of Atlanta and also by the labor leaders. His present chief deputy is the father-in-law of the well known editor, Henry W. Grady, and his office force is largely made up of Southern white people. He now has on file the names and addresses of more than 1,000 other Southern whites who want jobs under him. There are race troubles in the South, but not in the internal revenue collector's office at Atlanta.

A Great Pardoner.

Governor Patterson of Tennessee, who recently attained a fresh supply of notoriety by his precipitate pardoning of one of the murderers of Senator Carmack, has hada great deal of experience in issuing pardons. He was inaugurated Governor, January 1, 1909, and in the sixteen months since then he has pardoned 956 prisoners, of whom 152 had been convicted of murder. What a record—and what a Governor!

Commendable Evasion of Law.

Corporations are said to have no souls, but sometimes the individuals forming a firm or corporation are found to possess humane feelings and a sense of justice and right. A case of this kind came to the surface during the past week. Last December, Caleb Chase, of the firm of Chase & Sanborn, dealers in coffee, etc., died, leaving a will in which he bequeathed $200 to each employe of the firm. The headquarters of the firm are in Boston, and the paragraph of the will carrying the legacy referred to these beneficiaries as the employes of "Chase & Sanborn, Boston." Because of that phrase the will was attacked in the courts of Massachusetts, and the state supreme court has ruled that only employes of the firm living in Boston are entitled to the legacy. But ninety-seven employes live elsewhere, eighty-three of them in Chicago, and this ruling cut them out entirely. So when the court decision became known the surviving partners got together and privately subscribed enough money to carry out what they felt "morally certain" was the intent of Mr. Chase, to treat all employes alike. As it required $19,400, each of the nine partners, provided they are equal owners, must have contributed over $2,100. This is one commendable way of evading the law.

Church Life

—The May offering—was it taken last Sunday?

—The Home has right of way during this month.

—Dr. Herbert L. Willett, spent a week in Des Moines, delivering a series of lectures on the Life of Christ, in the Central Church.

—Many of the preachers of the churches of the Disciples are preparing to spend the summer in Europe. Not a few of them are sent by their churches.

—The growing interest is the graded work for the Sunday-school is seen in the unexpected number of orders exhausting the supply of Bethany Graded Lessons for the present quarter. But we will be prepared to furnish them for the summer quarter, which begins July 1.

L. D. Crandall, Niantic, Ill., has accepted a call to the Central Church, Texarkana, Ark.

John G. Slater is getting into the work at Minneapolis and writes that he is enjoying the fellowship.

A number of men from the First Church, Springfield, Ill., were in attendance upon the National Missionary Congress, Chicago, this week.

At Atlas, Ill., a church has just been organized at the close of a meeting held by Joel Brown of Des Moines. There is now in hand $1,400 for a new building.

C. S. O. Humbert, secretary of the Eugene Bible-school, is traveling through Idaho in the interest of the school and everywhere finds a hearty welcome.

William Ross Lloyd is available for a meeting or two during the months of May and June. His address is 419 W. Sixth street, Lexington, Ky.

The work on the new building at Macomb, Ill., is being pushed with all possible speed. It is estimated that the building will be ready for use the first of July.

The church at Anderson, Ind., extended a call to J. E. Davis of Beatrice, Neb., to succeed T. W. Grafton; but the Beatrice Church is unwilling to allow Mr. Davis to leave them.

H. O. Breeden is scheduled for a meeting at Carthage, Mo., to begin May 8. This will mark the completion of the $40,000 church just erected by this congregation where D. W. Moore is the minister.

The church at Centralia, Mo., under the leadership of R. B. Helser, has decided to erect a new building to cost in the neighborhood of $18,000. The membership of the church is about 500.

B. F. Clay, of Idaho, who is sojourning for a short time at Lexington, Ky., went out among a few friends during the month of March and secured $1,385 to help secure a school building in Shanghai, China.

The World's Sunday-school Convention meets in Washington, D. C., this month. It is a great opportunity for the Sunday-school workers of the Disciples to gather inspiration for improved work.

L. R. Hotaling is moving aggressively forward in the work at Tuscola, Ill., he is now leading in a plan to have a union meeting of all the churches of the city in the near future.

Joseph C. Todd, pastor, and James Peak, represented the Kirkwood Ave. Church, Bloomington, Ind., at the Laymen's Missionary concluding convention in Chicago, May 3-6.

The new church building at Arlington, Indiana, where E. S. Conner ministers, was dedicated May 1. F. M. Rains, had charge of the service. The cost of the building is $15,000.00.

The Indiana State Missionary Convention meets with the church at Anderson, May 16-19. Lodging and breakfast will be furnished free to all who send in their names by the thirteenth of the month.

J. M. Kersey, pastor First Church, Omaha, Neb., recently gave a dinner to the official board of his church. During the evening the board gave him an open face gold watch as a token of the esteem in which he is held.

A baseball team has been organized in the Sunday-school of the Memorial Church, Chicago, and registered in the Cook County Bible-school Athletic Association. The boys will play under the name "The Memorials."

There are now 329 names on the roll of the Sunday-school of the church at Liberty, Mo. Dr. Paul Wakefield, who is the newly appointed Living-link of the church was present at the church and Sunday-school service, April 24.

D. H. Bradbury, after two years' service at Pompey, N. Y., has accepted a call to Throopville, N. Y., where he can much more conveniently carry forward the work while pursuing his studies in Auburn Theological Seminary. Mr. Bradbury will live in Auburn.

Dr. Drummond, Harda, C. P., India, writes that the bubonic plague has broken out in Harda, and it hinders the work somewhat. Two of the primary schools have been closed on account of the plague. Otherwise, the work is going on about as usual.

The Men's League of the Memorial Church, Chicago, have invited E. A. Henry of the University of Chicago to deliver a lecture in the church the latter part of May. Mr. Henry's lecture will have to do with his travels in Palestine.

Stephen J. Corey, of the Foreign Society gave an address on "Victories of the Century in the Foreign Field" in the Jefferson Street Church, Buffalo, N. Y., recently. Mr. Corey stirs up great enthusiasm for the missionary cause wherever he goes.

T. M. Wiles, Anderson, Ind., sends word of the death of one of the strong representative men of that church, Solomon H. James, who died at the age of fifty-eight. The funeral service was held in the church, conducted by Mr. Wiles.

The Central Church, Terre Haute, Indiana, will receive $4,000 according to the will of Mrs. Laura Halbert, a faithful member of the church who has just died at the age of sixty-nine. This enthusiastic church will be able to make wise use of this fine bequest.

William Bruce Leffingwell, delivered his great lecture, "The Yosemite Valley" at the Memorial Church, Chicago, April 28. The lecture was illustrated and the seats free. An offering was taken for the benefit of the organ fund of the Baptist hospital.

T. B. Knowles, Cleveland, Ohio, preached in the First Church, San Francisco, on a recent Sunday, while in that city attending the wedding of his son Ralph C. Knowles, to Miss Eva M. Gamble. Both of these young people are members of the First Church.

John T. Brown, Louisville, Ky., and LeRoy M. St. John, Terre Haute, Ind., have united their forces to form an evangelistic team. Mr. Brown has recently taken a trip to Palestine, and will in addition to his preaching deliver lectures on his travels where they are desired.

Guy Walter Sarvis, University of Chicago, recently appointed missionary to China under the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, preached in the First Church, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, the first Sunday in May. Claire L. Waite has just closed his work with this church.

Prof. Sherman Kirk, Drake University, preached in the Second Church, Milwaukee, Wisconsin the first Sunday in May. Prof. Kirk guided this young and vigorous church in the beginning of its life last summer, under the direction of the American Christian Missionary Society.

The Junior Society of the church at Spencer, Ind., numbers more than one hundred members. The pastor of this church, Allen T. Shaw recently gave a lecture, "Are We Wiser Than Solomon" at Fairfield, Ill., and delivered the commencement address at West Salem, Ill.

"The All-Ashland Class" is the name of the men's Bible class of the Christian Church, Ashland, Ky. On a recent Sunday they had an attendance of 225. The "fetching" name may be responsible, but doubtless the pastor W. D. Ryan has had something to do with this.

The men's class of the Sunday-school at Eugene, Oregon, recently gave a banquet to all the men of the church of that city, when the proposition of building a new church was taken up and discussed with favor and even enthusiasm. J. S. McCallum is pastor of this church.

The Jackson Avenue Church, Kansas City, Mo., printed a leaflet of enthusiastic commendations of the work of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Bowen at the close of their work with this church which they have so largely built up in the last three years. Mr. Bowen continues as City Missionary in Kansas City.

Burris A. Jenkins, pastor Linwood Boulevard Church, Kansas City, has been rather widely quoted during the last week because of a sermon on "The Theatre," in which he declared the mission of the theatre to be a helpful one, and urged upon good people their responsibility by the kind of plays offered the public.

The parliaments held under the auspices of McCash and Ainslie at Springfield, Ill., took in a large area of surrounding territory, among the speakers being W. F. Turner, Peoria, W. H. Cannon, Pittsfield, C. C. Morrison, Chicago, J. Fred Jones, Bloomington, S. H. Zendt, Bloomington, R. F. Thrapp, Jacksonville, and O. W. Lawrence, Decatur.

We regret to hear that Chas. B. Newman, who was pastor of the Third Christian Church, Indianapolis, 1903-07, is critically ill at his home in Detroit, and that the physicians give no hope of his recovery. Mr. Newman is still a young man, before whom there yet remained to all human appearances many years of useful service.

H. H. Hubbell, one of the Drake men, now preaching at Corvallis, Oregon, recently gave an address before the newly organized Corvallis, Sunday-school workers Association, which was highly commended by the local press. Mr. Hubbell is a man of forceful energy, and is making good as a pastor and preacher.

W. G. Johnston, pastor at Greensburg, Ind., is preaching a series of sermons under the general heading "Topics of the Time." One of these sermons was reported very fully in a local paper. The subject was "What is Gambling?" In the sermon the preacher strongly urged against even those games which are sometimes used as games of chance.

Under date of April 24, Chas. Reign Scoville, sends word that there had been 550 additions to the church in twenty-five days, sixty-six on the 24th. He says the First Church led by W. A. Moore, and the Central by F. H. Groom are both making rapid growth. One mission has already been started and two more will be started during the present meeting.

The Third Church, Indianapolis took its offering for Home Missions the last Sunday in April, and raised enough money to make it a Living Link in this work. The pastor, Harry G. Hill, says with assurance that the total offering will easily reach five hundred dollars. This is a wonderful record when it is remembered that this church is just building one of the finest houses of worship among the Disciples.

The home of R. D. McCoy, of Tokio, Japan, was recently burned. He lost his household effects. The insurance on the house was $3,000. The insurance money is already paid into the bank at Tokio. It is the policy of the Foreign Society to keep all of its propetry insured. In this case, at least, it was a wise policy. All their furniture and clothing were lost. This is a severe trial.

The new church building in Vigan, Philippine Islands, was recently dedicated. It is the largest Protestant building north of Manila, and well fitted for our growing work. There was great enthusiasm on the day of dedication. At night the Catholics vigorously stoned the roof of the building, but the day was a great success and full of joy.

Indianapolis broke all records for the Laymen's Missionary Conventions. More than 2,500 picked men sat down together at the opening banquet. Over 2,700 registered altogether as delegates. The enthusiasm was high all through the sessions. It was generally conceded to be one of the most remarkable religious gatherings ever held on the American continent.

John Young, of Hollister, Cal., has been called to labor with the First Christian Church, Bethany, Mo., as pastor. He is to enter upon his labors May 1, and they are looking forward to a prosperous work. Mr. Young was at Lodi, Cal., over five years, and served the church at Albany, Mo., at one time. The church has just completed an up-to-date parsonage.

The receipts of the Foreign Society to April 20 on the current missionary year show an encouraging increase. The gains are about $12,000. New Living-link churches are falling into line. Higher ideals are coming to all the churches. The number of annuitants is being increased. The cheering words from every quarter encourage us to hope that the gains will continue.

The Washington Avenue Presbyterian Church and the Central Christian Church, Terre Haute, Ind., are working together in preparation for Luther-Knox entertainment to be held in the Grand Opera House. Two plays will be given by the company, composed of members from each church, one depicting the life and times of Martin Luther and the other of John Knox.

L. P. Schooling, formerly at Anaconda, Mont., is now living at Gleiken, Alberta, Canada. He writes that the country is rapidly filling up with broad-minded, rustling Americans. "Schools and church," he says, "must follow." Mr. Schooling has business interests in Canada and means to make these a basis for effective work for the church.

W. T. Moore is to hold a two weeks' meeting at his boyhood home, Pleasureville, Ky. It is seventy-eight years since Mr. Moore as a barefoot boy ran the streets of this village. Now the citizens of Pleasureville and Eminence are arranging a banquet in honor of his arrival. Dr. Moore will preach for E. L. Powell in Louisville, May 8.

W. S. Cook has just accepted a call to the fifth year of service with the church at Nelsonville, Ohio. Mr. Cook asks us to correct a slight error made in recent reference to this church. We spoke of the church being somewhat divided just before Mr. Cook assumed his duties. This condition obtained several years before Mr. Cook came to the church, and was greatly improved under the ministry of E. S. DeMiller, who did a fine work with the church just preceeding the present pastorate.

J. E. Lynn, who has just closed a six years pastorate at the Central Church, Warren, Ohio, began his new work at the Central Church Pueblo, Colo., Sunday May 1. Pueblo is the Pittsburg of the west, the second city in size in the state, having a population of 50,000 and the Central Church is one of our best churches in the state outside of Denver. James H. Mohorter was called a few years ago from the pastorate of this church to the secretaryship of the National Benevolent Association.

May Day services will be observed at the Lenox Ave. Christian Church, 74 West 126th street, on Sunday. At the morning service Dr. W. Bayard Craig will preach on "The Power and the Glory." The evening subject will be "Rooted and Grounded." A special effort is being made to have every member of this church now in the city present at one of the services on May Day. Signature cards have been sent to all members to be returned on Sunday. There will be special music and floral decorations.

H. C. Ford closed his first year of ministry with the First Christian Church, Midland, Tex., April 10. The reports show $6,217.01 raised for all purposes, $4,069.02 of which was for missions, benevolences and education. At regular services there were fifty-eight additions—one-half of the number by primary obedience. The church supports

Mrs. Justin E. Brown at Luchowfu, China, and Baxter Golightly in the home field. Brother Ford has been unanimously called for the second year. The Fife Quartette will be with Brother Ford and his church for a four weeks' campaign, beginning August 1.

H. H. Peters spent Sunday, April 24, with the church at Le Roy, Ill. In the morning he presented the claims of Eureka College; spoke at a meeting of the city at 6:30, and delivered a popular lecture at a union meeting of the Presbyterian and Christian churches in the evening. R. D. Brown is the pastor in LeRoy and is doing splendid work. This is his boyhood home, his father having been pastor of this church at one time. The Disciples will begin a $20,000 church in LeRoy the first of June.

W. E. Bobbitt, pastor at Woodland, Cal., will preach in a union meeting at Colusa, Cal., beginning May 2, and will be assisted by R. C. Davis, singer, of Kansas City, and also Mr. Bobbitt's wife who is a soloist. The meeting is a result of a series of temperance lectures delivered in Colusa recently, which resulted in the election of a ticket proposed by the temperance people. J. K. Ballou, recently of Sioux City, Iowa, is the pastor of the church of the Disciples. He has been leading the campaign, and proposed the union meeting.

The last Sunday in April was "New Members' Day" in the First Church, Springfield, Ill. It marked the first anniversary of the reception of 294 members into the fellowship of the church. Since then eighty-three more have been added, making a total of 377. Ushers and officers for the day were chosen from the new members. The pastor, F. W. Burnham, preached an appropriate sermon on "A Year's Fellowship." Notwithstanding the many local interests of the day the church observed Tuberculosis Sunday. Dr. Hugh T. Morrison, Jr., presenting the cause to the congregation at the morning service.

E. A. Cole, pastor at Washington, Pa., for the past eight years, has accepted the pastorate of the First Church, St. Louis. The congregation at Washington urged his continuing with the work there, but he could not resist the appeal of the greater field at St. Louis. Mr. Cole recently refused the national secretaryship of our Bible-schools. He will have an ideal field in St. Louis to build up a great school according to his ideas. His work with the First Church will begin September 4. F. A. Mayhall, a lawyer of St. Louis, is doing excellent supply work for the church in the interim.

The Northern Illinois Ministerial Institute was held in the church at Valparaiso, Ind., May 2, and 3. The address on Monday evening was by Dr. Herbert L. Willett, on the following day the papers were: "The Minister in His Study," by Elmer Ward Cole, Huntington, Ind.; "The Calling of Dan Matthews, Its Strength and Weakness," S. G. Buckner, Elkhart, Ind.; "Compelling Present Day Demands on the Minister," E. M. Todd, Fort Wayne; "The Cry of the Age," C. C. Morrison, Chicago; "The Pastor a Priest of Souls," G. W. Hemry, South Bend; "The Church and Social Service," Dr. E. S. Ames. This program presents a "meaty" menu unsurpassed even by the national Congress.

Annual report of the Franklin Circle Church, Cleveland, Ohio, W. F. Rothenburger, minister: One hundred and twenty-seven additions, eighty-two baptisms, forty-five by previous relationship. Sixty of these were added during a two weeks' decision meeting, with the Netz Sisters of Toledo assisting in the music. Over 100 of the membership are young men between the ages of seventeen and thirty-five years. Financial report: Total expenditure, $12,135., of which $4.360 was for missions, benevolences and education, and $7,775 for general work. Mr. Frank Brown, pastor at Coshocton, Ohio, and one of the sons of the church, is the living link in the Home Board, Mr. M. D. Adams of Bilaspur, India, is the living link in the Foreign Board, and Mr. Ernest Gordon of India, is supported privately by one of the families of the church. Mr. William E. Alderman, an A. M., from Iliram College, in the class of '10 will begin work as assistant pastor on August 1. His principal duties will be to lead the Bible-school forces, and to have charge of the music. The work of another year begins with enthusiasm.

On the evening of April 27 the East End Church, Pittsburg, Pa., observed its twenty-fifth anniversary. Letters were read from former ministers and speeches were made by charter members. The church was organized in the home of Mr. John M. Addy during the pastorate of William Cowden at the First Church, Allegheny. Both Mr. and Mrs. Addy spoke. Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Gardner, also charter members, spoke. Many of the large number present testified as to the value of the church in their lives. Mr. Harry Young, president of the board, spoke of the illustrious ministers which the church had, among them being T. D. Butler, King Pendleton, Philip Pendelton, T. E. Cramblet, W. J. Russell, J. G. Slayter. Mr. C. D. Charlton read some of the history of the Pittsburg church, showing how we had grown from one to twenty-five churches. Still others spoke of the great work accomplished in the way of missionary offerings, civic betterment, training and culture of lives. The Belmar church is a child of East End. United and prosperous, the church moves on under the leadership of John R. Ewers.

The campaign committee of Eureka College met in the office of A. J. Elliott, in Peoria, Tuesday, April 26. The entire committee was present. President A. C. Gray was also present. H. H. Peters, field secretary, made his report for the month. He reported $1,440 secured in pledges and prospects as a result of the month's work something like $5,000 or $6,000. $45,000 is now pledged on the $125,000 proposition. All the indications point to the success of the campaign before many months. The committee is made up of aggressive men and they are very loyally supporting Mr. Peters in the work. Mr. A. J. Elliott, chairman of the Illinois and Iowa Demurrage Bureau, is chairman of the committee. The other members of the committee are Rev. F. W. Burnham, pastor of the First Church, Springfield; Prof. H. T. Swift, assistant state superintendent public instruction, Springfield, Mr. E. B. Dickinson, of the Dickinson & Company Canning Factory, of Eureka, and Washington, Ill., and Mr. J. M. Allen, a lumber and coal merchant of Eureka. These men have taken the same business methods into the endowment campaign that they use in their own business. The work will be a success.

James Egbert closed his pastorate with the Cortland, Ohio, church April 24. At the closing service a fine young man confessed Christ and was baptized 'the same hour of the night.' This makes thirty additions for the year. There has been healthful growth in all departments of church work. A splendid lot of young people have been gathered together in a C. E., holding monthly social gatherings. The financial condition of the church is the best for years, and the prospects are that the church building will soon be remodeled with Bible school and social rooms. The church speaks in highest terms of Mr. and Mrs. Egbert and very much regret their departure.

The bulletin is being distributed for the third summer school at the Massachusetts Agricultural College for teachers and country clergymen. The clergymen's course occupies the time between July 25 and August 12.

While there will be courses in agriculture, horticulture, dairying, and forestry in progress during this period, there are courses in agriculture, agricultural economics, the development of the rural community, the church and the rural problem, the country school, forms of coöperation, rural literature and the movement in agricultural education, given especially for the clergymen. Household science is given for the clergymen's wives who attend. The object of the school for clergymen is to acquaint ministers with the problems of the rural community in order that they may take an active part in the movement now on toward rural progress.

Facts About Mark Twain

attention to the Mississippi river which in those days was a great highway of traffic. At the age of twenty-one he became a river pilot at a salary of $250 per month. He remained in this occupation for seven years, guiding boats that plied between St. Louis and New Orleans. The stimulating life, the strange things and interesting characters with which he came in touch whetted his awakening literary instinct and he did not let his opportunities go to waste.

After six weeks in the Confederate army he went west with his brother, reaching Nevada when the silver boom was at its height. He worked as a newspaper reporter on the Virginia City Enterprise, also in San Francisco. The story that first attracted attention to him as a writer was published in the above named paper and was called "The Jumping Frog.' After visiting Hawaii, he lectured on these famous islands throughout the Pacific coast states. In 1868 an excursion to the Holy Land and Europe resulted in his writing "Innocents Abroad," which attained great popularity. Then followed his marriage to Miss Langdon, daughter of Judge Langdon, in 1870. In the early 80's Twain was known as a most successful writer, one of the richest men of letters in the country, having made about $500,000 out of his books. In 1884 he became a partner in the publishing firm of C. L. Webster & Company. But the failure of this firm and other business enterprises in which he had invested money resulted in his losing about all of his wealth. With a great determination this distinguished man of letters paid back all of his debts dollar for dollar, a different policy somewhat from that pursued by the debtor of today who has a kind bankruptcy law to fall back upon.

A list of the books which he has published since his failure will indicate Mark Twain's unflagging literary activities, in his ripe, and since the incubus of debt has been shaken from his shoulders, his happy old age. They are "The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn," 1885; "A Yankee at the Court of King Arthur," 1889; "The American Claimant," 1892; "The 1,000,000 Pound Bank Note," 1893; "Pudd'nhead Wilson," 1894; "Tom Sawyer Abroad," 1894; Joan of Arc," 1896; "Following the Equator," 1898; "The Man That Corrupted Hadleyburg," 1900; "A Double Barreled Detective Story," 1902, and "Christian Science," 1903.

Mark Twain was an inveterate smoker and one of the most leisurely men in the world. An old pressman, who was once printers' devil in an office where Mark was editorial writer, tells this anecdote of his habits of work. "One of my duties was to sweep the room where the editors worked. Every day Mark would give me a nickel to get away from him. He would rather die in the dust than uncross his legs. One day he gave me a nickel to dot an 'i' in his copy for him. He certainly did enjoy life, that man did."

Yale gave Mark Twain the degree of M. A., and later of L. H. D., in 1901; the University of Missouri, his native state, followed with LL. D. in 1902, and in 1907 the University of Oxford with great ceremony made him Litt. D.

Mr. Clemens first wrote under the name of Iosh, but becoming dissatisfied with it he accordingly adopted the pilot's cry, "Mark Twain." The explanation of it is as follows: In order to inform a man at the wheel of the depth, whenever the steamer was making a hazardous passage, a deck hand was stationed at the bow with a sounding line, to call off the results of his work. "By the mark, twain," meant that the boat was in twelve feet of water, the cry being always contracted to "mark twain." The combination struck the journalistic pilot as an extremely happy one for a pen name, and so it proved. He was wont to insist, with a humorous twinkle in his eyes, that his fame was almost entirely due to the substitution of Mark Twain for Iosh. The last bit of literary work he did was a chapter of his unfinished autobiography describing his daughter Jean's death. No better illustration of the fact that a professional funny man is often a tender sentimentalist can be found than in the beautiful epitaph which he wrote and caused to be placed on the simple marble headstone of his wife's grave. It reads:

Warm summer sun
Shine kindly here!
Warm summer wind
Blow softly here!
Green sod above
Lie light, lie light!
Good night, dear heart!
Good night! Good night!

An old friend and schoolmate of this honored man and the original of "Huckleberry Finn" describes his departure as follows:

"The old days are passing. The men who made them are gone, and even the long sweep of the majestic yellow river, seems to have dwindled and lessened. The noise of its traffic, the music of its many deep-throated voices, are practically no more. The man who caught them and who fixed them in human words for the delight of the world is dead."

Follow the International Lesson Committee

Every informed Sunday-school worker desires to have the graded system introduced into his school. But it seems like too big an undertaking to grade the school all at once. Hence nothing at all is done, and the school goes on in the same old absurd way of teaching the children the lessons provided for grown-up people

The International S. S. Committee has made it possible to bring the graded system in, like the Kingdom of God comes, "without observation." You can have your school graded without any agony—almost without knowing it, except in its beneficent results. Begin at the bottom now—with the elementary grades, the pupils under twelve years old. Provide teachers and pupils with the Bethany Graded Lessons, based on the outlines already authorized by the International Committee. Later on—perhaps in nine month or a year from now—when the Committee authorizes an outline of lessons for the Intermediate grades you will be ready to adopt them and the Bethany Series will be ready with the helps for you. And so on, through the Senior and Advanced grades, follow the International Committee and as fast as they provide the lessons you will be ready to adopt them.

Our advice to all schools, then, is: FOLLOW THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE. No independent course yet devised is better than that provided by the International Committee, if indeed there is one so good in all respects. Besides, there is advantage in the whole Sunday-school world studying together when our leaders really lead—as the International Committee is now doing.

The Bethany Graded Lessons may be commenced at any time. Purchase the main bulk of your supplies wherever you wish, but let us furnish you these fascinating lessons for your pupils under twelve. THE NEW CHRISTIAN CENTURY CO., 700 East Fortieth Street, Chicago.

How to Obtain the "Front Rank" Certificate

Schools aspiring to the "Front Rank" for 1910 will receive an application blank from their State Superintendent of Bible Schools. This blank must be carefully filled out and returned to your state superintendent with the fee of $1.00.

The state superintendent will examine this application carefully and send it to the Bible school secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society at Cincinnati, Ohio. Upon his approval the certificate will be granted.

Schools are requested not to report themselves as "Front Rank" schools until they have received the certificate from the State Bible School Superintendent and the National office. We shall be glad to have the schools trying for "Front Rank" report their purpose, but no school will be reported henceforth in our papers as "Front Rank" schools until the certificate has been granted.

MARION STEVENSON

A Word from President Ainslie

In company with Bro. I. N. McCash, secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society, I have completed a hurried but most delightful tour through the middle West, including the cities of Lexington, Ky., Louisville, St. Louis, Kansas City, Lincoln, Neb., Omaha, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, Springfield, Ill., Indianapolis, Cleveland, Cincinnati and Pittsburg with both of us and others speaking at parliaments, mass meetings and banquets every afternoon and evening.

Our one message was our responsibility in the redemption of America for Christ and no public servants could have been more kindly received than we were. It was an experiment that we believe has done good and certainly has left with me a most pleasant memory in the meeting of old friends and the making of new ones, with their visions and programs of great service for the Master. We have a noble ministry and a splendid lot of men and women who sit in the pews.

Our cause of American missions has been entrusted to wise leadership in Bro. McCash. He not only had the confidence of our brethren generally before he became secretary, but that confidence has been steadily growing since he assumed the duties of that office. He has energy, tact, ability, piety and confidence that must win. His splendid generalship is seen in the whole outline of his work and on the first Lord's day in May it is hoped that our brethren in all the churches will let their money speak their affection for the Lord whose we are and whom we serve.

News from the Foreign Society

The church at Pleasantville, Iowa, and Marion County expect to enter the living link rank in June. H. C. Hurd is the minister at Pleasantville.

Dr. William M. Hardy, who represents the Vine Street Church, Nashville, Tenn., P. Y. Pendleton, minister, has just graduated from a medical college and starts on his trip to Batang, border of Tibet about the middle of May. He expects to sail from San Francisco May 24 on the "S. S. Mongolia." It will take him about five months to reach his destination. It will be remembered that this is one of the farthest interior mission stations in the world. He goes to take up the work laid down in the death of Dr. Z. S. Loftis. $5,000 has been contributed with which to erect a hospital at that point.

W. S. Hoye has been the minister of the church at Beaver Creek, Md., for twenty-seven years. That church has sent an offering for foreign missions every year since 1885, or for twenty-five years. What preacher can beat that record? It is the loyalty of churches and preachers like this that has made the Foreign Society a world power.

The church at Clinton, Ohio, enters the Every Member class. That is every member of that church made an offering in the March offering. J. H. E. Moxley is the minister.

F. E. Hagin and family return to Japan June 7, on the "S. S. Korea," from San Francisco.

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the month of April are the largest we have ever been able to report in that month. The gains so far on the current missionary year are $13,311.36.

Last week a friend in Chicago made his second gift on the Annuity Plan. He also makes generous direct gifts.

Dr. W. E. Macklin the veteran missionary at Nankin, China, has just returned to America for a short vacation. The church at Frankfort, Ky., supports him.

Leslie Wolfe reports thirteen baptisms and B. L. Kershner five at Manila, Philippine Islands. Three new chapels in the provinces near Manila are now ready to be dedicated.

Many of the Sunday-schools are planning great advances on Children's Day. Secramento, Cal., and the First Sunday-school, Akron, Ohio, are expecting to enter the living link rank with $600 each. North Tonawanda, N. Y., Wichita, Kans., and Broad Street, Akron, Ohio, have set their mark at $300 each. The First Sunday-school at St. Joseph, Mo., and the Independence Boulevard Sunday-school, Kansas City, are aiming for $1,000 each. There are more orders for Children's Day supplies than we have ever received up to this time.

The Light House Missionary Boxes and the Centennial Badge Dollar League souvenirs for Children's Day are very popular. It is confidently believed that the Sunday-schools will reach $100,000 this year.

The Sunday-schools since the inauguration of Children's Day have given $936,000 for foreign missions. This year's gifts will take the total amount beyond the million mark.

Over four hundred students have been enrolled in our Union Christian College (Drake at Nankin, China). There is great need for additional buildings.

At a great meeting in Nankin last February, Dr. W. E. Macklin, our own great missionary in that city made a telling address and forty-one Chinese in one meeting decided to become Christians in response to his appeal. This sounds like a Scoville meeting in America. Nothing hinders us from taking China except our own indifference.

Quarterly Meeting of the I. C. E. A.

At the quarterly meeting of the Illinois Christian Educational Association, held on April 4, 1910, at the home of Mrs. S. J. Crawford, one of the good reports read was that of Miss Luceba Miner of her work for January, February and March as Field Secretary of the I. C. E. A. The financial results of her work were as follows:

Cash receipts	$426 78
Pledges	600 85
Disbursements (salary, etc.)	256 84
Gain	$770 69
Annual members	106
Life members	20
Life Directors	1

The ten members of the board present felt that in view of all the circumstances she had been quite successful, and a motion was carried that the corresponding secretary, Mrs. Harper, write her expressing thanks of the members, and their wish that she would continue in the work if her other engagements will permit. The president of the board, Mrs. S. J. Crawford, said she had corresponded with Miss Miner weekly during the quarter, and among the hindrances to her work was, first, it was to her an entirely new work. Also when she asked for dates to present our educational cause some of the churches written to had already planned for all the meetings and offerings they thought they could hold and help, during her quarter's work. In January the weather being so severe hindered attendance at public meetings, and icy walks made visiting from house to house in the interest of the work difficult. In March the F. C. M. S. held the chief place. The executive committee believes that if Miss Miner can be induced to continue in the work she can be of great assistance to the cause of Christian education in Illinois. Mrs. J. A. McGuire made an encouraging report also of the committee appointed to secure funds to put a new hardwood floor and chairs in the college chapel. She said while it had meant work, that nearly everyone solicited had responded so kindly, and commended the effort to improve the chapel. This committee worked with one composed of college students.

Mrs. Ross spoke of some improvements at the girls' dormitory, Lida's Wood, and expressed the hope that some other churches

Summary of the report for the quarter of treasurer, Miss Clara L. Davidson, was as follows:

Balance, January 10, 1910	$ 93 46
Total receipts	3376 97
Total disbursements	2968 55
Balance, April 5, 1910	$ 408 42

The president spoke of matters pertaining to the part the I. C. E. A. should have at next state convention, and of committees to be appointed, and some discussion of these matters followed. The I. C. E. A. board works and hopes that the membership of this organization can be increased until the annual deficit that so much endangers the life of our college can be paid from its treasury. When this hope is realized the cause of Christian education in Illinois will be strengthened and the reproach that now rests on the churches will be removed.

Little Girl—"Give me some more cake!"

And she was quite right.—Presbyterian Standard.

HOW THOUGHTLESS.

The small son of the English family in this country attends public school. Recently he rushed angrily into his mother's presence with the tearful complaint that "they" had tried to make him believe the impossible story that British soldiers had been defeated by the Americans in some war. His mother explained the painful circumstance as gently as she could.

"And did the Americans really beat the British?" wailed the boy.

"Yes, my son."

The boy tore his hair and pounded the arm of the chair.

"How could they do it?" he demanded. "Why did the British soldiers let them! What could they have been thinking about?"

AN IMPORTANT DISTINCTION.

Patience is a virtue which all judges need, and most judges have. But sometimes, as in this case recorded by a writer in the Philadelphia Ledger, it is not necessary to suffer in silence:

A long-winded, prosy counselor was arguing a technical case recently before one of the judges of the Superior Court. He had drifted along in such a desultory way that it was hard to keep track of what he was trying to present, and the judge had just vented a very suggestive yawn.

"I sincerely trust that I am not unduly trespasing on the time of this court," said the lawyer, with a suspicion of sarcasm in his voice.

"There is some difference," the judge quietly observed, "between trespassing on time and encroaching on eternity."

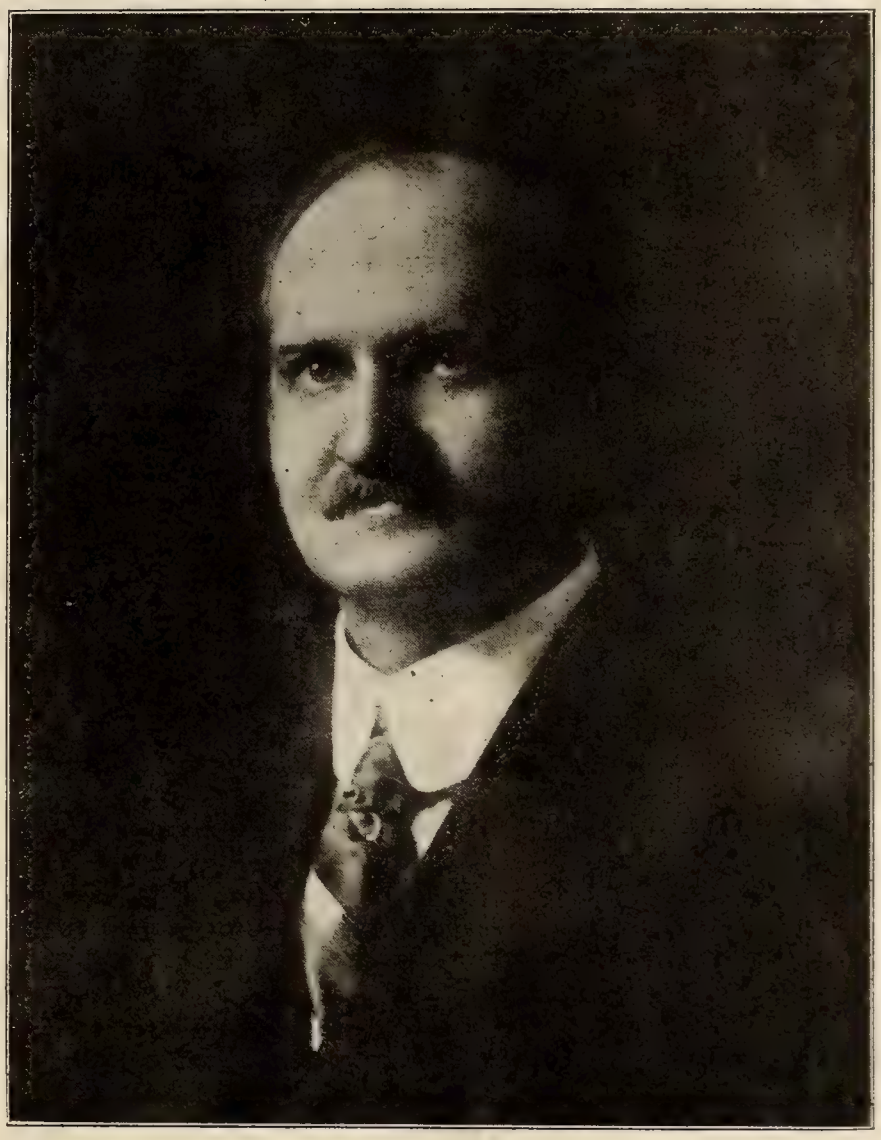
ANNOUNCEMENT TO SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS

There is both pleasure and regret in our announcement that our orders for Bethany Graded Lesson Supplies for the Spring Quarter have so far exceeded our calculations that we are unable at the present moment to send out even a sample leaflet or manual. We have been compelled to decline a considerable number of new orders the last few days on account of the fact that our stock has been consumed to the last leaflet. We have the promise of the printing house that our greatly enlarged order of supplies for the Summer Quarter will be delivered soon, in plenty of time for those who wish RETURNABLE SAMPLES, to examine them, and have their order filled before the new quarter opens, July 1.

It will be well for those schools which have decided to begin the Bethany Supplies with July 1 to send their order as early as possible.

We hope to begin filling orders for RETURNABLE SAMPLES in two or three weeks.



NOTE THE FOLLOWING OFFER: The Publishers of the Bethany Graded Lessons will send out Returnable Samples of the complete line of Supplies—Beginners', Primary and Junior—(excepting the large Beginners' pictures). Accompanying the samples a bill will be sent for $1.09, the regular price of the set. The recipient may do one of three things: (1) He may return the samples uninjured after examination. (2) He may remit $1.09 and keep the samples. Or (3) he may return the bill with his Sunday School's order for Supplies and the publishers will mark it "paid." In writing for samples please say "RETURNABLE."

MR. J. CAMPBELL WHITE.

Guiding spirit and constructive statesman of the Laymen's Missionary Movement of America. It has largely been the rare missionary genius and organizing ability of this man that has made possible one of the most powerful religious movements of modern times. Added to Mr. White's exceptional powers of leadership, he has had eleven years' experience as a missionary in India, which has given him in a very rare way a vision for a grasp of his great task.

Laymen Plan World Conquest

With the triumphant notes of the Hallelujah chorus ringing in their ears, four thousand men from every state in the union and many foreign lands passed out of Chicago's great Auditorium theatre last Friday night and the First National Missionary Congress of Christian men passed into history.

It was an unprecedented gathering. That such men,—not ministers nor missionaries, nor organization officials, but the substantial, hard-headed laymen of our churches—should gather in such numbers to talk about such business—not commerce, nor politics, but Foreign Missions—marks the event as epoch-making in the history of American Christianity.

The meeting was conceived by its promoters in the broadest terms. There was nothing small in it. It was a melting pot in which sectarian prejudices and pride were dissolved into Christian fraternity. That there are over two hundred sects of Christians in this land was a fact utterly forgotten except as some man recalled it to condemn it. The denominational relations of the speakers was not printed on the program and rarely mentioned in the chairman's introductions. Your neighbor beside you was a Christian man, a member of the one Church of Jesus Christ,—you knew that, and you cared not a whit to what denomination he belonged.

The missionary enterprise was projected on a scale to make it appear what it really is—a man's job. The thing to be done was big, definite and not impossible. It was no less than the evangelization of the whole world with the gospel, in our own generation. By "evangelization" was meant the giving to every man everywhere a chance to accept Jesus Christ. And when this mighty task was reduced to figures showing that if to each missionary are allotted 25,000 souls of the 700,000,000 who have not yet heard of Christ it will take $45,000,000 a year to support America's share of the required number of missionaries to accomplish the work in a generation, the men felt that the sum was easily enough within the reach of a consecrated church.

Something like the spirit of the old crusaders enters into a throng of men when these figures are put before them. "Think of it, men," they say, "the gospel of Christ can be given to the last man on the planet for the price of one car fare a week by the Christian people of America!" And in the kindling thought of it they sang as we never heard men sing,

"Like a mighty army moves the church of God!"

Such singing! It was worth coming across a continent to hear! The noble hymns of the church, "The Son of God goes forth to war," "O Zion Haste, Thy Mission now Fulfilling!" "The Church's One Foundation," "A Mighty Fortress is our God" were favorites. The great Auditorium organ led out, and not a voice was unused except when some man would just stop to let the billow of praise flow over his soul on its way to the great arches above.

The Laymens Missionary movement has been "going" just four years. It began in a prayer meeting in New York City attended by about sixty people in commemoration of the centennial of the little "Haystack prayer meeting" out of which the first missionary society in America was organized. A young Washington business man had been a delegate to the Nashville Student Volunteers convention and had been deeply inpressed with the vision of evangelizing the world in our own generation. He said in his heart that if the Christian business men of America saw this thing as these students see it they would furnish the money for sending out all the workers necessary to this great task. Thereupon he resolved to find a way to reach the heart of American laymen.

This man was John B. Sleman. He attended the Centennial prayer meeting and through Mr. J. Campbell White, the only speaker of the meeting, the idea of the Laymen's movement was launched. A campaign was started. Six months ago in Buffalo the first convention of a most remarkable series of similar conventions in the cities was held. Week after week in city after city laymen of all the churches have taken their place with their brothers in this crusade to carry Christ to the last man who has not yet heard of him.

This movement culminated last week in the Missionary Congress. The picked men of our citizenship were here, men used to dealing in the business world with great programs. To them the missionary program had come to appeal as a great enterprise, worthy of their best and strongest. Their enthusiasm was boundless. And their purposes aimed directly at a definite goal.

After hearing the four days' discussions the Congress adopted a definite missionary policy on the last evening, just before adjournment. This policy is as follows:

THE NATIONAL MISSIONARY POLICY.

In view of the Fatherhood of God, the unity of the human race and the sufficiency and finality of the gospel of Christ;

Knowing that the field is the world and that this is the only generation we can reach:

This first NATIONAL MISSIONARY CONGRESS in the United States, representing more than twenty millions of church members, recognizes the immediate world-wide presentation of the gospel message to be the central and commanding obligation resting upon all Christian churches, and declares its conviction that the Church of our generation can and should obey literally the great commission of our Lord, to preach the gospel to every creature.

As indicating the measure of effort required among the non-Christian peoples of the earth, we accept as a working policy, the standard that, in addition to the native agencies, there should be provided from the churches of Christian lands an average of at least one missionary to every twenty-five thousand of the people to be evangelized. This would require the quadrupling of our present force of workers, and a corresponding increase in contributions from approximately $11,000,000 last year to about $45,000,000 annually. This estimate indicates the measure of personal duty at home rather than the method of missionary work abroad, in determining which diversities of conditions in the work, dissimilarities of equipment and power among the workers, the part to be taken by the native churches which are to be raised up to do the great bulk of the work as self-supporting and self-propagating agencies, must all be taken into account.

We declare our conviction that according to their ability and opportunity, the laymen of the churches are equally responsible with the ministers to pray and to plan, to give and to work for the coming of the Kingdom of God upon earth. We believe that the call to share actively in extending the knowledge of Christ presents to every man his supreme opportunity for development, usefulness, and satisfaction, and we appeal to men everywhere to invest their intelligence, their influence, their energy, and their possessions in the united effort of the Church of Christ to evangelize the world.

While seeking the enlistment of all the laymen of the church in fulfilling the missionary task of our generation, we declare our belief that this work is the work of the organized church, and that the natural leaders in it are the ministers and the missionary agencies of the various churches; and it is our conviction that all that is done in the name of the Laymen's Missionary Movement should help to strengthen these leaders and the agencies through which the churches as such must discharge their missionary responsibility.

We urge the adoption by every church of regular and thorough methods of missionary education and finance, culminating once each year in an organized personal canvass of each congregation, with the earnest purpose of securing the systematic and proportionate contributions of every member toward the world-wide propagation of the Christian evangel, and we recommend for universal adoption the scriptural plan of a missionary offering every week, in order that this vast world enterprise may be kept constantly in the minds and prayers of all Christians, and that funds for the work may be adequate and steadily available.

We recommend that there be formed in each individual church a strong Missionary Committee, charged with the responsibility of promoting missionary intelligence, intercession and contributions, and that in each city or county where work is undertaken a Co-operating Committee of the Laymen's Missionary Movement be formed, composed of laymen, selected so far as possible by the various churches to represent their constituency in the territory covered, and that the Laymen's Missionary Movement, through its Executive Committee, in co-operation with the established missionary agencies of the several churches, be authorized to provide such measures for the supervision and assistance of these Co-operating Committees as the providential developments of the work may require.

We earnestly remind all Christians of the duty of habitual prayer for missionaries; for native Christians; and for pastors and churches at home; that laborers may be thrust forth into all harvest fields; that the unity of the church may be realized and that the glory of God may be universally revealed.

Remembering that the promises of divine blessing are conditioned upon obedience to the will of God, and recognizing the deep spiritual quickening which has already come to the churches in many parts of the United States and Canada, through the awakening of the missionary spirit, we call upon the whole membership of the churches here represented to unite with us in discharging our personal and national missionary obligations.

Assembled in this National Missionary Congress, and deeply persuaded of the power of Christ through His united Church to solve all the problems of human society, we desire to unite with the churches of Canada and of our sister nations throughout Christendom, as loyal servants of the King of Kings, in a comprehensive and adequate campaign for the conquest of the world by Jesus Christ, who is the Way, the Truth and the Life, the Desire of the Nations, and the Light of the World.

The Disciples' Conference

On Friday, the last day of the Laymen's Congress, all the denominations held separate conferences to discuss their share of the national responsibility of evangelizing the world in this generation. The Disciples met, one hundred strong, in the Northwestern University building and after listening to speakers, adopted the following resolutions:

We recognize in the Laymen's Missionary Campaign a movement called of God to hasten the coming of the reign of Christ in all lands. We rejoice in the spirit of fraternity and Christian service which it engenders. We most cordially endorse and recommend its great aim, the evangelization of the world in this generation, to our own brotherhood, the Disciples of Christ. We believe that it is a movement both for evangelization and toward Christian union, giving emphasis to the essentials of Christianity and disregarding the non-essentials which separate the people of God.

We believe that this great movement will cause the co-operation and practical union found imperative in the foreign fields, to react for closer fellowship among the religious bodies at home, and tend to bring about organic scriptural union for which the Disciples of Christ have contended for a century. We therefore hail the movement as a herald of the reign of Christ and pray for the accomplishment of its glorious end.

Believing that our own people should be at the front in this great movement, and that our missionary work should be placed on a high and heroic plane, It is the sense of this body—

First: That the Disciples of Christ should accept at least 25,000,000 people as their share of the non-Christian world to be evangelized in this generation, and to this end adopt as their watchword and aim $2,000,000 a year for foreign missions, and $1,000 for foreign missionaries.

Second: That each church in our brotherhood be urged to adopt a definite missionary policy, including the following characteristics: A missionary pastor;—a missionary Bible school; a program for missions; an every-member canvass for missions; the weekly offering for missions; a missionary committee; a missionary Christian Endeavor Society; a systematic missionary education.

Third: Every delegate attending this congress, and also those having attended the various Laymen's Missionary conventions, should use every means in his power to disseminate and perpetuate the influence of this remarkable campaign. To this end we recommend that each delegate use all possible opportunities to reach the constituency of his district.

Fourth: It is the further sense of this body that both our foreign society and our local churches should aid in every possible way the future interdenominational campaign of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, to the end that every district and church shall be reached by the appeal for the world's evangelization in this generation.

Fifth: It is also the sense of this body that these resolutions should be given wide publicity in our papers, and that they should be presented at our national convention at Topeka for endorsement.

(Signed) By the Committee:

Horace G. Murphy, Ben L. Rand, J. H. Goldner,
Stephen J. Corey, Dr. David Owen Thomas, W. R. Warren.

The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, at its meeting in Philadelphia, in 1908, recommended by the unanimous vote of the delegates representing churches having a membership of about 17,000,000, "that the various societies of young people connected with the Evangelical Denominations represented in the Federal Council, recognize as Hague Day the 18th of May, and have on that day in all their chapters as far as possible a consideration of the subject of Peace." This day, as its name suggests, calls attention to the world-wide movement in behalf of Peace and Arbitration that is now historically and officially connected with the Hague in Holland. It was in this city on the 18th of May, 1899, that the first great conference of officially appointed delegates opened its sessions. The second Hague Conference was in session from June to October, 1907. The third conference meets in 1914. Notwithstanding many difficulties, steps have been taken that promise even more definite action in the near future on the part of many of the great nations of the world, urging that international questions shall be submitted to the Hague Court for arbitration. The young people connected with our churches should give thoughtful attention to this great movement.

One of the men making a profound impression on the Northern Baptist Convention now in session in Chicago is Rev. J. H. Shakespeare of London, who is in this country in the interests of the World's Baptist Alliance. Lying nearer to his heart, however, than the project of allying Baptists, is the plan of drawing all the Free churches of England into an alliance for overcoming the evils that inhere in our present sectarian divisions. Mr. Shakespeare recently presented his views before the Free Church Council and called for the establishing of a United Evangelical Church of England. His statement was much discussed in British papers and is taken as a serious possibility by church leaders on the other side of the water.

While the plan does not involve the doing away with denominational organizations, it goes farther than either the English Free Church Council or the American Federation movement. Mr. Shakespeare proposes that the present denominational organizations be subordinated to a "United Free Church of England." Mr. Shakespeare's message will be as appropriate in the United States as in England, for there is among us a growingly acute sense of the sinful waste and weakness due to the divided state of the church. In his address at Mandel Hall, Chicago, last Sunday, his words sounded the same notes of unity which the Laymen's Congress had made familiar the week before.

Apart from the missionaries who brought first hand experiences of service and observation on the foreign field, no speakers were more favorably received at the Missionary Congress than Robert E. Speer, of the Presbyterian Foreign Society, and our own Stephen J. Corey. Mr. Corey's address on "The Home Church's Need of a World Field" was practical, spiritual, incisive and in every way convincing. An incipient regret that the Disciples were represented only once on the main program was completely allayed by the reflection that so many speakers said what Disciple hearts would have been prompted to utter. Such an address as Bishop Anderson's, which The Christian Century gives its readers this week, and that of Mr. Speer on "Missions and Christian Unity," which Hon. Thomas W. Phillips of Pennsylvania told the Disciples' conference was the greatest address on Christian union he had ever heard, surely said all that the most masterful pleaders for union among the Disciples could have spoken. Next week The Christian Century will publish Mr. Speer's address.

What shall I make of tomorrow? Let it be a better day than this day, a truer day, a deeper day, wherein I may learn more wisely, think more nobly, and see more clearly. Let me know a little more of charity, and a little more of love; be a little mindful of the feelings of children, a little thoughtful of the feebleness of age. Let me be a little quieter under vexation, a little stronger under temptation, and a little more sensible of the part I am here to play. Let me be frank and true, that I may look into my friend's eyes without shrinking and into the eyes of him who thinks he is my enemy without fear. Let me understand a little more the radiance of the sunshine and the deep blue of the sky. Let me perceive the sweetness of service, the satisfaction of effort, and the glory of honest work. Let me be master of the lessons of the day, and so become more master of myself. And so may it pass, quickly but helpfully, quietly but happily, full of compensation for every trial, and comfort for every hurt, until the shadows come again out of the dusk, and I shall lie down to think of still another day wherein I must go forward.—Selected.

Jesus Christ, Master of the Heart

"If Jesus Christ is a man —
And only a man, I say
That of all mankind I cleave to him
And to him will I cleave alway.

If Jesus Christ is a God—
And the only God—I swear
I will follow him through heaven and hell,
The earth, the sea, and the air."

These lines of a modern poet express the faith of millions now living upon the earth. Jesus Christ is still the master of the heart and an increasing number of the inhabitants of the earth are acknowledging him as their trusted guide.

The secret of Jesus' power lies in that fact that we are incurably religious, that we can never get rid of the passion to know God unless we cease to be human in our desires, and that Jesus brings God to us. Or, to state the other side of the fact, God in Christ will not let us get away from him. He follows us wherever we go. Neither in the depths of sensuality nor in the pursuit of wealth, power, or knowledge are we hidden from God. "A spark disturbs our clod." The psalmist felt that he could not escape God, though he might ascend to heaven or make his bed in Sheol or dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea. Browning gives the same thought in the following lines:

"Just when we are safest, there's a sunset-touch,
A fancy from a flower-bell, some one's death,
A chorus-ending from Euripides—
And that's enough for fifty hopes and fears,
As old and new at once as nature's self,
To rap and knock and enter in our soul."

For some strange reason, men often feel that they ought to run away from God. They try to drown the voice of conscience. They will not learn the lessons written large in defeat. When, however, they recognize the impossibility of escaping from God and not only cease to fight against his will, but accept in a positive way that will as the program of their lives, they realize that it was a friend whose approaches they angrily resented, a friend who was too kind and patient to allow them to follow their own devices to the ruin of their lives. It is God the friend of men whom Jesus reveals in his person and teaching. The outcasts who had been taught that God was an exacting legalist, more concerned for the letter of the law than for the souls of men, loved Jesus because he was accessible and showed them that God was accessible to the humblest and most despised of the earth. The Pharisee Paul loved Jesus because Jesus delivered him from bondage to a conception of God that made him hateful and cruel. The slave felt his soul rise to the "awful verge of manhood" as he listened to the gospel story, and he gave his heart to Jesus the emancipator.

The laborer has reason to love Jesus, for Jesus taught that man is more important than any prize of pleasure or success the world may offer. The glory of a city, as Jesus sees it, is not in its great department stores, its railroad terminals, its banks, and its factories, but in its free, strong, clean, honest, courageous citizens. Business must be subordinate to the welfare of all the people. If any combination calls for the sacrifice of the health and virtue of its employees that its dividends may be large, that combination is anti-Christian and meets the opposition of every man who has the sentiment and the intelligence of a Christian. Children are not born to be used up in factories, but to play, to learn, to grow strong in body, mind, and heart. What shall it profit a nation if it gains the prize of wealth and loses its manhood and womanhood?

The convert to Christianity from heathenism appreciates better than many in Christian lands the kindness of God in Jesus Christ. His religion has been one of fear and cruelty. The gospel of God's love was very strange to him when he first heard it. He could not believe that it was true. But when its truth came home to him, he passed from a world of magic and fear into a world of law and love. Christ has saved him and he knows it. The salvation he experiences is from real evils. The word Savior means something to him and calls forth the loyalty of his heart.

Midweek Service, May 18. John 12:1-8; I Peter 1:8.

Social Survey

By Alva W. Taylor

Our Greatest Mayor

Mayor Gaynor of New York is "making good." No man in contemporaneous political power is quite so refreshingly original and uncompromisingly determined to root out the evil without partisanship or bias and to keep the oath of his office in all good conscience. Here are some of the things accounted to his credit in the few months he has been in office. He has practically disrupted Tammany Hall, for when the spoils are gone Tammany is either in a state of coma or an anæmic convulsion. He has directed that city employes pay no dues to political clubs and that no political influence be allowed to play any part in city administration. He has appointed a non-partisan board of civil service examiners and ordered them to steer clear of all politics and directed that no political appointments be made in any of the city departments. Every department is ordered to abolish all padded pay rolls, brutal policemen are ordered to quick trial, a peremtory order has been issued that no policeman enter a saloon excepting upon matters of duty and that none shall drink when there or receive any tribute from the keeper at any time. He also warns them that a strictly neutral attitude must be maintained in labor difficulties. He practically took charge of the police while a "cleaning up" of the force was being inaugurated and secured the suspension of a number of notorious offenders. He has publicly ordered that all irregularities be probed to the bottom, "no matter who is hit," and has himself begun investigations of all supply departments. He ordered the tax commissioners to do their duty without fear or favor and hunt out the guilty and he would indict them and told the assessors that favoritism to the rich must end and nothing but values be considered. He dismissed the aqueduct board as grafters who were holding on after their work was done and warned the water supply board that he would not tolerate their scattering of money without consideration of the sources of supply.

He has dealt with matters that other mayors consider the routine of subordinates simply because he was determined to see waste stopped and efficiency substituted. He charges that the police have collected not less than $2,000,000 per year from saloon and dive keepers and that it must stop. He is determined that political jobbing must go and that he will conduct a non-partisan administration. He declares war to the knife upon predatory interests and those who evade paying taxes. He also says the laws must be executed and proposes to close the saloons on Sunday along with other law enforcement. He is no egotist for he says the city should get an expert next time and he seems to have no particular political ambitions, for he wilfully defies the party powers. He may yet prove so fearless and honest an executive that he will be elevated to a higher office. Gov. Hughes declares that it is of less consequence what the law is than who the man is that enforces the law. A man like Gaynor might be found to be the logical successor of Roosevelt.

An Instance of Consecutive Social Legislation

The introduction of social legislation such as these times are demanding brings many a knotty problem to wrinkle the foreheads of the worthy gentlemen who sit on supreme court benches and decide as to how specific statutes harmonize with fundamental law. It is a principle long held that liberty to contract for one's labor was inviolable and thus statutes requiring that labor shall not be employed for more than a limited number of hours per day have usually been declared unconstitutional. But social considerations require a modification of the old individualistic precept. The Federal Supreme Court nullified the New York law limiting the work of men in bakeries and laundries to ten hours by that contention. But it found a way to uphold the same principle in the Oregon ten-hour law for women by declaring that while it was fundamental that the right to labor was a property right, the rights of property were subordinate to those of social welfare. Therefore as women could not labor so long as men without sustaining injury a ten-hour law for women was constitutional.

The Illinois Supreme Court followed this ruling in upholding the statute in that state, modeled after that of Oregon. The wonder is not that Illinois thus joins six other states in upholding a limitation of women's working hours but that after six other states and the national tribunal had upheld them any lower court should declare it unconstitutional. The judges say that what they know as men cannot escape their knowledge as judges and that all men know long hours in mechanical establishments and at work on their feet is injurious to womankind.

By this decision the traditional "liberty of contract" doctrine is maintained but modified by the opinion of the court that more than ten hours' labor under certain conditions is injurious to women and that even the "liberty of contract" cannot forbid regulation of hours of labor in the interests of social welfare. It establishes the principle, not that any limit can be set on a day's labor, but that any class of labor may be limited to such hours as will prevent injury to the health and welfare of the laborers. The same court may thus overrule a nine hour day for the same class of workers or a twelve hour day for another class but it does mark a real advance in recognizing the social welfare principle. In course of time the old "liberty of contract" theory will be so modified that it will scarcely be recognizable and society will assert its right to protect all its workers from undue hours and all other disabilities that are forced upon them by powers of trade or custom or in the process of changing conditions. Thirty thousand women in Illinois are affected by this decision.

Freedom of Speech Wins in Prussia

The people seem to have won in their battle for the right of peaceable assemblage and free speech in Prussia. After having been sabered off the streets and thrown in prison in great numbers, popular indignation won the privilege of assembling peaceably to discuss political measures. One hundred and twenty thousand gathered on a recent Sunday in Berlin, listened to radical speeches on the franchise bill, passed resolutions pledging themselves to continue the fight for a fair ballot and dispersed quietly, much as an American or British crowd would have done. The German Tories raged and declared the end of government had come but the police were agreeably surprised and doubtless a new day is marked in German history. Every third person in the great assemblage was a woman—which brings into relief another absurd Prussian law which forbids women participating in political meetings.

Temperance Notes

Many of the larger towns went "wet" at the April election simply because the officials had refused to enforce the law and the people prefer the licensed saloon to the anarchy of their officials. Springfield, Ohio, however, is an instance of another kind. The grog dealers there attempted to defy law but they found the prosecuting attorney about his business. As a result they have paid $10,570 into the county treasury as fines and then found themselves held for the Aiken tax for $6,000 more.

Pennsylvania has a "model license" law. It is a living example of what will be done whenever the saloon crowd are allowed to "reform" themselves by the rules of Tom Gilmore's "Model License League." The saloonist gives bonds and the court may revoke licenses for cause. The result is that the brewers center all efforts for the election of "right" judges and thus take a short cut for insuring a steady reign of booze. No comment is needed on the character of the gentlemen who sit on a booze filled bench and their general attitude toward the dignity of law enforcement.

San Francisco with license and a "wide open" town pays $1.50 tax on each $100, while Berkeley, just across the bay, is much better cared for with no license money and a 99 cent tax. Los Angeles must have the saloons' toll and puts up $1.47 for every $100 assessment that the saloon's product may be cared for while Long Beach gets along without either and helps care for the Los Angeles bums besides for 90 cents. The average for four California booze towns is $2.01 per hundred, while for four "dry" sister cities it is but $1.00.

State-wide prohibition will be the issue this year in Iowa, Missouri, Arkansas, Florida, South Carolina and Virginia.

Judge Cleland, Chicago's splendid Christian judge and advocate of a widened parole system, asks the police to take drunken men home instead of dumping them into the vile cages of the police stations. He argues that it will have a much better moral effect on the victim of drink and will savor of kindness rather than revenge.

Lloyd George found that his increased tax on intoxicating spirits greatly reduced consumption and thus left him without the money needed but he only rejoiced over it, saying it was not money but humanity that was his care. Our Supreme Court has said, "If a loss should accrue to the United States from a diminished consumption of ardent spirits, she will be a gainer a thousandfold in the health, wealth and happiness of the people."

The number of boys in the Pontiac Reformatory in Illinois increased steadily until the local option law went into effect. The first year under local option there was a decrease of 7 per cent and the second year brought it up to 26 per cent. Yet there are temperance people who call local option a "devil's device."

Atlanta, Ga., is a shining example of what prohibition will do for a large municipality. Bank clearings increased 76.5 per cent last year. In St. Louis it was 12 per cent; in New Orleans 15 per cent; in Louisville 13 per cent. Oklahoma City is the only other large place that came near Atlanta and it too is prohibition. Arrests for drunkenness decreased 43 per cent.

Dr. Delancey Carter made the statement recently in a paper on Alcohol and Narcotics, read before the New York Medical Society, that there are 1,000,000 drunkards in the United States and that one-third of them die annually as a result of drink. The grog shops keep enough recruits coming on to replenish the ranks.

Governor Hughes' Elevation

Most of the American people will be greatly pleased with the elevation of Gov. Hughes to the Supreme Bench. All will not agree with his political creed and many do not think he is progressive enough in matters that relate to corporations. But all will agree that he is able and honest and that he has made a fearless governer if not indeed the best the Empire state has ever had. There was no enthusiasm over the appointment of Justice Lurton. H was so avowedly a judge of corporation prejudices and so long an attorney for one of the worst railway corporations in the land that he comes to the bench with a mind of the wrong bent in these days of the foundation laying of principles for the governence of corporate matters. Gov. Hughes became a national figure in a battle on commercialized corruption and has splendid poise.

Unheralded Evangelism

By J. F. Carson, D. D.

In my mail the other evening I received this unsigned letter:

"I won't let this incident pass without writing to you of it. My little daughter is a member of your Sunday-school. I do not have any religious faith. All my life I have been an unbeliever. The children of our neighborhood went to Sunday-school, and my little girl wanted to go with them. I consented. She came home one Sunday with certain verses to commit to memory, and said that when she learned them perfectly and recited them to her teacher, she would get a Bible as a reward. Last Sunday she did not return at the usual time. I waited for her for a while, and then went to the Sunday-school to see if she was there. I went into a room, and at once saw my little one standing and reciting the verses which she had studied. The young lady who was hearing her had her arm around her. Oh, sir! I cannot describe the feeling that went through my whole being. I thought, If some one had done that to me when I was a child, what a different life I might have had! As I stood looking upon the scene, I made up my mind that I would start next Sunday and go to church, and try and get into touch with the spirit which the Sunday-school teacher showed.

This evangelism is not often heralded—the evangelism of the Sunday-school teacher. The evangelism that rescues from sin and degradation is glorious and rightly applauded. But there is a better evangelism than that—the evangelism that saves the life from going into the ways of sin and the depths of degradation. That is the evangelism of the Sunday-school. The teacher holds the strategic situation. It is a fine thing to save a soul, but it is a finer thing to save a soul plus a life. Polycarp suffered martyrdom at the age of ninety-five. He was led to Christ when he was nine years of age. When Polycarp was converted, there was a soul saved plus eighty-six years of holy living and heroic serving. This is the teacher's splendid privilege and opportunity. My anonymous correspondent's word rings its pathos into the soul, "If some one had done that to me when I was a child (put her arm about me and told me of God), what a different life I mighthave had!"—The Sunday School Times.

A Man Has Failed Though Rich

When he is narrow and bigoted in his opinions.

When he is leading a mean and stingy life so far as his charities and magnanimity are concerned.

When he has fed others on hopes instead of adequate salaries or just dues.

When he does not in his prosperity help those who helped him in his adversity.

When he goes on the principle of getting all he can and giving as little as possible.—Orison Sweet Marden in Success Magazine.

Christ's Will for the World

A Clarion Call for Missions and Christian Unity

By Bishop Charles P. Anderson

The opening address at the Missionary Congress held in Chicago last week was delivered by Bishop Charles P. Anderson of the Episcopal diocese of Chicago. It was in every way a keynote utterance. The significance of it to Disciples of Christ is found in the enthusiastic reception given it by the four thousand delegates assembled in the Auditorium theatre, quite as much as in the clear-visioned statements of the address itself. We give our readers almost the entire address, omitting only a portion of the argument under the first heading, "Universality," presenting entire, without the change or omission of a word, the Bishop's statements concerning "Unity." The first half of the address was listened to with interest, but without applause. No sooner had the announcement of the thesis concerning unity been made than the house broke out in great applause, which was repeated in rapid fire, as if the speaker pulled trigger in the hearts of the laymen at every utterance. These applause punctuation marks we have not erased from the stenographer's report, believing that they will aid in carrying to our readers the electric atmosphere of the occasion. EDITORS.

I have made a considerable number of missionary addresses of late, both in connection with the church which I have the privilege of representing, as well as with the Chicago Convention of the Laymen's Missionary Movement. I almost feel as if I were obtruding myself in appearing upon the platform once more. I have been asked, however, to make the opening address at this National Congress. I esteem it a great privilege and honor so to do.

The subject which has been assigned to me is "The Will of Christ for the World." It is a subject which one ought to approach on one's knees. It is an awful responsibility to undertake to interpret the mind of Christ for the world.

Fortunately, we are not left to our own resources; we do not have to guess at it. It is not the result of any mental process of ratiocination. It does not have to be evolved out of our inner consciousness. We only have to listen to the Divine and authoritative voice and then interpret that voice in the language of practical obedience and practical activity.

The Two Great Words of Missions.

I shall venture to interpret the will of Christ for the world, so far as the purposes of this gathering are concerned, in two words. They are: "Universality and Unity."

The universality of the religion of Jesus Christ, the unity of the Christian Church. I take it that there are no two things that stand out more prominently in the pages of the New Testament than those. First, that the religion of Christ is for the whole world. And secondly, that there is to be oneness on the part of the disciples of Christ, in order that the whole world may know and believe.

First, universality. I do not have to argue it in this gathering. It is an axiom. It is a postulate. It is the very central belief of our religion. Christ is the Son of God. God has made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on the fact of the whole earth. Whatsoever God purposes through Christ to any part of the world, He purposes for all parts of the world. Christ belongs not to one nation, but to all nations; to no one race, but to all races, to no age, but to all ages. We sometimes speak of Christ and other masters. There is only one Master, Christ, and all the rest are brethren. And if we come away from the somewhat stiff statements of theological language to the mellower language of the New Testament, we find that every page is full of the same idea. God so loved the world,—not a portion of it, but the whole world,—that he gave his only begotten Son. "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden." "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." "I am come that ye might have life and that ye might have it more abundantly." Christ has no competitor. Christ has no rivals. There is none other name given under heaven whereby man can be saved but the name of Jesus Christ.

Value in Ethnic Faiths.

Now, this does not involve that you and I deny that the non-Christian ethnic faiths of the world have any ethical or moral value. We rejoice when we find that they have. God hath not left himself without witnesses. In every nation the people have some idea of God, some consciousness of right and wrong, some glimmering of morality. In some cases it exists in a very rude and crude form, and is the basis of all kinds of fantastic cruelties in the name of religion. In some cases it exists in a more highly developed form. That is our starting point. The Christian missionaries, like Christ, came not to destroy but to fulfil. We hold that Christ is the logical and inevitable outcome of all religions. As St. Augustine said: men are naturally Christians. We hold that there are in every man certain instincts and intutions and endowments which if they have the proper environment and the proper cultivation will inevitably lead up to his being a Christian man. "If ye believe in God believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions." I say we do not have to argue this proposition. It is an axiom. It is a postulate. It is our central belief. It is the basis upon which we start. It is of the very essence of the gospel of Christ that it is a universal gospel. But the universality of the Christian religion not only rests upon our claims for Christ, it also rests upon the fact that it has demonstrated its fitness to be the universal religion and its power to be the universal religion.

So I say that we start out in this conference first with the conviction that Christ is universal; that the Christian religion is to be universal. That it has the power of being universal, and that it is the most potential thing for righteousness that the world has ever seen. (Applause.) That is the first part of our program.

Unity and the Will of Christ.

And now unity. Of course, unity is not uniformity. Unity is not unanimity of opinion. Unity is not platform agreement. But unity is that oneness in the visible body of Christ that makes men know and believe. (Applause.) This, of course, is not the time or the place to discuss unity as a platform. It is not the time or the place to say a single word of a controversial character. It is not the time or the place for any of us to say foolish things for the sake of saying perhaps some popular things; but I for one can not discuss the subject, "What is the Will of Christ for the World," without touching upon unity. (Applause.) And you and I can not consider the most statesmanlike, the most economic, the most efficient methods of missionary administration without considering unity. (Renewed applause.)

It is well for us to remember that the greatest triumphs that the Christian Church has ever won were in the days when the church was one. It is well for us to remember that the greatest triumphs that Christianity has ever won were won shall I say before the thirty-nine articles were written or the Westminster Confession or the Augsburg Confession. And the greatest triumphs that Christianity is going to win will be the triumph of a divinely united Christian discipleship. (Renewed applause.)

Concrete Illustrations of Divisions.

Let me take you to a little town not very far from Chicago. It has but thirteen hundred population, men, women and children. It has nine churches. Several of those nine churches are being supported by contributions from non-members. There are 55 per cent of the men of that town that do not belong to any one of the nine. But why? Because they are so feeble, necessarily so feeble when they divide thirteen hundred souls up among nine of them. They are all necessarily so feeble as not to be commanding exponents of the Christian religion in the town in which they exist. (Applause.)

Let me take you to another town not so very far from Chicago. It is a larger town. It has thirty-two churches in it, not thirty-two church buildings, but thirty-two separate organizations. Several of these churches are receiving support from the Home Missionary Board, when anything like Christian statesmanship would strengthen the church in that town and make it a great contributory force to spreading the gospel throughout all the world. (Applause.) I believe that we are wasting more money through over-lapping, through dove-tailing, through rivalries, than would evangelize a whole race in a single generation. (Tremendous applause.) Is it wise? Is it statesmanlike? Is it Christian?

Economic Argument Not Primary.

I would be the very last person to put forward the economic argument as one of the first arguments on behalf of Christian union. Better have 500 churches, each one with its own truths and its own spiritual convictions, than one united church at the sacrifice of a single truth or of a single conviction. (Applause.) Better waste a million dollars than to sacrifice a spiritual experience or a spiritual truth. But is it necessary either to waste money on the one hand or to sacrifice convictions on the other? I am quite sure that many of us have been approaching the subject wrong end first. We have been asking what can we give up in the interests of unity. That is not the question. It is not what we can give up, but what can we give, in the interests of unity. (Applause.) You have no right to give up, no right to give up anything that you have had that ever has been of value, that is of value, or that is likely to be of value. (Applause.) You have no right to give up anything that in your judgment has ever received the divine sanction and the divine approval. It is not what we can give up, but what we can give. And I have a horror of that kind of unity that would be based on a sort of residuum, (Laughter and applause.) I want to belong to a church of maximums. (Applause.) Maximum belief, maximum discipleship, maximum sacrifices. There are things that we can give up, but nobody is asking us to give up anything that is of value. We can give up pride. We can give up our ecclesiastical conceit. (Applause.) We can give up our denominational jealousies. (Applause.) We can give up our inherited prejudices. (Applause.) And perhaps, by the grace of God, we can give up some of our ignorance. (Laughter and Applause.)

Christians Cannot Stay Apart.

I lay this down, brethren, as a proposition that has already demonstrated itself, Christ-like Christians can not stay apart. (Applause.) Take this Laymen's Missionary Movement, to me the most significant thing about it is this, that as I see it, all kinds of Christians, Anglican Christians, Protestant Christians of every name can, without a single scruple of conscience, come and take their part and their portion in this great gathering. (Applause.) Why? It is because we have all got the same central unity, we all believe in Christ. We believe that the world is for Him, and we believe that He has come to have the whole world. (Applause.) Glory be to God! that at the end of two thousand years in spite of all the theological controversies, in spite of all the religious warfare, Christians throughout the whole world can get together on that platform: Christ for the world and the world for Christ. (Applause.) There is ten times as much unity in the world as we think.

A Big Enough Program.

Well, that is our program. The universality of the Christian religion and the ultimate unity of the Church of Christ. Isn't it a big enough program? Is the world big enough for you? Is Christ attraction enough for you? "Ashamed of Jesus, can it be, a mortal men ashamed of thee?" Let us adhere to that position in spite of the worldliness of our church, in spite of the cold unbelief and the half-belief and the painless sacrifices that characterize the average membership of the church. In spite of the absolutely unchristian philosophy that we hear from pews that they do not believe in foreign missions, let us not pull down the flag one inch. (Applause.) And then shall we not as a means to an end at least be prophets of unity, priests of unity, apostles of unity. We can go that far at any rate.

May I conclude by throwing these thoughts into the most efficient language which I know how to employ, the language of prayer:

Oh, God, who hast made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on the face of the whole earth, and hast sent Thy Son, Jesus Christ, to preach peace to them that are afar off and to them that are nigh, grant that all men everywhere may seek after Thee and find Thee. Bring the nations into Thy fold, and add the heathen to Thine inheritance. And we pray Thee shortly to accomplish the number of Thine elect, and to hasten Thy Kingdom. Give us grace seriously to lay to heart the great dangers that we are in by way of unhappy division. Take away from us all pride, envy, jealousy, hatred and uncharitableness, and anything that hinders Godly union and concord. That as there is but one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of us all, so with one heart and mind, in the spirit of truth and peace and grace and charity, we may with one mind and mouth, glorify Thee, the only God, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

May your lex credendae always be your lex orandae. (Long continued applause.)

Sentiment Over the Sea

Mr Balfour A Big Obstacle.

The London Christian World thinks Balfour a bump in the way of Liberal legislation. It says: "Nobody likes to part with power, and Mr. Balfour is almost as powerful in opposition as in office. His will decides what Liberal measures shall and shall not become law. Mr. Balfour now stands in the way of freeing the Welsh people from the incubus of an alien church, of a national settlement with Ireland, of educational peace, of real self-government for Britain, of land reform, of social reform, of electoral reform, of licensing reform, and of financial reform. He can do that because, no matter what the people of this country may say to the house which they themselves elect, Mr. Balfour possesses a permanent majority in the other branch of the Legislature. He has caused the present trouble because he has not scrupled to use that majority for purely party purposes. But he has overreached himself, and has started a conflict to which there can only be one end."

The Breakdown of a Leader.

Dr. Peter Forsyth, writing regarding the tragical close of the life of Thomas Law, whose collapse seems to have been physical, mental, and in part moral, says: "Such a tragedy, so appalling when we consider its genesis and its details, goes to the soul, and it strikes a very great, deep, and searching note to the whole apostolate as things are today. The fate of a representative man in the Church is a public message to it from God. Our hearts meditate terror. What does the Spirit say to the churches. The lesson is winged by such various cases as from time to time come to the knowledge of experienced and consulted ministers, where a preacher has shocked a circle that hung on his soul by a sudden ethical breakdown. They are cases where the misconduct was evidently a symptom of nervous collapse rather than of moral wickedness, and they would have been prevented if taken in time by a skilled psychiatrist instead of either a general practioner or a critic—best of all by the man himself. A mastered soul is the first condition for our mastery of the world; which world our first business is, not to win for Christ, but to commit it to Christ, in thought, word, and deed, habitual, active, and unwearied, inly led, fed, and stayed. What we most need at the moment, perhaps, is not work for our religion, but religion for our work. There never was so much religious work; but it needs more of active religion to carry it, more inward experimental religion, more religion practical in that creative sense which from a Sabbatic centre shapes the soul, makes it, and then breaks it to the multitude in constant increase to the edifying of both in love. Few are in more spiritual peril of starvation than some whose task it is to handle in great masses the religion of the democracy."

Human Rights and Property Rights.

My position as regards the moneyed interests can be put in a few words. In every civilized society property rights must be carefully safeguarded; ordinarily and in the great majority of cases, human rights and property rights are fundamentally and in the long run identical; but when it clearly appears that there is a real conflict between them, human rights must have the upper hand, for property belongs to man and not man to property.—Theodore Roosevelt at the Sorbonne.

Men's Missionary Responsibility

What Has Been Done and What Is Contemplated

By Speakers at the Chicago Congress

The Supreme Opportunity of Our Generation

J. Campbell White, General Secretary Laymen's Missionary Movement.

The three dominant spiritual notes of our day are unity, reality and universality. The unity of God, the unity of the human race, the unity of the world-field, the unity of the church; the reality of sin, the reality of salvation, the reality of Christian experience, the reality of the presence of God; the universality of truth, the universality of need, the universality of influence, the universality of opportunity.

In the very nature of things, the supreme opportunity of every man and of every generation must be a spiritual opportunity. The deepest needs in the world are spiritual needs. The most powerful forces in the world are spiritual forces.

Facing Inevitable Bankruptcy.

The supreme opportunity of every man, of every nation, and of every generation, is to share with all mankind the best blessings of which the Infinite Father of all has made us the recipients and the transmitters.

Never before in human history did a generation, a Christian nation, or a Christian man face such opportunity of influence and service as confront us today.

During the last hundred years, in which the world has been so rapidly becoming a near neighborhood, the advance guard of the Christian church has been exploring every corner of the world, translating the Bible into more than 500 of the languages and dialects of earth, and gradually but inevitably gaining the confidence of the people of all nations, by the sheer force of their unselfish service and reliable moral character.

We are also living in the generations when vast changes in the intelligence and civilization of backward nations are being registered with a rapidity never before witnessed in history. The whole world is being standardized, educationally, socially, commercially, legally, and morally. The world is becoming so small that it is necessary to make it sanitary in order to make it safe.

Missions More Efficient than Battleships.

The problem of world-peace is bound up more with missions than with armies and navies. Bayonets and battleships may be necessary as a sort of international police force, but no police force ever yet produced a sense of brotherhood. One-fourth of what this nation now spends on its military budget would support an adequate force of missionaries in every part of the non-Christian world and do infinitely more to promote human brotherhood and world-peace, than all the combined armies and navies of the world are capable of accomplishing. Yet the Christian church of America only spends about as much on foreign missionary work each year, as it costs to build and equip one modern battleship.

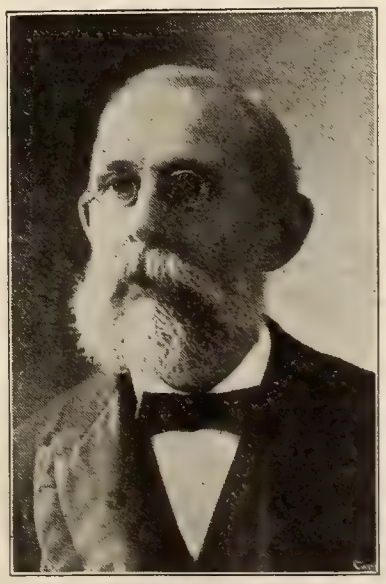
Of all definitely religious problems in the world, the chief is this, that more than half the human race is yet ignorant of Jesus Christ, and the message of peace, of victory, and of hope eternal which He brought to mankind. The triumphs of His gospel have been so universal and so stupendous, wherever it has been applied, that no missionary ever raises a question about whether the Bible is the word of God, and Jesus Christ is the Son of God, and the gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth.

A Million Souls in Six Years.

It took one hundred years of modern missionary effort to win the first million converts. We passed the million mark in 1896. It only took twelve years to win the second million. For the past two years we have been winning them at the rate of a million in six years. There are now as many new converts on the average every week, in heathen lands, as would fill this entire auditorium.

The fair share of the United States in the solution of the missionary problem, is to provide for the evangelization of about 560,000,000 of people, in the non-Christian world. This will require the quadrupling of our present force of missionaries and a corresponding increase in contributions from approximately $11,000,000 last year to about $45,000,000 annually. As we spend over $300,000,000 annually for religious purposes in our own country, one-sixth of this amount to reach a population equal to six times that of the United States, is surely a conservative estimate of our financial responsibility.

Not One Failure—Churches Will Do the Work.



I believe that the churches of the United States are going to accept this task and perform it. The National Missionary Campaign, of which this Congress is the culminating meeting, has been victorious from first to last, beyond the faith of any of those who have been used as instruments in conducting it. Of the seventy-five conventions held, from Maine to California, and from Florida to Washington, not one has failed.

There are results from every one of them that cannot be accounted for apart from the presence and power of God. The lives of thousands of men have been personally changed. And the leaders of the church have been persuaded that the evangelization of the world in this generation is not an idle dream, but is likely to be literally accomplished. The generation of Christians that makes possible this consummation will immortalize itself in fulfilling the task upon which the universe has waited for more than fifty generations.

The Nation's Response to the National Campaign

Samuel B. Capen, of Boston, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, and Chairman of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions.

Young men and women are needed on our missionary boards and other church work. The annual meetings of our various missionary boards are too often composed of men and women of advanced years. This is changing as a result of the national campaign of the Laymen's Missionary Movement.

SAMUEL B. CAPEN.

The first response of the nation to be noted comes from the great number of men reached. In every one of the seventy-five cities in which conventions have been held, great numbers of men have attended the opening dinner.

Sessions Attracted Men.

In Cleveland there were 1,459 men at the opening banquet. In Denver there were 1,200 men. In Baltimore there were 1,555 men. In Kansas City 1,828 tickets were issued and 100 men were denied admission. At Seattle there were 1,928 men at the dinner, and in Indianapolis 2,250 men sat down at the opening session. In New York 1,769 men faced the worst blizzard in years in order to attend the first dinner.

The response is also seen in the character of those reached. At these gatherings were governors and mayors, bankers, railroad officials, merchants, manufacturers and professional men. The leaders of every community have been foremost in planning and carrying these great meetings to success.

Denominational Lines Forgotten.

Response was seen in the unity of the message. All denominational lines were forgotten. Bishop Keator of the Episcopal Church, of the state of Washington, declared that the world-wide appeal of missions was bringing the Protestant church of America together in a way heretofore thought to be impossible.

The peril of our day is indifference, not skepticism or opposition, but neglect. Men neither hate Christ nor love Him. They too often ignore Him. The old appeal which centered itself in many directions seems to have lost its power, but this missionary appeal has taken hold as nothing else ever has.

One New York millionaire said to me: 'Six weeks ago I was a cigarette smoking, champaign drinking Christian. Now I have been out six nights speaking for missions.'

300,000 Pieces of Literature Used.

There is an awakened interest in the reading of literature of missions. Over 150,000 pieces of literature and 150,000 'Calls to Prayer' have been purchased during this campaign.

Committees touched by the world-wide view of missions have seen their own needs at home and are giving their time and money for home work as never before. A new spirit of prayer has been developed.

Great Increase in Gifts.

Response has been seen in the great increase in gifts and pledges for missionary work. It is too early as yet to give the result in the large, but many cities have doubled and trebled what they have given years gone by.

This work for missions has not only minimized all denominational differences, but is also helping to bind the nation together. The North and the South in years past opposed each other, but now they stand shoulder to shoulder in this movement to plant the cross of Jesus Christ in the darkest corners of the world.

Money and the Kingdom

Alfred E. Marling, Banker, New York.

My subject is the most attractive there is: Money. We can say all we want, theoretically, but we all love it, the majority of us are pursuing it, and we all want it. A distinguished clergyman once preached on the text: "The wicked flee when no man pursueth, but they make better time when somebody is after them." There is something about money that makes us go.

Money and the Kingdom: what have these two things in common?

By itself, money is worthless. When it is linked with personality it is omnipotent. It molds the personality unless it is big enough to mold it.

Gold Must be Consecrated.

Reverently be it said, this kingdom which we are talking about coming in this generation, never can come until we consecrate this gold and this silver of ours unto the Lord Jesus Christ.

Will a man rob God? Judging from the average per member given for missions, as revealed in this campaign, yea, verily, we will.

We've got the money. Between 1880 and 1904, a quarter of a century, the population increased 65 per cent and the wealth 150 per cent.

The savings banks deposits in 1880 were $819,000,000; in 1910, $5,678,000,000. The United States has 38 per cent of the banking power of the world, according to the conservative estimate of my friend, the secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of New York.

Some of you men will say: "Search me, Mr. Marling, I haven't got any of it." If the Christian men haven't any of it, then we must say that godliness is not profitable unto all things, that courage and honesy and efficiency are not fa tors in successful business.

But we have got it. On the most conservative estimate, $20,000,000,000 to $25,000,000,000 of these $120,000,000,000 is in the hands of the Christian people of this country. Shall we be feazed by an undertaking that means only $50,000,000 a year? How much is Christ worth to you?

A. E. MARLING.

I am thankful that the Laymen's Missionary Movement has come. I am thankful that these noble missionaries have taught me a new incentive for life and dignified my outlook on life so that my money making is not a matter of drudge.

Operated on for Missions.

I used to go around with an asbestos proof covering. But one day I was assaulted in the most sensitive part of my anatomy, which was my pocket book. I have since told my friends that I was being operated on for foreign missions.

We want to add a little to the miracles of apostolic times. "The deaf hear, the blind see, the dead are raised up, the sour sweeten up and the stingy loosen up."

I am dead in earnest. We have got to give up something. What is sacrifice in the life of the average business man? When I think of that word, my face blushes, for I feel as if I hadn't done anything. When a man stands before Calvary, is it any wonder that a man who has not lost all sense of what is fair, begins to feel his life is meager and narrow and small? We are dealing with figures. Let us link these two things together, money and the kingdom.

I Am in Business for Thee.

Why do I not retire? I am not ready to retire. I want to live a few more years and be in business for the Master's sake. Is not that enough of an ambition for any man? I do not care about any more wealth, but I do care for the use of wealth. I would give anything if my heart and will were so at the disposal of Jesus Christ that I could look into His face and say: "My Master, I am in business for Thee and Thee only."

Religion the Great Need

J. A. Macdonald, LL. D., Editor in Chief, Toronto Globe.

"America! the world! and these two linked together by an awakened sense of responsibility.' That is the organizing idea of this National congress of American laymen. Against that idea, as against a vast background, are set the great problems of this week's programs.

"This Laymen's Missionary Movement will have justified itself if through this National congress if there is brought home to the conscience and heart of this nation a vivid and compelling sense of America's responsibility for the uplift of the world. To raise this question so conspicuously before the whole world is to create a new kind of crisis in this nation. The challenge of this National congress is a testing of the American republic.

"Lincoln's campaign was for liberty and union within this republic. We are today in the thick and stress of another and larger crisis. The campaign of which this National congress is significant has as its objective not the integrity of the United States, but the redemption of the world. The meaning of this movement is that America recognizes its world relationship. Its message is a declaration of America's world responsibility.

J. A. MACDONALD.

"This world responsibility involves not the United States alone, but Canada as well. These two nations holding their distinctive institutions, their separate governments and their peculiar flags.

One in Their World Message.

"In ideals and motives and inspirations, they are twain, but when they stand facing the world responsibilities they are one. They are one in the deepest things of their national life, one in the invisible flame of their national faith, one in their world danger and one in their world message.

"The essential element in the responsibility of America for the world's uplift is moral—moral and religious. That is the world's greatest need. To serve that need America, more than any other nation, is charged and challenged today. The reality of moral distinctions, the necessity for moral choices, the supremacy of moral obligations, the inevitableness of moral retribution, the recreating power of the moral dynamic—to make those Christian conceptions vital and dominant in the nations of the world is the all-comprehensive responsibility of the nations of this American continent.

Religious Ideal Necessary.

"And that world responsibility cannot be met in the world races without the religious motive and the religious ideal that have made those Christian conceptions powerful in American life. Religion is the one thing that goes deep enough into life to redeem from error or the power of evil either the individual or the nation. It is the distinction and the unique glory of Christianity that it changes not the external forms but the inward life, not one making right plain but giving men the power to do it.

"More and more must the life of America, its business, its industrial organizations, its commercial agencies, its home politics, its foreign diplomacy, its literature, its thousand lines of life going out to the end of the earth—more and more must all these be redeemed and utilized by the spirit and purpose of Jesus Christ, so that the touch of America on the Southern republics, on the Orient, on Africa, on the fartherest islands, on all the world, may be redemptive and helpful. Then will America measure up to its world responsibility."

The Spiritual Significance of the National Campaign

E. Y. Mullins, D. D., LL. D., President Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Ky.

"The great need of today is that men who are successful in business should give their talents and gifts to Christian work. Too long have the business men left the running of the affairs of the church to the clergy and women.

"This missionary campaign, by arousing the laymen of America, will save us from materialism. Our greatest need in America is that the forces which make for character shall be superior to the forces that are directed toward the making of money. There is no greater influence in this direction than the missionary effort.

Means Spiritual Opportunity.

"This campaign means spiritual opportunity, seen and embraced. It means great things for the nation when its best citizens rise to a great occasion. The same talent that is required in business success is required in Christian work.

"This campaign will give the true meaning to the word 'neighbor.' China and Japan and Africa are our neighbors, commercially and educationally, and in other ways. Why should they not be recognized as our neighbors religiously?

World-Wide Evangelization.

"This movement means the coming of power to our home churches. Power is the great need in all undertakings and when we set for ourselves the task which the New Testament requires, we shall have the power which the New Testament promises.

"World-wide evangelization is the task, and the power is the gift of the Holy Ghost."

The Power of the Whole Appeal to the Whole Church

Mornay Williams, Corporation Lawyer, New York, President State Conference of Charities and Corrections.

There is a deeper unity even than of speech. It is the unity of experience. When men's conceptions of truth lead them to build their own particular towers to reach heaven and escape the deluge, they lose unity. The towers crumble and the nations are scattered.

MORNAY WILLIAMS.

When men are gathered with one accord in one place, to learn of a risen Christ, the place is shaken, but the men begin to understand each other's speech. When Peter denied Christ, his Galilean speech betrayed him, but when, on Pentecost, Peter confessed Christ, men said, "Behold, are not all these which speak Galileans, and how hear we every man in our own tongue wherein we were born?"

Love Alone Unites.

The man who has never known sorrow cannot comfort those who are sorrowing; the man who has never felt temptation cannot succor those who are tempted; the man who does not share Christ's love for the world cannot preach Christ's gospel. A creed may be true and yet divide, a ritual may be holy and beautiful and yet separate; love alone unites, but love is of God and is God, and God is in Christ—love incarnate—reconciling the world unto himself.

The Master's Face

No pictured likeness of my Lord have I,
He carved no record of His ministry
On wood or stone.
He left no sculptured tomb nor parchment dim,
But trusted for all memory of Him,
Men's heart alone.

Sometimes I long to see Him as of old
Judea saw, and in my gaze to hold
His face enshrined;
Often, amid the world's tumultuous strife,
Some slight memorial of His earlier life,
I long to find.

Who sees the face but sees in part; who reads
The spirit which it hides sees all; he needs
No more. Thy grace—
Thy life in my life, Lord, give Thou to me;
And then, in truth, I may forever see
My Master's face.

Voices from Afar

Flaming Words of Workers in Foreign Lands Spoken at the Laymen's Congress

Southern Asia

George Sherwood Eddy, of India.

George Sherwood Eddy, a graduate of Yale, who is supporting himself as a missionary in India, and who gives one-half his income to missionary work, speaking of conditions in Southern Asia, said:

"All Asia is awakening. There is a great unrest throughout that continent. While this has been partially caused by the partition of Bengal and Japan's victory over Russia, the real cause lies deeper. That cause is found in the conflict of the new civilization with the old.

Dissatisfied with Old Order.

"The different nations of Asia are dissatisfied with the old order, both political and religious. It is an awakening involving the reaction of Christianity upon the non-Christian religions.

GEORGE SHERWOOD EDDY.

"While it is true that India, with her iron-bound caste systems and her subtle philosophy presents the most difficult problem for Christianity in Asia, nevertheless that empire is becoming Christianized.

"During the last decade, the population has increased 2½ per cent. The Parsees have gained 4 per cent, the Jews 6 per cent, the Mohammedans 8 per cent, while the Protestant Christians increased 63 per cent—more than 20 times as fast as the population.

Fifty Millions Waiting.

"The great mass meetings of India are full of encouragement. More than 500,000 persons have been gathered in from the outcasts of India. Fifty million people more of this class are waiting at the doors of the church today for us to uplift them. The mass movement, however, is occurring not only among the outcasts but also among the middle class, the great backbone of India, and the higher classes.

"I saw converted Brahmans, converted Mohammedans, converted outcasts. Men from every province of India meet to organize a native missionary society, under native management, with native men, and supported by native money.

"Greater still is the effect of this awakening outside of the Christian church. It is resulting in a new ideal of life. The changeless life of contemplation is giving place to one of activity, to one of self-realization, of progress. There is a new national consciousness, a new patriotism sweeping over the country.

New Attitude Toward Women.

"There is a new demand for reform, a new attitude toward women. The old caste system is beginning to crack like the old temples that are crumbling.

"Recently there met together thirty Brahmans, thirty Mohammedans and thirty Christians to discuss the new national unity. They ate together. Five years ago it would have been impossible. It would have meant the loss of caste for the Brahmans. In addition, there is a new desire for education.

Church Must Awake.

"Best of all there is a new attitude toward religion. The Brahmans have taken over from us the ideas of the brotherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. They are making a new religion, a mixture of Christianity and Hindooism.

"Asia is awakening; from Japan to India, from Korea to Persia, and from China to Turkey, all Asia is awakening. More can be done toward carrying Christ to these people in the next five years than in the fifty years following. The church must seize the opportunity or pay dearly for its delay."

Who is able to save the East from a soulless civilization, and the West from a fruitless philosophy? "There is none other name given among men whereby we must be saved."

The Far East

Hon T. H. Yun, of Korea.
Formerly Vice-Minister of Education and Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs, and at Present President of Southern Methodist College at Sang-do, Korea.

"The East and the West are not and should not be contradictory but complementary. I come from a race whose watchword has been for the last twenty centuries: Backward Ho. The watchword of your race has been Westward Ho. The East thinks that the past was the best; that the present is bad enough, and that the future will be worse. Your sentiment is well expressed in the words of a Southern Methodist bishop: "Good days are gone; greater days are here; but the greatest days are to come."

PRINCE T. H. YUN.

In the East it is a youn man's ambition to be old. In the West it is an old man's ambition to be young. We of the East think and act as if we had an eternity to contemplate in instead of a generation in which to live. You of the West dress and eat and rush and hustle to catch the last train as it pulls out of the station.

An Oriental bride makes her dress at seventeen so it will be suitable for her at seventy. American women change the style and shape and seize of their hats at least seven times a week.

The East is the land of rest, of contemplation, of the simple life. The West is the land of action, of progress, of the spirit of life.

Can these ever be harmonized? We need badly to learn your push and pluck and action. May you not need the calmness and love of silence of the East to deepen and sweeten your inner life? The energy and aggressiveness of the West without the controlling constraint of love tends to materialism and brutality. The Oriental people are quicker to copy and remember maxims like "Might is right," than your broad and high Christian principles of justice and humanity which are the real greatness of Western civilization.

Buddhist Temples in America.

You may say you do not care for the Eastern contemplativeness, but what of the Buddhist temples even in America and Europe? What does the growth of Oriental philosophy in America mean?

Just as the growth of Western civilization without Christ will crush us in the East with materialism and brutality, so the Oriental philosophy of contemplation without Christ will crush you.

You give the East Christian civilization, and we will give back Christianized rest and Christ Jesus has made all one that He might reconcile the East and the West to God in one body by Christ.

The Development of a Medical Profession in the Far East

Dr. M. D. Eubank, of China.

There are no native medical schools in China. Any one can practice medicine that cares to. There is no knowledge of anatomy or physiology, pathology or any such thing. A few of the more intelligent native doctors know a little about materia medica and symptomology. The practice as I have seen it is quackery of the severest sort.

DR. M. D. EUBANK.

There are no such things as sanitary measures or laws in Chinese cities. There are no sewerage systems. Dogs, often covered with cancerous sores, run about the streets. There are no quarantines. Lepers beg from you in the public highways. Scarlet fever, small pox and other contagious diseases run at large.

The four enemies of health are to be found in great abundance—dampness, darkness, dirt and devils. Practically all of the homes in my district in China are damp; all of them are dark and dirty, and the majority of them, in the minds of the Chinese, have evil spirits of some sort lurking in them.

What has been done in China has been done by the medical missionary. Our institutions have been poorly equipped, but the medical missionaries have succeeded in changing the thought of the whole nation of China as to western medicine, and the whole nation is now ready to adopt western medicine in its national educational scheme.

Want Chain of Schools.

The recommendations made by the China Medical Association are two. First, with regard to literature, we are trying to put into the Chinese language medical knowledge. We have two men at work and need at least three more, with an annual budget of $6,000.

The second recommendation is medical schools at Canton, Peking, Chengtu, Hankow and Shanghai. These are to be Union Missionary Medical schools. In Peking a Union school with seventeen professors is now open. A start has been made in Shanghai and Hankow. Here is an opportunity to train the doctors of the new China, and Christian native doctors will be mighty factors in the evangelization of the empire.

Brotherhood

If I should see
A brother languishing in sore distress.
And I should turn and leave him comfortless
When I might be
A messenger of hope and happiness.
How could I ask to have what I denied
In my own hour of bitterness supplied?

If I might share
A brother's load along the dusty way.
And I should turn and walk alone that day.
How could I dare
When in the evening watch I kneel to pray
To ask for help to bear my pain and loss,
If I heeded not my brother's cross?

Our Readers' Opinions

Prof. Brown and "Baptizo"

Editors Christian Century:—A month or two ago, our good brother, DeMarchus C. Brown of Indianapolis, delivered himself through the columns of the Christian Century concerning baptizo. I wrote in answer thereto and asked some questions, but as Brother Brown has not seen fit to answer, I suppose he has had his say and I would like now to have my say. I quote again a sentence from his letter: "The greatest 'lexical authority,' Stephanus, gives a meaning of baptizo in the latter days of the Greek tongue (the period of the New Testament) as—tingo, to moisten, to wet; abluo, to wash off (by throwing water on the object washed); lavo, to wash."

There are several surprising things about the quotation.

First: It is surprising that so good a Greek scholar as Prof. Brown should call Stephanus the greatest lexical authority. He may have been a great lexical authority in his day, possibly the greatest in his day, but lexical authority, like all the rest of the world, has grown since his day. If Prof. Brown will go to his library and look carefully at the splendid seventh edition of Liddell and Scott, the exhaustive work of Prof. Sophocles of Harvard and the no less scholarly work of J. H. Thayer and several other such lexicons, I think he will reconsider his statement that Stephanus is the highest lexical authority.

Second: It is surprising that he should have given a definition in both Latin and English from Stephanus when that scholar only defined Greek terms by Latin words. As a matter of fact there are just three words in his definition used by Stephanus; the words "tingo," "abluo" and "lavo." All the rest of it is by Prof. Brown. I entirely acquit him of any intention to wilfully mislead, but I submit as a fact that nine-tenths of your readers have been misled by his statement.

Third: It is surprising that Prof. Brown could be hoodwinked with a worn out dodge of the affusionists that has been exploded and shattered fifty times in public discussions; viz., the translation of baptizo by a Latin word which has several meanings; one of which is the equivalent of baptizo and others of which are not its equivalent. Now, by translating baptizo into Latin by one of these meanings and then out of Latin into English by another of these meanings, it is easy to get almost anything you want out of it.

To illustrate the folly of such a procedure let us translate all the principal words of the Commission in the same way: viz., believe, baptize and save. The Greek word for believe is pisteuo, which can be defined properly by the Latin word committere, but committere has other meanings, one of which when translated into English is "to fight." Baptizo can be correctly translated by the dip meaning of tingo, but tingo has another meaning as Prof. Brown aptly says, which is "to wash." The Greek word soozoo which is translated "save" can be translated into Latin correctly by the word conservo, but conservo has another meaning which we can render into English by the word "preserve or pickle." Now, using this method on all three of these words, we have as a rendering of the Commission, instead of "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved;" "He that fights and is washed shall be pickled." Now, I know that your readers will say that this makes nonsense out of the Commission. Very true, but it is not my nonsense. It is the nonsense of the men who are trying to run a Greek word through the Latin language to get it to mean something in English which it does not mean and which no lexicographer makes it mean.

Now, I have dealt as fairly with the words pisteuo and soozoo as Prof. Brown has with baptizo.

I have written in this article more about baptizo than I have written or spoken in years. I believe the whole question has practically been settled. When people understand the design of baptism, they have no difficulty in understanding the method of its observance. When people make baptism a mere church ordinance or form, they have a difficulty in understanding the form, but if they understand that it was an ordinance given by Christ Jesus to forever set forth the fundamental facts of our redemption through His death, burial and resurrection, they have no difficulty in understanding what baptism is.

Very truly,
Columbus, Ind. Z. T. SWEENEY.

Formal and Informal Fellowship

Dear Brother Morrison—In the interesting and enlightening articles from your pen recently, and those contributed also, on the subject of baptism, an interesting phase seems to have been overlooked—a phase very important, if not the crux of the matter, as it appears to me—and that is the relation of baptism to church membership, or more specifically, the relation of immersion to formal fellowship.

I would like to see your treatment of this question, and the consideration of the illogical position pointed out in the able article of my good friend, Brother Boren. I thought of attempting it myself, but defer hoping to see your treatment.

As a brotherhood, we actually fellowship those who have not been immersed, as Christians, applying by our actions the argument of Paul concerning the Jew who is one inwardly, and not one by circumcision, when the fellowship is informal, but we reverse the logic of our actions, when we refuse to formally fellowship the unimmersed Christian, and will not formally receive him into our congregations. The statement often made that we have no right to formally fellowship the unimmersed, has little weight when we really do actually fellowship him informally. Let us be both right and consistent.

Very sincerely,
Colusa, Cal. J. K. BALLOU.

[The Christian Century will be glad to publish an article from Mr. Ballou's thought-provoking pen on this theme.—EDITORS.]

The Right Hand of Fellowship

Editors The Christian Century:—Thanks for the kind and frank treatment of my query, answered in last week's issue. I regret that I misconstrued your editorials last winter. The last part of my question was, it seems, not as clear as it should have been. Allow me to ask two final questions. (1) Would you advocate the reception of an unimmersed Congregationalist who presented credentials of fellowship from a church of that order, without requiring him to be immersed? (2) Would you advocate the reception of a Unitarian who presented credentials of fellowship from a church of that order without requiring him to make a confession of faith?

It may be that you do not care to give more space in your paper, and I do not ask it; so if you prefer, a personal reply will suffice as well. For this I enclose a stamped envelope.

Fraternally,
Lewistown, Ill. B. H. Cleaver.

(1.) Yes. Such a person is a Christian, a member of the church of Christ, already in the fellowship of all members of the church of Christ. Any congregation that denies him the fullest fellowship is a sectarian congregation, narrower in its basis of union than the Church of Christ.

(2.) No. But we would use some other word than "requiring." A true believer in Jesus Christ is always glad to make a confession of his faith.—Editors.

Things that Divide

Editors Christian Century: In The Christian Century's leading editorial, April 28, I find this: "There is no reason why a union should not be effected between a Congregational and a Disciple congregation as readily as between a Baptist and Disciple congregation if both Congregationalists and Disciples, feeling the exceeding wrongfulness of sectarian division and a sincere desire to promote unity would simply refrain from practicing those things that divide."

Is immersion one of the things that divides and that Disciples should "refrain from practicing" for the sake of union?

St. Petersburg, Fla. E. L. FRAZIER.

[Mr. Frazier's query quite takes out of us all our editorial conceit. We know him as a very painstaking reader of the Christian Century, especially of all articles having to do with baptism. For months we have been trying to say in the most unequivocal, unadorned anglo-saxon at our command that the practice of immersion baptism by all churches is indispensable to Christian union. The practice of sprinkling for baptism is a divisive practice. The way to union does not lie in the direction of an optional procedure in the practice of three forms about which consciences are divided, but in the direction of the practice of the one form upon which all consciences are already agreed. Immersion does not divide; it unites. Affusion divides; and all who pray for union should themselves cease and plead with their brethren to cease the practice of those things that divide.—EDITORS.]

What Baptism Certainly Is For

In your issue of April 21, Brother Frank A. Wight gives some excellent thoughts as to what baptism is?

An emblem of authority of Him who said "all authority in heaven and earth is given unto me" is forceful. The illustration of our stars and stripes awakens a spirit of loyalty in the heart of every true American citizen.

I was so delighted with Brother Wight's paper, that I was surprised at the criticism of the editors, but I am not prepared to say they have no case. On reflection, I think all can be reconciled by putting emphasis on the Lordship of Jesus. Peter declared on the day of Pentecost, that Jesus was both Lord and Christ. Christ stands for anointing and Lord for reigning.

If baptism is the flag, it is related to reigning. Christ is related to anointing, and all saved people have received this. In order to receive the anointing, the sinner must come to the Christ, which he does in faith and repentance. That changes the heart, and prepares it to receive the anointing. Now, he is ready to come under the flag, baptism. This view makes baptism the act of accepting the Lordship of Jesus, who is both Lord and Christ. Acts 2-36.

Baptism thus seen, is related to the union of Christians, which union looks to the conquest of the world. J. H. MCCOLLOUGH.

A SERIAL STORY

Donald Graeme

Copyright, 1910, by J. C. Kilner

By M. A. FULTON

CHAPTER ONE.

"Yer Name's Graeme, Not Graham, Lassie."

"Mr. Sinclair, as I'm a leevin' man! Whar did ye come frae? Heaven itself maybe?"

"From heaven to Brigend, Mr. Graeme,—a far cry."

"Hit na sae hard, Mr. Sinclair, seein' a place is what the meenister makes it."

"What the merchant makes it, you mean, Mr. Graeme. Experience teaches me that an honest merchant preaches more effectively than the minister, the average minister at any rate."

"Ye'll hae the upper han' o' me, Mr. Sinclair, do what I can. But tell me, whar did the thing that tears by like the whirlwind set ye doon? Is't ony wonder I'd think of heaven when I set eyes on ye the noo? Ten days syne I saw ye swish by on a chariot that wasna' like Elijah the Lishvite's, for it had nae horses, but lash me, what it hadna in prancin' it had in roarin'."

"You would forget the noise, Mr. Graeme, so soon as you would begin to realize that you were shooting through the caller air like a swallow heading for regions of perpetual spring. But why are we standing here in the shop, while I am longing to tell Mrs. Graeme of my holiday!"

"Come awa hen, the tea's just brewin'."

"And I am hungry as a hawk."

"'Lizabeth, 'Lizabeth," shouted Mr. Graeme, as he led the way out of his spacious shop into a wide, beautiful hall. "Here's Mr. Sinclair. He went awa, ye ken, in a whirlwind more than a week syne. Noo he has suddenly appeared safe an' soun' in Dauvid Graeme's shop, walkin' in like an ordinary man on twa plain feet." He finished the sentence with one hand on the door handle, the other stretched backwards towards Mr. Sinclair, who stood a moment laughingly regarding his old friend's beaming, humorous, strong, Scotch face.

"Verra plain aboot the feet," replied Mr. Sinclair, as he entered the room. Then with a sudden straightening of his tall, lithe form, he gravely exclaimed:

"Oh, I beg your pardon, Mr. Graeme. I thought you were alone." There was an instant jingling of teaspoons and moving of chairs.

"I'm real glad to see you, Mr. Sinclair. No friend more welcome in this house than you." He had no time to reply. A tall, slim figure in white muslin rose from the table and came quickly towards him.

"You do not wish mother was alone I hope, Mr. Sinclair." The words were simply spoken, and the soul which looked out of clear, blue eyes, was frankness itself. For one instant the minister's face became radiant with the light of a great joy.

"Jeanie," he exclaimed, and held out both hands to her. She placed both hers in them, and if the roses deepened on her fair young cheeks, there was only the gladness of child-like trust on her sweet expressive face.

"When did you come?" he said, and he was his usual calm self the next moment.

"The day after you flew away." She laughed.

"Oh, if I had known! The motor-car is grand, but the organ—under the touch of a member of the royal academy of music—is divine. I congratulate you, Jeanie, from my heart."

"I owe you all thanks and gratitude, Mr. Sinclair, for first lessons, and also for inducing father to send me to Herr Smidt."

"I congratulate you, too, Mrs. Graeme," he said, as he warmly shook the hand she had been holding out to him all the while he was greeting her daughter. Mrs. Graeme's kind, motherly face, framed in soft wreaths of shining snow-white hair, beamed with perfect satisfaction as she replied:

"Indeed, Mr. Sinclair, as Jeanie says, whatever measure of success she may have gained is all owing to the pains you took with her lessons years ago. But excuse me. This is my stepsister's son, Archie Monteith. He's just come down for the week end. It was with his mother Jeanie stayed, you know, in Glasgow.

"Mr. Monteith, I am much pleased to meet you." Mr. Sinclair held out his hand affably, and Mr. Monteith deigned to touch the offered hand lightly, bowing at the same time with his grandest attempt at courtesy.

"I am delighted to meet you, sir! Indeed, I may say I have known you for a long time, through my cousin." He shot a quick glance towards Jeanie, who reddened visibly. James Douglas noticed it, from the opposite side of the table. He had also noted Archie Monteith's suddenly darkened countenance as Mr. Sinclair's face had lit up, for one moment's space, at sight of Jeanie Graeme. Mr. Sinclair seemed not to hear Mr. Monteith's allusion to his cousin, but turning toward Donald Graeme, he greeted him kindly, and, nodding smilingly to James Douglas across the table, he said brightly,

"You and I can grip hands in imagination, James, though the table were twice as broad."

"Aye, though the round world lay between, sir."

"You ought to have been a courtier, James."

"An' that's just what he is, Mr. Sinclair, an' the man who does not think enough o' himself to be courteous on all occasions, needna expect to be a successfu' merchant. Dauvid Graeme kens what he is saying."

"You've said many a true thing in your time, Mr. Graeme, but never a truer expression have you uttered. Indeed, I know of no situation in which one may be placed where courtesy is not the best policy, to use no higher term, except when motoring." There was a merry twinkle in his fine dark eyes as he uttered the last words.

"There's nae time for commonplaces, wi' yon thing. It's easy enough tae onderstan' a' that. But it's no sich an easy matter for the ould wives wha happen tae live by the highroad side, tae hae their nerves set aloupin' twenty times a day, wi' screechin' weans, swearin' husbands, skraighni' hens an' maybe pieces o' dead ducks markin' the place where the fleein' deevil had passed before ever there was time even tae wag a besom at it." There was great merriment over Mr. Graeme's description of motoring, and it was with a very bright face that Mr. Sinclair resumed:

"Well, Mr. Graeme, I am glad to say that my brother and self were more fortunate than your picture represents motoring in general. Even the ducks escaped our chariot wheels. But this much credit I will take to myself: I set my face dead against scorching. I told my big brother plainly that if he did not run in moderation my holiday would be simply lost, and it was chiefly to get a good sight of my native country I was with him at all. And friends, I may tell you in a few words, If you want to be young, and happy, and free from care, take to motoring."

"When will your brother come again, Mr. Sinclair?" inquired Jeanie, with assumed eagerness.

"You shall hear of it in due time, Jeanie, never fear. But we must watch that he does not whisk you off to Edinburgh with him. He was always masterful, my brother Robert."

"Indeed, Mr. Sinclair, an' oor Jeanie's just as masterfu', an' she'll never set fit in a motor-car wi' my will. The next thing wad be, get her one for hersel. I want nae new-fangled things aboot me, Mr. Sinclair. Neither the kirk nor the state are daein' sae weel wi' them, that honest folks may want them. Did I ever tell ye what Jeanie wanted to dae, more than a year syne,—change her name, nae less."

He paused; everyone looked at Jeanie, who blushed crimson. Then he continued slowly: "A letter came to the mither, one fu' o' dutiful expressions an' real well worded, I'll allow, but it was signed, 'Your loving dochter, Jeanie Gra-ham.' Ye ken the auld name o' her forefathers was'na fine enough. I took a post-card an' wrote for a' the world tae see—'Yer name's Graeme, not Gra-ham, Lassie.' She jist sent me a card by return sayin', 'My name won't always be Graeme, I hope.' That's a masterfu' lassie for ye." Jeanie joined merrily in the laugh against herself.

Mrs. Graeme here reminded Mr. Sinclair that he was not doing justice to the good things set before him, but promised him a quarter of an hour extra for lost time.

"Thank you kindly for the offer, Mrs. Graeme," he replied, "and I will endeavor to use your clemency without abusing it."

"And Cousin Jeanie will butter your bread for you, Mr. Sinclair,' said Archie Monteith.

"With pleasure," said Jeanie, suiting the action to the word.

"Tell me when to stop then, Jeanie. How do you like Brigend, Mr. Monteith? Is this your first visit?"

"My first since I was a wee laddie in kilts. but it will be often enough in future, Mr. Sinclair. I'm going to get a motor-car. How will that do, Jeanie?" James Dougals rose suddenly to his feet.

"Please excuse me, Mrs. Graeme. I must return to the shop."

"Certainly, James." "Ah," muttered the young foreman and manager of Mr. Graeme's extensive business establishment, as he strode rapidly through the fine hall towards the side door leading into the business quarters, "Mr. Archie, if I'm no' mista'en,' the de'il's in yer twa e'en. But ye needna come here tae steal oor white dove. I may never win her mysel'. If not, may heaven send her a better."

A few moments after he was busy over orders and parcels, his whole heart seemingly in his work, as if the chief thing in life was for him to advance in every lawful way, the interests of his employer. Presently Archie Monteith followed him into the shop. A little while he stood watching the deft fingers of the young foreman as he hurriedly put up a large order for a customer. James was perfectly conscious of the scrutiny bestowed upon him by this city man who took upon himself so many fine airs, but he gave no sign that he took heed to his presence, till he addressed him by name. "Could I have writing materials, James? I want to send a letter by next mail." "Certainly, Mr. Monteith, the key is in the Master's office door. You will find everything you need on the desk inside."

Meanwhile old Mr. Graeme had flung business cares aside, as he usually did when in Mr. Sinclair's presence. It was quite true that among his brother elders, Mr. Graeme would many a time wag his bald head sagely and sorrowfully, while he exclaimed, "Oor meenister's a saintly man, freends; a saintly

To a Little Friend

Kathryn Babcock.

Dear little maiden with eyes of blue,
And soft, curling hair of golden hue:
Merry and happy and romping all day,
Little feet never grow weary of play.

Out gath'ring flowers on a bright, sunny day,
Running to Grandma's just over the way,
Loving your dollie and doggie, too,
Busy and happy all the day through.

Asking me questions about all in sight,
Talking to "Lady Moon" up in the sky,
And how mamma and baby, sweet,
Are going to heaven by and by.

Dear little maiden, in life's busy day,
When you no longer find pleasure in play,
When life's busy cares engross your thought
In darkness or in light.

May you ever look toward the heavenly realm,
Always choosing the good and the right;
God's richest blessings abide with you,
Dear little daughter with eyes of blue.

Dulcie's Disobedience

The red roses nodded to the honeysuckle across Dulcie's window, while in the garden below the sun played hide-and-seek with the leaves of the copper beech and threw little dancing shadows across the closely-cut lawn. The thrushes were singing in the red May tree by the gate, and Marjorie's doves, in their white wicker cage in the summer-house, were cooing and bowing to each other as if they had only just been introduced.

By-and-by the sun got tired of its play with the leaves, and crept round to Dulcie's window, and looked in to see if it could wake her up. Softly it peeped under the half-closed blind and shone straight into her face as she lay fast asleep. Suddenly she stirred and sat up all in a hurry.

"Why, it's bright sunshine, and no one has been to wake me up! How stupid of Marshall to forget." And then she turned and looked at the little clock on her mantle-piece. "Half-past twelve! Why, its stopped. I wonder if it's very late." As she jumped out of bed and into her bath, when the stable clock chimed five o'clock. "Only five! Well, it's no good going to bed again. I shall make Marjorie go out for a walk."

And the next minute Marjorie who slept next door (she was just a year younger than Dulcie, who was thirteen), thought that she must be in an earthquake, so violently was she being shaken by the shoulder.

"Is it so late?"

"No, it's only five; but that is what makes it so lovely, because we can go for a walk and get the ferns for Uncle Archie's fernery."

"Lovely! I will be dressed before you, only we must be quiet, or those nursery children will hear us and want to come too."

Twenty minutes later they were crossing the garden with baskets and trowels, giving little skips of delight as being up and out before any one in the rose-covered square gray house behind them was awake. As they passed the stable to get out by the gate that led to the woods, the dogs heard their steps and began to yap with delight at the prospect of a walk at such a delightfully early hour.

"Listen to the dear things! How they will love to go with us."

Dulcie opened the stable-yard door as she spoke, but Marjorie hung back.

"Father told us on Monday that we were not to take the dogs out till be said we might."

"Oh, that was only meant for the nursery children, who can't keep them in order."

"But he told us all at once."

"Very likely; but I am quite different. I am so much older."

Dulcie, who had had a birthday two weeks ago, felt she was grown up now that she was thirteen. She bent down to unchain The Major, who was dancing up and down in front of his kennel with delight.

"You can unloose Pat, Margie."

"I don't think we ought to take either of them. Father won't like it after what he said."

"Very well, then, I will, if you are so fussy," and she unchained Pat and called the dogs to heel as they danced about wild with delight; while Marjorie, who knew of old that opposition always made Dulcie worse, followed them into the lane.

"Look how good they are," Dulcie said, as they got over the stile into the wood. "I heard a rabbit just now, and The Major didn't even turn his head."

But all the same Dulcie knew quite well that the dogs ought to have stayed behind, only she always liked her own way and never thought that she could be in the wrong by any chance.

The best ferns grew on the bank close to the stream, and the dogs lay down while the baskets were being filled, Dulcie keeping an eye on them as she dug up her roots. The baskets were soon overful, and they turned to go home.

"Come along, dogs." But The Major, who came up wagging his tail, was the only one to respond.

"Where is Pat? He was here this minute. Where are you, naughty dog?" But calls and whistles were in vain.

"He must have gone down to the pond," said Dulcie.

But there wasn't a sign of him, and then, as they called and whistled, The Major pricked up his ears and started off at a sharp run down a side path, taking no notice whatever of Dulcie's calls to return, and in a minute was out of sight in the bracken.

"I knew what it would be if we brought them." Marjorie's voice sounded very near to tears.

"As if anything could happen! They must be quite close! Of course, they have gone to the farm."

But the farmer said he hadn't seen them anywhere; se there was nothing for it but to go home, hoping for the best.

"What is all that noise at the keeper's cottage?"

Marjorie stood still and listened as they came close to the stile.

"Oh, it's only Staniford calling the young pheasants to be fed; he always makes a horrid noise. Come on; I want to do my French exercise before breakfast."

scurry of feet was heard, and The Major came panting up behind them. He looked very excited and frightened, and much ashamed of himself, and slunk into his kennel as soon as he had been chained up and scolded; but Pat was nowhere to be seen, and The Major seemed indifferent on the subject when Dulcie sharply asked what he had done with his companion. She had to go indoors, putting aside the thought of Pat's possible misdeeds with the comforting assurance that he must be all right. As they were just starting lessons in the school-room, father walked in, looking very grave.

"Who let the dogs out this morning, after my express orders that they should be kept chained up?"

There was a moment's silence, and then Dulcie stood up in her seat.

"I took them for a walk, father. Marjorie didn't want to, so I unchained them both. I thought, of course, that you only meant that the nursery children were not to take them out. But they came in all right—at least, The Major did."

"Really, Dulcie, at your age I thought you would have known better. When I give an order I mean it to be carried out. You are not like Car and Gerald. You are always too sure that you, at least, can never do wrong. And now I hope that your disobedience will teach you a lesson, though I fear it will be a sad one. I was afraid the dogs had been chasing the baby pheasants, and ordered them to be chained up, unless I took them out on a leash. And now Pat and The Major have been up at the keeper's cottage, and between them they have killed two dozen little birds and injured many more. Pat got caught in a rat trap as he was chased off, and was so hurt that he has had to be shot, poor dog, and The Major is to go this afternoon to your aunt in Edinburgh so as to be out of all temptation for the future."

Dulcie hung her head and her eyes filled with tears.

"Oh, father, I never thought they would run away when I took them out."

"No, I don't suppose you did, my dear, but it would not have happened if you had simply obeyed me from the first and not thought that you knew better than other people. I don't give orders without a reason for them. You can show how sorry you are, Dulcie, by obeying without any questioning next time."

And father went off and shut the school-room door behind him. Lessons were not a success that morning. Pat had been a favorite with them all, and just before lunch there came a knock at the door of father's den, and Dulcie, with very red eyes, came up to his table and laid her money-box on it.

"Please, father, will you take all that is in it—and I have a good deal, I know—to pay for the baby pheasants that the dogs killed. And I will try to be more obedient."

And as father kissed her she knew she was forgiven, but it was a long time before she felt she was trusted; but I don't think that the lesson was ever forgotten.—Flor-

The Daily Altar

An Aid to Private Devotion and Family Worship

SUNDAY, MAY 15.

Theme for the Day.—The Nearness of God.

Scripture.—That they should seek God, if haply they might feel after him and find him, though he is not far from each one of us; for in him we live and move and have our being.—Acts 17:27, 28.

Speak to Him thou, for He hears, and Spirit with spirit can meet—
Closer is he than breathing, and nearer than hands and feet.
—Tennyson ("Higher Pantheism.")

Prayer.—O God, our Father, we have found Thee in the order of nature and in the workings of history. But we have not known Thee as we should in our own lives. Yet Thou art not far from us, and it is our own mistake when we work for even a single day without Thy gracious companionship. Aid us, we beseech Thee, to make real to ourselves Thy presence and Thy help. May no cloud obscure Thy face, but may the light of Thy glory guide us all our way of life. Make this day one of joy and growth to us, and may the evening find us nearer the goal to which we take our way. For Christ's sake. Amen.

MONDAY, MAY 16.

Theme for the Day.—The Sun's Glory.

Scripture.—And God made the two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night.—Gen. 1:16.

In them hath he set a tabernacle for the sun, which is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, and rejoiceth as a strong man to run his course. His going forth is from the end of the heavens, and his circuit unto the ends of it; and there is nothing hid from the heat thereof.—Psa. 19:4-6.

Sometimes walking, not unseen,
By hedge-row elms, on hillocks green,
Right against the eastern gate,
Where the great sun begins his state,
Robed in flames and amber light,
The clouds in thousand liveries light.
—John Milton ("L'Allegro.")

Prayer.—O Lord, who hast set Thy glory in the heavens, and caused light to shine out of darkness, shine in our hearts we pray Thee, with the true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world. May the Sun of Righteousness arise upon us with healing in his beams. We want to carry into this week's work the sense of Thy nearness and love. Send out Thy light and Thy truth; let them lead us and bring us to Thy holy hill. For Christ's sake. Amen.

TUESDAY, MAY 17.

Theme for the Day.—Be Strong.

Scripture.—They that stumbled are girded with strength.—I. Sam. 2:4.

The God that girdeth us with strength, and maketh my way perfect.—Psa. 18:32.

Be strong.
Say not the days are evil—who's to blame?
And fold the hands and acquiesce—O shame!
Stand up, speak out, and bravely, in God's name.
Be strong.

Prayer.—Onr Father, we are often weak and cowardly when there is no cause for fear. We have too little of the courageous spirit of our Master, who met every duty and every danger in the strength of perfect trust in God. Save us from our weakness and distrust of Thee, gird us with something of Thine own power. Open ways of service to us, and give us the joy of Thine own untiring work. Convince us, by Thy Word and Thine indwelling Spirit, that we can do whatsoever needs to be done. At last may we come to Thee, where service and reward are perfect, in the life beyond. Amen.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 18.

Theme for the Day.—The Man of Sincerity.

Scripture.—Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the wicked, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of scoffers; but his delight is in the law of Jehovah and on his law doth he meditate day and night.—Psa. 1:1, 2.

How happy is he born and taught
That serveth not another's will;
Whose armor is his honest thought,
And simple truth his utmost skill.
—Sir Henry Wotton ("The Character of a Happy Life.")

Prayer.—God of love and mercy, passing all our understanding, grant us, we beseech Thee, faithfully to love Thee, and to walk in the way of Thy righteousness. Thou art the protector of all who trust in Thee. We would learn a new strength daily from the knowledge of Thy favor to us. We would forget alike our past successes and failures in the contemplation of Thy perfection and the assurance of Thine aid. Make us kind and useful to our family, our friends and our associates all through this day. We ask in Jesus name. Amen.

THURSDAY, MAY 19.

Theme for the Day.—"They Forsook Him."

Scripture.—And straightway, while he yet spake, cometh Judas, one of the twelve, and with him a multitude with swords and staves, from the chief priests and the scribes and the elders.—And they all left him, and fled.—Mark 14:43-50.

Forsake the Christ thou sawest transfigured,
Him
Who trod the sea and brought the dead to life?
What should wring this from thee—ye laugh
and ask,
What wrung it? even a torchlight and a noise,
The sudden Roman faces, violent hands,
And fear of what the Jews might do! Just that,
And it is written, "I forsook and fled."
—Browning ("A death in the Desert.")

Prayer.—Our Father, we read with shame the story of our Lord's betrayal, and the flight of the disciples. Help us to look within ,and there learn whether we have not betrayed and forsaken him too often, and with less excuse. Forgive us such defects and defeats. May we prove more worthy of him who loved us and gave himself for us. And may our word and example aid some one else, who may be on the point of leaving Christ forever. We ask in his name. Amen.

FRIDAY, MAY 20.

Theme for the Day.—Dissimulation.

Scripture.—For Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light.—II. Cor. 1:14.

When devils will their blackest sins put on
They do suggest at first with heavenly shows.

Prayer.—Dear Father, we confess our unworthiness before Thee. In word and deed we come short of Thy glory and Thy will. We have sinned, and tried to cloak our sin with false show of good. Thou art of too pure eye to behold iniquity, and canst not look upon sin. Reprove us, but in mercy. Rebuke us, but not in wrath. We cannot endure Thy displeasure, and we plead the love of Christ to us as our only claim upon Thy regard. Yet Thou lovest us, and will save us for Thy name's sake, and so we commit our souls to Thee in confidence. Amen.

SATURDAY, MAY 21.

Theme for the Day.—Memories.

Scripture.—I call to remembrance my song in the night: I commune with mine own heart; and my spirit maketh diligent search.—Psa 77:6.

Music, when soft voices die,
Vibrates in the memory;
Odors, when sweet violets sicken,
Live within the sense they quicken.

Rose leaves. when the rose is dead,
Are heapt for the beloved bed;
And so thy thoughts when thou art gone,
Love itself shall slumber on.
—Shelley ("Music When Soft Voices Die.")

Prayer.—Our loving Father, our love for Thee is stirred at every remembrance of Thy mercy. Days without number Thou hast befriended us. When we were without strength, Christ gave himself for us. All our years Thou hast made bright with Thy mercy. Such memories, like music, comfort our hearts and make us more confident that in the future also Thou wilt not forget us, and may all the sweet memories of other days draw us nearer to Thee. Amen.

The Eternal Sabbath

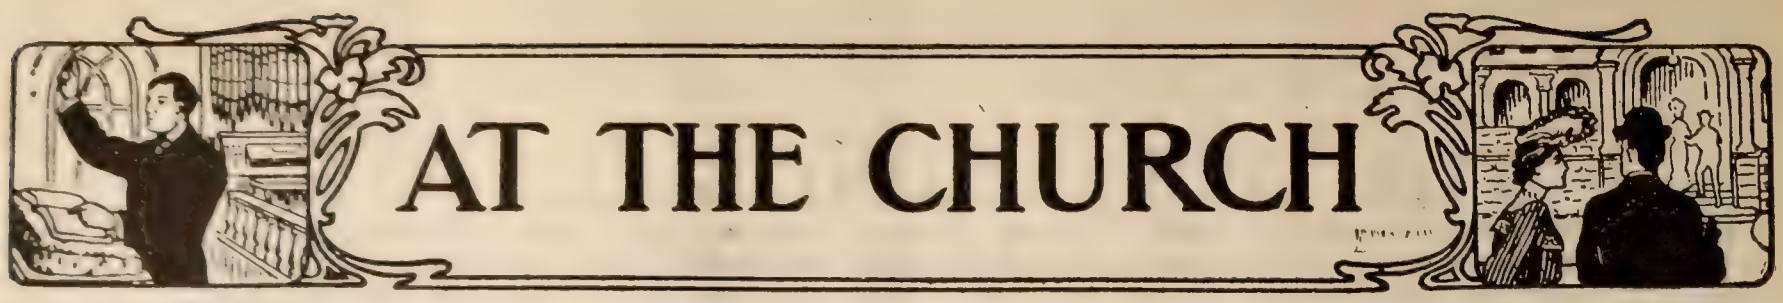
Stephen G. Bullfinch.

Hail to the Sabbath day!
The day divinely given,
When men to God their homage pay,
And earth draws near to heaven.

Lord, in this sacred hour,
Within thy courts we bend,
And bless thy love, and own thy power,
Our Father and our Friend.

But thou art not alone
In courts by mortals trod;
Nor only is the day thine own
When man draws near to God.

Thy temple is the arch
Of yon unmeasured sky;
Thy Sabbath, the stupendous march
Of vast eternity.



Lord, may that holier day
Dawn on thy servants' sight;
And purer worship may we pay
In heaven's unclouded light!

Sunday School Lesson

By Professor Willett

The First Martyr*

It will be noticed that though almost the entire material of the first half of the Gospel of Matthew has been included in the lessons of the year thus far, Chapter 13 is omitted in the interval between the present lesson and the last. This is evidently for the purpose of introducing the teachings of Jesus in a fairly consecutive manner further on in our studies. At the present time we pass from the proofs that the sentiment of the rulers toward Jesus was growing more hostile to another event which, while not so significant as the ministry of our Lord, threw a shadow across his soul by removing forever from his side the great friend who had opened the door for his appearance.

Herod Antipas was the son of Herod the Great, and was known as the Tetrarch because about one-fourth of his father's dominions fell to his control. He shared the qualities of his hard, unscrupulous and merciless family, though he was never so cruel as his father. Sometime before he had imprisoned John the Baptist, and a little later had put him to death as the result of a trick by which he was forced into this unpleasant act. Later on, when the reports of Jesus' work reached him, they were so much like the stories told of John's activities that he confused the two men. From the standpoint of a mere political intriguer, fighting a diplomatic battle for his kingdom with his Roman masters, the incidents connected with the work of John and of Jesus were trivial and easily confused. He fell, therefore, into this natural error of confounding the ministry of Jesus with that of his great forerunner. Some such report of Herod's comments reached the disciples of Jesus, and it is the reflection of the Evangelist upon this whisper from the court of Herod that brings up at this point the tragic story of the death of John.

Why Was John Imprisoned?

It is not easy to determine the reason why Herod thought it necessary to imprison the great preacher of the desert. The narrative of Matthew would imply that it was through anger at John's straightforward denunciation of his act in marrying his brother Philip's wife. There would perhaps be sufficient cause in this public rebuke of a proud, insolent sovereign by an untitled and obscure preacher. The First Gospel implies that nothing but Herod's fear of the people restrained him from putting John to death. But the Second Gospel throws a different light upon the situation. It describes the wrath of Herodias against John for his plain, blunt words regarding her relations with Herod, and says that it was her purpose to kill the prophet. But she could not, for Herod, who feared and respected him, kept him safe. Further than this it adds significantly that Herod was much perplexed by his plain speech, that he heard him gladly, and some of the old texts add that "he did many things." If this narrative be followed it seems to prove that John was imprisoned less because of Herod's resentment than because of what the unscrupulous woman with whom he lived might do to satisfy her hatred against the prophet whom he respected.

Hope of Release.

In this condition of imprisonment in the fortress of Machaerus, east of the Jordan, where Herod was accustomed to live during the summer months, John passed the unhappy days of his captivity. It must have been a sore affliction to so ardent and impetuous a nature as his to be thus shut away from all the activties to which he was accustomed, and in which the fiery passion of his nature found expression. He was permitted the companionship of the disciples, who visited him from time to time with reports regarding the work of Jesus. This freedom of conference with his friends further proves Herod's friendly attitude toward him. But at the very best the days must have hung heavy, and John looked eagerly forward to release and return to his accustomed work. Sometimes he was sorely perplexed at the reports that reached him from Jesus. It seemed to him that the Nazarene was all too mild in his attitude toward the giant wrongs that had deeply stirred his own soul. Perhaps the reassuring message sent to him by Jesus helped to quiet his restless spirit and bring him adjustment to the hard limitations of his lot. We may believe that it was no purpose of the king's to add in any manner to John's afflictions by needless hardships or privations. But the mere fact of being shut away from the work he loved was enough. Thus he waited from day to day the time of release.

The Dance of Death.

Then swiftly and without a word of warning came the end. The king's birthday festival must have brought unusual activity and merriment to the old castle. Perhaps the prisoner in the dungeons heard something of the noise of preparation and the confusion of revelry in the chambers above his head. But how little he knew of its signficance for him! It was only when the gloom of his prison was invaded by the glare of torches and he was summoned from the usual loneliness of his life to a terrible and instant death that the sinister meaning of the day broke upon him. Who knows whether he was even told the reason for this assassination? The scene of his swift death has often been described by writers and drawn by artists, but no man of them all knows aught of the real facts regarding John's last moments. Swiftly he had come, like Elijah of old, and swiftly like Elijah he went back to God in the fiery chariot of martyrdom.

Of the woman, Salome, the daughter of Herodias, whose requestion brought humiliation to Herod and death to John, we know nothing save what a few lines of Josephus have preserved of her story. She was married successively to two members of the Herodian family. There is not the slightest basis for that absurd story embodied in a modern work of art that she fell in love with John the Baptist in the dungeons of the castle, and resenting his rejection of her advances, demanded his death in a moment of furious anger. So far as we know she never saw John, and was but the willing tool of her mother's desire for vengeance on a bold and stern reprover of wrong.

The Sad News.

It was melancholy tidings that came to the disciples of John from the first of their company who came to see the prophet after this event. They came and bestowed his remains in some burial place near by, and then came to Jesus to bring the news of the tragedy. It must have touched the heart of our Master with its solemn pathos. It was the first martyrdom that had fallen upon the company of the friends of Jesus. It was the earliest dropping of that grain of precious seed from which later abundant harvests were to spring; for as Tertullian has said, "The blood of the martyr is the seed of the church."

Christian Endeavor Lesson

By W. D. Endres

Topic, May 27. What Is It to be a Christian? Acts 26:24-29.

It is well that we should stop frequently and make just such an examination as this subject imposes. We all need it for our own sakes. This is more especially true of us who are younger. We are young, our lives are before us, we are Christians too, what does it mean, and what should it mean to our lives?

It means more than conformity to the ceremony necessary to join the church. We are all more or less in danger here. When the life is young the heart tender and the response to a sympathetic appeal all but natural, joining the church, is rather an easy thing to do. Indeed if this be at the time of a protracted meeting, when this appeal is strongest, when many, some of whom are our companions, are responding and where this public commitment seems to be the principal thing necessary in the process of becoming a Christian, it is small wonder that we unconsciously assume that by this overt act we can become Christians and have the matter over.

You must grant that this is not overdrawn when you observe the great army of nominal Christians both old and young whose attendance at church and sense of Christian obligation finds such a small place in the program of their lives. But if you were to ask most any of these if they are Christian they would answer affirmitively without hesihesitation. The pathetic thing about all this is the self-deception of those whom we thus describe. Not that this, the formal side of Christianity, is not important and necessary but that it should be made the entire consideration of the Christian obligation is the warning for us.

Being a Christian means to do and be all this and more. It means the dedication of the life to the pursuit of certain life-ideals, the realization of which is ever sought in the individuals' life.

With this ultimate purpose in view then his life program is made out to this, all things both great and small which he does contribute. The selection of his calling, the this ultimate life-ideal and the zealousness preparation of himself for the work of that calling, the co-ordination of that calling with and care with which the work of life is pursued, must all be determined according as they have bearing upon this ulterior purpose—the establishment of the kingdom—righteousness—rightness—in his personal life and in the relations which he bears with his neighbor.

This great ideal of rightness which for purpose of thought we may break up into justice and mercy, service and love, follow us everywhere. No man who has committed his life to these great standards can maintain the integrity of his own soul if he does not carry to his daily task conscious scruples as to their faithful discharge. For the same reason he will not engage in any bit of conduct whether in business or in play which will militate against the realization of them either in his own life or the lives of others. Such are the heart searchings of the teachings of Jesus and such are the Christian obligations upon all who wear the name.

Last of the Laymen's Conventions

Great Rally in Chicago—Damp Weather But Warm Enthusia sm—Able Addresses and Good Resolutions

The final rally of the greatest extension propaganda in the history of the Protestant church, the Laymen's Missionary Movement, began with a meeting at Orchestra Hall, Chicago, April 29, and continued three days, the final meeting being held Monday evening. This was the last of a great series of meetings which have been held in seventy-five of the leading cities of the United States. Almost without exception these meetings have been marked by a very large attendance, deep earnestness and unbounded enthusiasm. Never before in the history of the world has there been anything to equal it. There is something about it suggestive of the ancient crusades to rescue the Holy Land, but this movement is characterized by wisdom and good sense, while they were not.

The first meeting of this convention was attended by almost 2,000 delegates. The opening address was made by Bishop Charles P. Anderson, of the Episcopal Church.

The Church Awakens.

"This is the movement that we have looked for for years," he declared. "It looks as though the great power of the Protestant church, dormant for so long, is about to reassert itself with new vigor. The significance in the laymen's missionary movement lies in its return to religious sanity, the placing of religion where it belongs, in the first rank of our social life."

Mr. J. Campbell White, of New York, secretary of the movement, discussed its financial phases, and incidentally scored Chicago for contributing only seventy-eight cents for each church member in the city, for evangelizing 60,000,000 people.

Rev. W. R. Hotchkiss, fourteen years a missionary in Africa, gave a vivid account of the work in the Dark Continent. "Where I swam and traveled on foot," Mr. Hotchkiss said, "former President Roosevelt rode on the railroad train. This is only an illustration of the religious and moral transformation of a people who are the laziest people on the face of the earth."

A Survey of the World.

The Saturday morning meeting was devoted to a survey of the world as a missionary field. Dr. J. P. McNaughton, of Turkey, told of conditions in that country, "the battlefield of the world," lying between the Orient and the Occident. His account of the recent awakening there, and the marvelous revolution that has taken place, largely through the work of the missionaries, was interesting in the extreme.

Great Work in Japan.

Dr. J. L. Dearing declared that the Japanese have been made the subject of more adverse criticism than any other nation on earth.

"On the contrary," he said, "the Japanese possess more qualities that make for success and prosperity as a national power than is generally conceded. Most of the statements made against them are gross misrepresentations. Japan has as many Christian people today, after fifty years of contact with Christianity, as there were in the whole world 100 years after the beginning of the Christian era," he continued.

"Everything is favorable. Our work in Japan is vastly important because of the universal respect in which she is held by other Oriental countries on account of her being the first to conquer a Western nation."

Marvelous Doings in Korea.

Rev. George Heber Jones, of Korea, told of the marvelous work that has been accomplished in Korea already. Since the work began twenty-five years ago, the conversions have averaged one an hour. The Bible is the best selling book in that country, and is approved as a text-book by the government. With the right effort Korea can be Christianized within the next twenty years.

"The Koreans are fighting their own cross in a wonderful way," said Rev. W. N. Blair. "When I went there eight years ago the field was desolate. The battle between Japan and China scattered the missionaries, centered at Ping Yang, far and wide, and each created a mission of culture in the new territory. Today there are 240,000 Christians in Korea. More than 800,000 copies of the gospel are in the land. Ping Yang has a college where 500 natives are studying for the ministry. In my five counties we have forty churches, twenty-six day schools and 4,000 Christians. The inhabitants gather about the foreigners just as we would at a circus. Why, the last time I was there 300 women filled the church while 400 men sat under a canopy outside. I stood in a window between them and preached."

Praises the Chinese.

Rev. Arthur M. Sherman, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, said that the middle and upper classes of China are equal in intelligence and business ability to any other in the world. The Chinese boys in his school of 500 lads were so eager to learn that a notice had to be posted that no boy should be allowed to study before the hour of 6:30 in the morning.

"The doors have been opened everywhere," continued Dr. Sherman, "for the invasion of American ideas. The war with Japan was a timely rebuff to the intense pride of the Chinese. The past nine years have witnessed a marvelous change. The telegraph is everywhere, railroads are being rapidly built, and newspapers are found in every part of the country. A great victory for Christianity is the appointment of a devout Christian as a member of the board of foreign affairs, one of the highest positions of influence in China.

"There is no hope for China," declared the speaker, "in Taoism or Buddhism, and Confucianism is now being arraigned by the younger element as out of date, and even detrimental to the morals of the country. China is now sitting at the feet of the western world and willing to be taught by us.

"There is no 'yellow peril' unless we make it so. The Chinese are not the ignorant people they are painted. The only people greater in commercialism than the Jews are those of China.

"One of the provinces of this great nation contains enough coal fields to supply the world for 3,000 years. Telegraph wires cover this vast territory, and the railroads have a mileage of 3,000. Many newspapers carry the new thoughts throughout the dominions. We do not know the Chinese. Only the inhabitants of one low coolie district come to our country. The real people of the middle and upper classes are not one whit behind the rest of the world and are so proud that they look down upon the Japanese and us."

The Recent Outbreak in China.

Dr. M. D. Eubank, a Baptist Medical missionary in the province of Hunan, gave the following explanation of the recent uprising to a reporter: "The governor of Hunan," he said, "in my opinion, was the direct cause of the last uprising of the natives, whose cry was a demand for cheaper rice. The governor, I am told, was in league with the foreign merchants in his province and conspired with them to raise the price of the country's greatest staple. He made immense profit by it.

"His action so stirred up the natives that they wished to bring upon him the hand of the government and realized that the most effective method was to attack the missionaries. This would result in his being called to account by his superiors for not giving the missionaries ample protection. That, I believe, was the real cause of the riot, and I feel sure that he committed suicide when he found out how deeply he was involved, I do not believe the report that he was killed."

Dr. Eubank gave some glowing statistics of the progress of the work in China.

In Latin America.

Rev. H. C. Stuntz, for many years a missionary in South America, gave a general account of the situation there. It is a vast territory, with wonderful possibilities, now occupied by a sparse population. But it is rapidly filling up, and the opportunities for missionary work are boundless. The present moral conditions are bad; illiteracy the rule; gambling is well-nigh universal, and in one-third of the so-called families no marriage ceremony ever has been performed.

How to Get Results.

At the afternoon meeting on Saturday the main topic was "How to Lead a Church to Its Highest Missionary Efficiency." The promotion of missionary intelligence, prayer for missions, laymen as missionary advocates, and a better system of missionary finance, were the special subjects, the principal speakers being Rev. S. Earl Taylor, of New York; Rev. W. B. Anderson. of Philadelphia, (many years in India); Dr. C. H. Patton, of Boston, and Rev. J. Campbell White. Many practical suggestions were made along the lines mentioned. The committee on resolutions offered the following: "We recommend for adoption a policy whereby each church shall appoint a campaign committee to conduct a personal canvass of each church member. We believe in the weekly offering as a scriptural and a business method. We advise that a co-operative committee of each movement be organized in each county. A permanent organization that will make Chicago's 1911 pledge equal $250,000."

They ought to work out a great change in the methods of conducting mission work.

A Round-up of Missionaries.

A large number of returned missionaries were present, and were introduced in order to the audience. Each one gave a condensed account of his work, covering the country, the term of service, and something of the results. All these were received with hearty applause by the audience.

The Sunday Afternoon Meeting.

For the Sunday morning service the missionary speakers were sent among the churches. But it was rather surprising that so many pulpits were occupied by the pastors themselves. At the Auditorium Dr. F. W. Gunsaulus preached on the subject, and his sermon made a great impression. The rally of men in the afternoon drew an audience which packed the Orchestra Hall from platform to door. The two leading speakers at this meeting were Mr. J. Campbell White and Mr. Mornay Williams, who was first projector of the movement, after the great Williams College Centennial. Mr. White declared that the Chicago Convention was proving the greatest of the series of seventy-five.

Mr. Williams made a remarkably able address on "The Missionary Motive." He is a New York lawyer and chairman of the committee on Child Labor and also is connected with the Board of Charities and Corrections of the states, and therefore much interested in home work as well as foreign. "I tremble not so much for Korea and China," said Mr. Williams, "as I do for America, my own country. I am interested in missions and this great missionary movement because I know that America and your Chicago with all their great outward prosperity are doomed unless they heed the call of the Christ. The judgment of the cross is on us all. You cannot be great unless you are willing to serve. You cannot share the glory of the Christ unless you are willing to drink of his cup.

"When you realize that Korea's smallest coin is 1-20 of a cent," he said, "and that the average daily wage is 20 cents, you can easily understand how deeply interested the country is in religion when you know that their people spent $125,000 in American coin last year for hymn books. America, with all her wealth, must be judged by the standard which these people have set in their poverty."

United Ministers' Conference.

The meeting on Monday morning was of special interest to ministers. Rev. H. P. Silver, of Topeka, spoke on "The Pastor as Leader." The laymen are moving forward in the great work, he said, and the leaders must look out or they will be run over. The day of inactivity has passed. Men are bubbling over with enthusiasm seeking an outlet. They need direction. Some are too little to do big things, and some are too big to do little things. Pastors must utilize all in the work. As to money, there is plenty to be had if we go after it in the right way. But we must get away from the oyster stew and the pink tea and rummage sale idea, and get on a higher plane.

A World-Vision Needed.

Dr. C. F. Reid, of San Francisco, spoke on "The Place of the Laymen's Missionary Movement in the Life of the Church." Dr. Reid said we are too near, at present, to see this movement in all its immense proportions. We are beginning to get a vision of the world and its needs. The Church of Christ is not a hospital for spiritual dyspeptics, but a great machine for doing good to the souls and bodies of men. Too many of our converts get away and are lost sight of. We must give them work to do. This movement is bringing unity among the churches and promoting harmony among Christians everywhere.

A Model Missionary Pastor.

Rev. Alfred Gandier, of Toronto, pictured the missionary pastor as he should be: himself a missionary, filled with zeal for the cause; thoroughly acquainted with the work, and able to give the information to his people: eager to keep his congregation informed and in touch with the great missionary movements; courageous, and not afraid to ask for money; full of faith in his people, and able to make them know it; and finally, a recruiting agent for the mission field.

Rev. John Timothy Stone, of Chicago, closed with a strong appeal to the workers to grasp the immensity of the situation, and to realize the tremendous spiritual value there is in co-operating in such a work.

Chicago Disciples' Share.

In last week's Christian Century it was noted that the banquet of Disciple men pledged on behalf of Chicago churches to increase the offerings from this city over 60 per cent for the coming year or a total offering of $5,000—an average of $1.20 per member. On Monday night this report was presented with similar reports from all the denominations some of whom pledged even larger increases. The total sum raised last year for missions by the Protestant churches of Chicago was $163,866. At the opening of the convention the goal set before us for the coming year was $250,000. When on Monday evening the pledges were footed up they came to the inspiring figure of $280,000. The Presbyterians doubled their figure proposing to raise $85,000, Methodists jumped from $43,000 to $75,000, and pledged their share of $1,000 a year for the support of an executive secretary to maintain missionary headquarters here and carry on the great work begun among us by the present movement. Mr. F. J. Michel will be continued in this important work. The Baptist pledge almost doubled their previous giving—from $16,726 to $30,000. Great enthusiasm reigned in the making of these pledges, and many expressions of humiliation were heard with respect to our previous neglect of this great work.

The banquet of Disciples brought out a heartening attendance of our men from fifteen of our twenty-three congregations—all the stronger congregations being well represented. Every man was quickened to go back to his brethren in the local church and work to enlist hearts and gifts in this. Christ's work. It has made the beginning of a new epoch in our church life in the city.

man, as the poor and needy, the sick and sorrowfu' can amply testify. But I'm afeard o' my life he has leanins, aye leanins. When did we hear him preach ae sermon on election? I'm aye misdootin', but he's gan aff the straicht." Yet in the man's presence, such was the fascination of his personality, the charm of his manner, and the power of his unaffected, manly Christianity, that David Graeme, himself a man of deep piety, underneath his love of genuine Scotch humor, looked upon his minister with eyes that spoke as deep affection as one man may cherish for another.

Within the past few days Mr. Graeme had been troubled concerning his only son, Donald. Many a young man in Brigend had envied Donald Graeme his splendid prospects. But Donald, to the sorrow of both his parents, to say nothing of his sister Jeanie, had lately shown signs of discontent in business. Nothing would do the youth but he must emigrate. Farming in Canada would give him a life to breathe in. Only give him a few hundred pounds and let him find for himself. James Douglas would be only too glad to take a partnership in the business, and he was worthy, too. When Archie Monteith left the tea-table and followed James into the shop Mr. Graeme poured all the story into Mr. Sinclair's ears. Donald sat playing with his knife, looking downcast and uneasy, while his father laid the whole matter before the minister. Mrs. Graeme, during the recital, pressed her handkerchief to her eyes more than once. Jeanie looked on dry-eyed, but pale and anxious. The old man at last concluded with:

"And now, Mr. Sinclair, what would ye advise?"

"First of all, Donald, tell me, would you expect to be better off over in Canada than you are here, in your father's house?"

"It is not a matter of being better off, as money goes, sir, but I should be more contented. I hate the shop; it is a prison to me." A sudden flush dyed his face, as ne lowered his eyes, under Mr. Sinclair's steady, searching look.

"Donald, there is many a young man in Brigend and elsewhere would consider himself well off in your shoes."

"I know it Mr. Sinclair, but I cannot help my tastes."

"How do you know what your tastes are? You have never done a day's work on a farm in your life."

"You forget how much I enjoy work in the garden. You can understand how I love it, for you love it yourself, sir."

"Quite true, Donald, as a recreation. I love nature next to my God and my fellow creatures. But a man may not always please himself. "Love thyself last" was well said, and by one of the greatest of men. Think of your father's hopes, Donald, and look at your mother's white hair. Could you have the heart, man, to bring sorrow on a home that up till now has been happy and prosperous?"

"There are worse things than separation," he said, half defiantly. "It is hard to say what a fellow might be driven to."

"Fellows have been driven by their own folly to know the pinch of want before now, Donald, but I trust it will never be so with you."

At these words Jeanie broke down and sobbed aloud. Donald sprang to her side and threw his arms around her.

"Don't Jeanie, don't" he pleaded; "God knows I would do anything for you.'

"Then you won't go away, Donald, say you won't."

"I'll never go away till you are willing, Jeanie."

Mr. Sinclair silently beckoned the old people from the room and softly closed the door.

"Jeanie, I am going to tell you everything, everything, but first promise me that you will keep my trouble from father and mother,

Church Life

—Note the initial chapter of our new serial in this issue. Great number of our readers have taken keen delight in the story of the trusts, "The Coign of Vantage" which came to its finis last week. The present story will prove no less interesting. Read it before you lay down the paper.

* * *

Until the Chautauqua season opens W. J. Lhamon, will act as pastor of the church at Wellsville, N. Y.

Charles E. McVey has open dates for June and July. He may be addressed at Hardy, Neb.

L. G. Batman, Youngstown, Ohio, will make the Church Extension address at the Ohio state convention.

W. L. Cowen has resigned the pastorate of the church at Ludlow, Ill., and will close his work at an early date.

The Lenox Avenue Church, New York, made a special effort to have every member present at its May day services.

J. S. Hyde, pastor of the Second Church, Danville, Ill., duly observed "Tuberculosis Sunday," preaching a sermon on "The Great White Plague."

J. W. Porter, after a two years' pastorate has closed his work with the church at Mason City, Ill., where he preached his farewell sermon the last Sunday in April.

The Memorial Church, Rock Island, Ill., has purchased a parsonage of eight rooms, on a beautiful sixty-foot lot which will be occupied by Pastor E. T. McFarland and family.

F. N. Calvin, St. Louis, and his wife have gone to Brownville, Texas, where for two weeks, Mr. Calvin will take a needed rest from his church work.

The First Church, Urbana, Ill., expects to dedicate its new building May 22. The contractors have promised that the building will be complete by that date.

Dr. Paul Wakefield, the Living Link missionary of the Church at Liberty, Mo., was present at both services at the Central Church, Des Moines, Ia., the first Sunday in May.

H. H. Jenner, pastor of the Stuart Street Church, Springfield, Ill., has been holding special meetings with his church and in eighteen days there have been thirty-eight responses to the invitation.

A new church is to be erected at Sheridan, Ind., during the coming summer. The plans call for the expenditure of $12,000 exclusive of furnishings. The seating capacity of the building will be 700.

The West Side Church, Springfield, Ill., will dedicate its remodeled building, May 15. Oliver W. Stewart of Chicago will be in charge. This church has doubled the size of its auditorium, and added splendidly equipped Sunday-school rooms.

E. E. Moorman, pastor Englewood Church, Indianapolis, spoke at Butler College at a recent chapel service. His subject was "Temple Builders." Mr. Moorman is a graduate of Butler of the class of '99, taking his Master's degree the following year.

Charles M. Sharpe, dean of the Bible College, Columbia, Mo., will give the Alumni address at Kansas University this year. Mr. Sharpe is an alumnus of Kansas University, and at one time pastor of the Christian Church in Lawrence.

Earle M. Todd is bringing things to pass in the work of the church at Fort Wayne, Indiana. He commands increasingly the attention of the most thoughtful people of the city, and the church is consciously undertaking plans for the best things.

The members of the brotherhoods of Des Moines, Iowa, are in a vigorous campaign to secure "500 men in attendance upon the state convention at Boone." Their plan of campaign provides for individual solicitation of each church in the state.

Dr. Paul Wakefield, the newly appointed living link of the church at Liberty, Mo., preached in this church April 27, morning and evening, and greatly delighted the people, who now more cheerfully than ever give of their means for his support in China.

The Sunday School of the Central Church, Des Moines, Ia., has entered into a contest with the School at Anderson, Indiana. The contest will last for six weeks, until the first Sunday in June. The contest is based upon the increase of the attendance and enrollment.

Under date of May 2, C. R. Scoville, sends a telegram from Tacoma, Wash., saying that the churches there had bought a lot in the southern part of the city, built and dedicated a tabernacle in two days. Fifty-three received at the first invitation, 103 the first day, and 700 since the beginning of the campaign in Tacoma.

It is said that there is good prospect that at Cedar Rapids, where W. M. White has just been called as pastor, there will be a new church erected within the next two years. Sixty-five thousand dollars has already been subscribed toward this purpose. Besides this the church owns a beautiful lot free from debt.

W. T. Hilton, pastor of the church at Greenville, Texas, is leading his church in the third meeting since the beginning of his pastorate there. The Netz Sisters are singing for the meeting. Fine audiences are reported, and many additions. The Sunday-school has reached an attendance of more than three hundred.

Elster M. Haile, president of Hereford College, Hereford, Texas, has resigned his position, and will in all probability enter the pastorate again. Mr. Haile expresses a desire to attack the problem of the city church fighting against great odds. We should welcome such a man to the difficulties and joys of the Chicago field.

Walter Scott Priest sends the glad news that the Central Church, Wichita, Kans., has become a living link in the American Society. This gives this church four living links, two in foreign, one in state and one in American missions. Since Mr. Priest began work here six months ago there have been eighty accessions to the church, and more than $2,200 raised for missions.

The Northern Indiana Ministerial Institute, which was to have met in Valparaiso, Indiana, last week, came into contact with a "landslide," and was completely swept off the track, all the preachers who would otherwise have attended the meeting were more interested in the great inter-denominational gathering in Chicago, and could not stop until they had registered at the Missionary Congress.

A walking club for the boys between the ages of eight and fifteen is an attractive feature of the work of the Sunday School of the Central Church, Des Moines. The walks will be on Saturday afternoon, and will be to some neighboring woodland where birds and trees and flowers will be studied under the sympathetic guidance of Mr. Osborne.

The Kirk Avenue Church, Bloomington, Indiana, is making fine progress under the leadership of J. C. Todd. There are now fourteen hundred members, twelve of whom the pastor can account for. There is some talk of the church employing an assistant pastor for the coming year. They want a man who will give especial attention to the Sunday School, and the financial work of the church.

Lowell C. McPherson, who has been four months holding meetings in various parts of the United States has just closed a meeting with the Columbia Avenue Church, Rochester, N. Y., and returned to his home at Keuka Park, New York. During this meeting the membership of the Columbia Avenue Church was largely increased, and the standing of the church with the community greatly strengthened.

J. E. Lynn began his work with the church at Greeley, Colo., the first Sunday in May. During the month of April, Mr. Lynn took a vacation, during which he preached for the S. L. and W. Ranch church several times, adding five persons to its membership. He preached twice on Sunday afternoon at a nearby town of 400 inhabitants and assisted in organizing a church there with fifteen charter members. Mr. Lynn has been elected a member of the Colorado State Board.

The movement for the erection of a hospital by the members of the Christian Churches in and near Kansas City seems to be making fine progress. The Trustees, Drs. P. C. Palmer, E. L. Harrison, and W. A. Forster, have filed petition for incorporation. The site of the building has not yet been decided upon. The name it will bear is "The Christian Church Hospital and Training School of Kansas City." The proposed buildings will cost about $250,000.

Rally Day was observed April 20, at Petersburg, Ill., where most of the departments of the work are in fair condition. The Sunday-school is in the lead. The four organized classes are doing exceptionally well. The "Isaiah" class (women), besides paying for their half on the new pipe organ (over $900), have paid $100 on their $500 pledge to the new church. The "Boosters'" class (men), less than a year old, have 110 enrolled. On March 27, there was an attendance of 102. A contest with F. W. Burnham's class at Springfield, Ill., is contemplated.

J. P. Myers, Shelbyville, Indiana, read a resignation as pastor of the First Church of that city, the first Sunday in May. Mr. Myers will close his work with this church at the end of July. He has not yet decided upon his future location, and will probably hold one or two meetings during the latter part of the Summer, and take some time in deciding upon his future location. Mr. Myers has done a good work at Shelbyville, in the three years that he has been there. In this time the standing of the church in the community has been strengthened, and a $7,000 debt of long standing has been entirely cleared away. Mr. Myers will doubtless have no lack of opportunity to accept calls from our best churches.

The men of the Christian churches of Peoria, Ill., are in a novel way taking hold of the enterprise of erecting a new building for the new Sunday-school to be organized in the western part of the city. On a large mailing card the men of these churches announce that they will build the house for the new Sunday-school in one day, May 31. Men are asked to meet promptly at 7 a.m., prepared for work with shovel, hammer and saw, and it is proposed that by 6 in the evening the building will be complete. At the noon hour will be held a memorial day service, with an address by W. F. Turner, pastor of the Central Church. The ladies of the two churches will serve luncheon.

May twenty-second is the date set for the dedication of the new church at Urbana, Ill.

J. C. Howell has accepted a call from the church at Lakeport, Cal., and is already at work.

A. Martin, Morgantown, W. Va., lectured in the Forest Ave. Church, Buffalo, N. Y., May 10 and 11.

C. W. Cummings, pastor at Knoxville, Ill., recently addressed the Sunday afternoon men's meeting at the Y. M. C. A.

The church at Cairo, Ill., has moved into its new building though the work on the building is not yet complete.

H. E. Tucker, pastor at Platte City, Mo., writes that the church there is in a meeting under the leadership of S. J. White, pastor at Chillicothe.

S. Ellwood Fisher, for several years the successful pastor at Paxton, Ill., began work as pastor of the church at Dixon, the first Sunday in May.

T. L. Noblitt, pastor of the church at Guthrie, Okla, is visiting different sections of the state in the interest of the bill providing for the change of the location of the state capital.

R. L. Mobbley has accepted the pastorate of the First Church, Jacksonville, Miss. He began work the first Sunday in May and has fine prospects for a large and successful ministry.

S. S. Jones is holding a follow up meeting with the Third Church, Danville, Ill., in which there have been 200 accessions to the church. This meeting follows the Sunday meeting held in the winter.

Last Sunday, F. M. Rains was called to serve the Maxwell Street congregation, Lexington, Ky., as dedicator of their new building. The dedication will be followed by a meeting.

J. M. VanHorn closed his ministry with the Cecil Street Church, Toronto, Canada, the last of April, and has removed to Warren, Ohio. The congregation gave him and his wife an enthusiastic farewell reception, presenting them with a large purse of gold coins.

"The Problems of the Young Woman of Today" was the subject of a sermon by Rev. E. B. Barnes, on a recent Sunday evening and was so well received that the report was given large space in the daily paper on the following day.

B. E. Utz, for several years preacher in Iowa, is now manager of the industrial farm of the Eugene Bible University. It is the plan of the school to by means of this department make it possible for many a young man to work his way through school who would not otherwise avail himself of academic training.

The church at Boone, Iowa, has just closed a quiet little meeting in which there were twenty-seven accessions to the membership of the church. This makes 115 new members that have come into the church since April 1909. The meeting was led by Clara Hazelrig of Topeka.

A beautiful new church has been erected by the church at Linton, Ind., and was occupied by the congregation for the first time, the last Sunday in April. Meinotte Miller is the pastor of the church. Immediately after the opening of the new building a meeting was begun under the leadership of J. V. Coombs.

Colby D. Hall, pastor of the University Church, Waco, Texas, has been allowed by his church to begin his vacation a month early this year that he may give the time to the ministry of the Central Church which, has been without a minister for a short time, but needs the assistance of this strong pastor in preparing for a meeting to be held in the fall.

Mother's Day services were held at the Lenox Ave. Church, New York. W. Bayard Craig, the minister spoke in the morning on the subject, "The Madonna of Protestants." A beautiful picture of "The Madonna" was unveiled by two little girls. A carnation was given to all in attendance, in honor of Mother.

W. J. Wright has begun his temporary pastorate with the church at Enid, Okla. He has just concluded a meeting at Norfolk, Va., where he found a small company of Disciples worshipping in a small building and after adding one hundred to the membership led them in planning a campaign for a $50,000.00 building.

The Men's Berean Bible class of Nelsonville, Ohio, held a soldier's day service, Sunday, May first. This class has had a wonderful growth, and has commanded the attention of many noted Sunday-school workers in all parts of the country. The president of the class Mr. R. A. Doan, has been many times invited to tell of the work of the class before large audiences.

Frank L. VanVorhis, the newly appointed secretary of the Wisconsin Board, has just concluded a meeting of four weeks duration at Chippewa Falls. There were seventeen accessions, all but two being by primary obedience. A. F. Hansaker, a fine young man of the community, volunteered for the Christian ministry of this church. Mr. VanVorhis attended the meeting of the Missionary Congress last week.

Frederick M. Rogers, of Long Beach and H A. Easton, the well known singer, have just closed a nineteen days' meeting with their Central Church at San Diego, Cal. There were forty-one added. Mr. Rogers is a pastor who has not lost the evangelistic faith and fervor. He is a high class Sunday-school man too and aided much in organizing the adult department. The very best result must follow his meeting always. W. E. Crabtree is pastor at San Diego.

The church at North Eaton, Ohio, dedicated a new building the first Sunday in May. Warren Leonard is the pastor. About a year ago the congregation lost its building, which had been used only two months, by fire. The heroic spirit of the church was shown in its at once resolving to replace the church with even a better one. They had to pay the debt upon the burned building, for there was but little insurance, and then they set to work upon the campaign for the new one, and soon were ready to let the contract for that. The present building is formed of concrete blocks, and cost about eight thousand dollars. H. Newton Miller, Secretary of the Ohio Christian Missionary Society was master of dedicatory ceremonies.

The following resolution adopted by the eleventh district meeting of Indiana, held at Columbus, is in the direction of greater efficiency especially for the smaller churches.

"Resolved, that it be the sense of this convention that in order to bring about the perpetuity, the growth and evangelistic zeal of the church, the ministers should be intimately associated with the members of the church or churches they may serve, and to that end would favor grouping the churches and locating ministers in their own fields of labor, and further, that we discourage the custom of importing a preacher from the city or from another state, who reports for duty early Sunday morning and departs Sunday night."

The Centennial Church, Bloomington, Ill., was dedicated the first Sunday in May. This is the third church built under the leadership of J. H. Gilliland during his leadership of twenty years in this fair city of Illinois. The new building is commodious and thoroughly modern in all its equipment, with ample preparation for the work of the Sunday School, and a large basement for social purposes. In the dedicatory services the members of both the other churches participated, their pastors Edgar D. Jones, and S. H. Zendt taking part in the program. There are few men in any denomination who have a more satisfactory and commendable record than nas J. H. Gilliland.

Truman E. Winter has resigned his position as professor of Old Testament literature, in the Bible College, Columbia, Mo., and accepted a call to the pastorate of the church at Fulton, Mo. Mr. Truman is a graduate of Hiram College and Yale University, with post graduate work in Berkeley Bible Seminary, and Pacific Theological Seminary. He looks forward to the work at Fulton with greatest hopefulness. There is already started a move for building a forty-thousand dollar house of worship for the historic church. While continuing his work in the class room until the close of the present school year, Mr. Truman will occupy the pulpit of the Fulton church each Sunday.

Randolph Cook, who recently resigned the pastorate of the Central Church at Enid, Oklahoma, had two years of good service. During this time 550 members were added, but there is now a body of nearly a thousand strong at this growing educational center. More than $4,000 of old church debts were paid off, $600 raised for missions, and all together over $26,000 raised for all purposes. The Bible school grew from an average of 140 until there were three schools averaging over 400. Mr. Cook taught classes in teacher-training, and mission study, and fostered all lines of church activity. He has done much in the way of using printer's ink in the work. He is ably assisted by Mrs. Cook, who, among other things, organized the Young Ladies' Mission Circle, which now supports a native helper in India.

The following paragraph from the Christian Evangelist will doubtless be enjoyed by the readers of the Christian Century:

"Here's an interesting story illustrating how the germs of criticism are at work in the minds of 'the rising generation.' President J. W. McGarvey was recently relating the story of Balaam to a small grandson—how Balaam's ass refused to go forward when confronted by the angel with the drawn sword, and how, on being thrice beaten by his master for his disobedience, the Lord opened the beast's mouth and he spake and protested against his abuse. 'Grandfather,' said the young rationalist. 'don't you suppose the angel was a ventriloquist and threw his voice into the mouth of the ass?' It is not related what disciplinary measures were taken by the venerable Bible teacher to remove this seed of skepticism from the mind of his grandchild. One can not help, however, raising the biblical question: "If they do these things in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry?"

The Berean Sunday-school class, Nelsonville, Ohio, is commanding attention. It has had letters from President Taft, Mr. Bryan, John Wanamaker, Gov. Folk, Gov. Harmon and may hear sometime from "Teddy and King George!" The spirit and ardor of the class has never been greater than now. Mr. Doan is a great leader and has new plans constantly on tap. The men are always ready to second any effort of his. Last Sunday there were 366 men present which is the largest attendance in the history of the class. The day was observed as "Old Soldiers Day." About sixty veterans were present. The room was tastfully decorated with flags and bunting and at the close the whole school numbering 816 lined up outside on the street and saluted the old soldiers as they marched through the double line. It was a beautiful sight. Scott Cook is beginning his fifth year with this church.

The Conference of Doctors

The Physicians and Surgeons Conference brought together medical men from the distant states of New York and Washington as well as many intervening states. About one hundred were present.

Dr. Mathew D. Mann, of Buffalo, N. Y., was chairman and addresses were made by Drs. Irving Ludlow Cleveland, Winfield Scott Hall, Chicago, W. H. Park and M. D. Eubank, China. All sounded a deeply religious note.

Dr. Ludlow spent many months recently studying medical missions in China, Corea and Japan. He asserted the most impressive fact he observed was ignorance of the commonest and most fundamental points of hygiene and sanitation. As a result, disease is continually prevalent and this joined with unscientific practitioners, makes the suffering of these people something beyond comprehension. His appeal, to our Christian consciences, was for the diminishing of this suffering by the aid which can be rendered in sending Christian physicians.

Dr. Park, whose experience in China reaches back near twenty years, was listened to with great interest. He treated in his hospital last year 20,000 patients—more than one-half as many as the largest medical college in Chicago treats in clinic and dispensary!

In relating a certain acute case he treated, following the native doctors' ministrations, he unwound the prescriptions written for the patient during the few hours prior to his being called. They were pasted together making a sheet five yards and ten inches wide! Another case he was called to see had been attended by a native physician whose prescriptions called for a concoction of many drugs and herbs. These were directed to be roasted in a pot, placing a pair of shears on the lid to sharpen it up and cut away the disease, strain and give in one dose, and if the patient is not better secure another physician!

Illustrating the readiness of the Chinese people for medical schools and hospitals, he related that shortly before leaving for America he explained to a company of natives his ambition for a medical college and $5.200 was raised in a short time—$1,000 of this being pledged by the government.

Dr. Winfield Scott Hall, one of Chicago's leading physicians, asked what was the central idea of the profession and answered it with the word "altruism." This, he said, is the inspiring thought and motive of the true physician, and until the young practitioner gets this idea of service his success will not reach its maximum. Quoting the words of Jesus "Whosoever would save his life must lose it" he justified the sacrifices of missionaries by the large and influential life which they succeed in living.

Dr. Eubank, of China, was brilliant. His address sparkled with fine humor and his delivery was more like that of an impassioned minister than a physician. He insisted, as had Dr. Park, that the next great step in Medical Missions must be the establishment of well equipped medical colleges. He asks for five great schools in that many large and central cities. The impossibility of satisfactorily treating the 400,000,000 people by importation of foreign doctors was insisted upon and the necessity, therefore, of natives trained for the work.

These colleges should be union colleges, each church supporting its own men who would co-operate with those of other denominations in maintaining the school. He asked also for three capable men all of whose time could be given to writing and translating simple scientific articles on hygiene and allied subjects and so create a medical literature where none now exists.

Following the addresses, preliminary steps were taken toward the organization of medical men to efficiently co-operate with the Laymen's Missionary Movement. A committee will be appointed to confer and report at a special session of the annual American Medical Association meeting at St. Louis in June. H. T. Morrison, Jr., M. D.

and from Mr. Sinclair most of all. I know you would never tell anyone else." She clasped her hands and lifted terrified eyes to his haggard face.

"Oh, Donald, what is it? And why may I not tell?"

"Simply because I will not live and have it known."

"Then don't tell me, Donald, oh, don't."

"But you can help me, Jeanie, and I know you will."

"If I can help you, tell me all." He cowered before her pure, sad eyes, then spoke in a broken whisper.

"I have been betting and gambling, Jeanie, and I've lost heavily and must pay; and you must get me money."

"But the wretch can't make you pay," she said, "it is illegal." She spoke calmly, though she looked distressed.

"But he has threatened to tell father, Jeanie, and he will, too. Think of it. Would it not kill both father and mother?"

"It would," she said. "They must not know it. But what can I do? You know I have no money."

"You are the only one could get it and never be suspected," he said hoarsely.

"What do you mean, Donald, and how much do you need?" She scarcely knew her own voice, and she hardly recognized her brother's face. Could that wild-eyed young man be Donald? The light-hearted, happy Donald that used to be the life of the house? His lips trembled and he was barely audible as he muttered:

"One hundred pounds."

"Oh, Donald, what a sum, and I have only about five pounds of my own in the world."

"No more use than five pence. I must have the full money within three days, or father will know all. Oh, Jeanie, for God's sake save me."

"How, Donald, tell me how," she whispered, trembled the while like an aspen leaf.

"You know where father's keys are."

"It would not be stealing, Jeanie. It will be all yours and mine some day. And—and you would do it for me?"

"Do what?" she said, and her pale face flushed to crimson, and her sad eyes flashed with sudden angry light.

From the American Society

First Church of Christ, Laurens, Iowa—We passed our apportionment yesterday morning, and more came last night, and it's not all in yet. Our work moves along nicely. Twelve added last month, all by baptism. One, a young man, will study for the ministry.—E. J. Nickerson.

Millersburg, Ohio—Our offering will be from 50 per cent to 60 per cent above last year. It is the "best ever."—C. A. Freer.

Ada, Okla.—Forty dollars for American Missions yesterday.—Leroy M. Anderson.

Ravenna, Ohio—Apportionment of Ravenna Church was $50. We passed that at first offering yesterday morning.—J. A. Wharton.

Pontiac, Ill.—Subscriptions for American Missions exceeded our apportionment yesterday.—E. W. Sears.

First Christian Church, Omaha, Neb., becomes a Living Link.—J. M. Kersey.

Mansfield, Ohio—Became a Living Link today. Raised $300. Church happy.—Chas. R. Oakley.

Belvidere, Neb.—Our offering for Home Missions is $19.70.—G. A. Burnham.

First Church of Christ, Cherokee, Iowa—Offering for American Missions $21.45.—A. E. Hook.

First Christian Church, Steubenville, Ohio—The church at Steubenville has not been giving to all the various societies for the past few years. Therefore, we planned to have every society represented in some way this year. The amount for your society is $25.—D. H. Turner, Treasurer.

Mt. Vernon, Ohio—The amount contributed by our congregation for Home Missions is $55.33.—Geo. W. McNabb.

Winnipeg, Manitoba—I preached yesterday, both morning and evening, on Missions, and will do so again next Sunday and take the offering. We expect the largest offering that has ever been taken in the church. We are praying and working to that end.—A. N. Simpson.

Nashville, Ark.—$25 from this church for Home Missions. We have less than 100 members in our congregation, and need a house badly. Put us on the Honor Roll.—W. P. Dorsey.

North Birmingham, Ala.—Took the offering for Home Missions the first Sunday in May. We will give more this year than any previous year; something like $20. I think this is a good offering for the Mission Church here. We have more than reached our apportionment.—Milligan Earnest.

Strodtman Heights Church, St. Louis, Mo.—The contribution of this church to the American Mission Fund is $10. Since we came here on October 1 we have taken every missionary offering, receiving a fair response to most of them; have raised $350 on our new lot, have done some repairs, have about $50 in all treasuries, and have kept up my salary and all other expenses to date. There have been fifty-two responses to the Great Invitation also.—W. A. Webster.

All remittances for home missions should be made payable to the American Christian Missionary Society, and sent to the headquarters in the Carew Building, Cincinnati, Ohio.

A Good Gain for April

The total receipts of the Foreign Society for April are $43,910.53, a gain over the corresponding month 1909 of $6,366. The total receipts for the first seven months of the current missionary year amount to $131,834.23, a gain of $12.938.36. There has been a gain every month so far in this missionary year except two. Send offerings to F. M. Rains, Secretary, Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Three New Name Funds for Church Extension

The brotherhood generally will be rejoiced to know that three name funds of $5.000 each have been given to our Church Extension Fund during the latter part of April.

The first one was given by the president of the board, Fletcher Cowherd. Bro. Cowherd has been president of the board since the death of D. O. Smart, and has been contemplating for some time the creation of a name fund in memory of his brother, Walker Cowherd, who was associated with him for years in the real estate business. In establishing this $5,000 "Walker Cowherd Memorial Fund" Fletcher Cowherd had three motives: First, out of gratitude to God for his goodness in a multitude of ways and because he had prospered he felt that some of the money belonged to God. It is a pity that more men do not feel grateful in so practical a way. Second, he wanted a testimonial to his brother who was a good business man and a devoted Christian. Third, Mr. Cowherd felt that, as a member of this board for eighteen years, he wanted to give to the work in which he is greatly interested. He thought he could best show this interest to the brotherhood by giving this $5,000 fund.

The second name fund was given by R. A. Long in memory of his mother and his $5,000 will go to the establishment of the "Margaret K. Long Memorial Fund" in memory of his mother. Bro. Long has frequently stated that his mother wanted him to preach and that he has always felt sorry that he could not fulfil her wish. He wants this memorial fund to erect church buildings which will stand before the communities as symbols of God's presence and by their very existence before the eyes of men stand as rebukes to sin in those communities. Bro. Long preaches in a thousand ways by his princely giving.

The "M. H. Shelton Memorial Fund" was established by Bro. Shelton's gift of $5,000 in a bequest. The bequest was not in a written will but was a request made to his wife and children on his death bed on January 14, 1910, and was paid on April 4, 1910. This verbal bequest of $5,000 on Bro. Shelton's death bed was paid by his family as a most sacred obligation. At the request of his wife and his two sons, J. T. Shelton of Burbank, Cal., and W. C. Shelton of Central City Neb., this memorial fund is established, a most beautiful and practical memorial to a devoted member of the Burbank Christian Church.

This is now thirty-one name funds in our Church Extension work. A name fund consists of $5,000, given at once or in annual payments of not less than $500 each. A name loan fund consists of $5,000 or more, of which a separate account is kept by the board of the Church Extension and a report made each year to the donors. The interest on loans made from our name funds is not spent for current expenses but is kept in the fund and compounds itself semi-annually as the churches aided pay their interest semi-annually.

F. M. Drake established his fund in February, 1889. By this money going out and returning, it has built seventy-one churches, earned $4,363 of interest and has done the work, by the money coming and going, of $31,596.15. Others should come forward and establish such funds in this first year of our new century. For the first seven months of this year the receipts amount to $45,157.32, a gain of $20,310.21 over last year. Seventy churches have been built since October 1, an average of ten a month. There was never a greater church building period in our history.

National Benevolent Association Notes

The National Benevolent Association has suffered a great loss in the death of Dr. J. F. Davis. He for the last five years has been the patron saint of the Southeastern Christian Orphanage at Baldwin, Ga. About five years ago Brother Davis retired from active business as a druggist in Portsmouth, Ohio. Noticing in one of our papers that we were opening a home in Baldwin, he visited the South with the view of inspecting the work that was being done. He was so pleased with the work that he asked the privilege of remaining there. For five years he has contributed $50 a month to the home, besides serving as treasurer and purchasing agent. The call to rest and reward came on April 24. The "widow and the orphan in their affliction" have lost a true friend in his departure.

A new building was dedicated to the Gospel of the Helping Hand in Denver, Colo., on Easter Sunday. The Colorado Christian Home, the only institution devoted to the care of the orphan child, between the Rocky Mountains and the Mississippi River, will use this property for the blessed ministry of caring for parentless and other unfortunate children. The five acres of land and the building cost $22,000. It has accommodations for forty children; twenty boys and twenty girls. It is one of the most beautiful homes under the direction of the Churches of Christ.

A movement is on in Kansas City, under the direction of the National Benevolent Association, to raise a quarter of a million dollars for the establihsment of a Christian hospital in that city. $130,000 of the needed $250,000 has already been subscribed. From present indications this sum will be secured within the next thirty days. This will be a great achievement for the cause of Christianity in Kansas City and throughout the country. Christ is still going about doing good.

The returns from the Easter offerings are encouraging. From present indications they will run ahead of last year and it is important that they should in order to keep pace with the growing demands of our work. The hungry must be fed and the naked clothed in His name.

From the Hub of the Empire State

The state convention this year is to be held at Rochester the last week in June and the program committee is promising a fine treat. Brethren Stewart and Crawford have enlisted the Rochester Chamber of Commerce to help advertise the event and the two congregations there will unite to make this an enjoyable occasion. We are so few in numbers in this state that these annual gatherings are more coveted as a means of fellowship than in the states where we are stronger.

The State Society will be able to give a fine report of the work in the mission churches this year, several reporting a very marked increase in membership and a considerable gain in strength in congregations. One new house of worship has been dedicated and two more are projected.

Several of our churches have broken away from traditions and observed Passion Week with excellent effect this year. The testimony of pastors and people is that this week seems especially fitted for a season of devotional worship.

Second Church, Rochester, C. C. Crawford pastor, has just completed a five weeks' evangelistic campaign conducted by Lowell C. McPherson of Keuka Park in which there were twenty-eight additions. The meeting was much needed for a general toning up of the work and this it has admirably accomplished. Brother Crawford and his good workers are looking forward to greater things for the Columbia Avenue Church.

L. B. Withee has resigned at Poestenkill and will probably accept the call of the Pompey church. D. H. Bradbury has done a fine two years' work in this field and leaves it to accept the church at Throopsville, near Auburn.

The pastorate of J. C. Crosby at Wellsville terminated under unfortunate circumstances, but fortunately the church secured the services of W. J. Lhamon as a supply for a period of three months, during which time the members hope to locate a good man.

Richland is still supplied from week to week by C. R. Stauffer and myself with the occasional help of some other nearby minister. The services are held on Thursday evenings and are well attended.

The church at Tully has taken so well to the arrangement whereby they are supplied by Dr. Philip A. Parsons, of Syracuse University that he has been given a call until fall. He has taken a cottage for the summer at Tully Lake Park. Dr. Parsons' work in the university has been of such a character as to merit his being engaged for the summer session of the university.

The summer season will soon be upon us, and with it the problem of summer services. I have used two series of Sunday evening services in this city that proved successful and I pass on the suggestions for what they are worth. Three years ago I arranged a series of services under the general subject of "Religion": Religion and Patriotism, Religion and Hot Weather, Religion and Civil Law, Religion and Laughter, Religion and Young People, Religion and Song, Religion and Men, Religion and Superstition. On alternate Sunday evenings I spoke, while on the other evenings prominent laymen from the city addressed the meeting. Thus the first topic, Religion and Patriotism, was handled as an Independence Day topic by a government employe, the third by a prominent attorney, the fifth by the president of the local Christian Endeavor Union, the topic, Religion and Men, by the secretary of the Y. M. C. A. The choir had charge of the topic on song. Again last summer I tried something of the same sort, only using representatives of our different charitable organizations to present their work. Thus we had the secretary of the society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, the secretary of the boys' department, a representative of the Y. M. C. A. and the president of the Young People's Union tell of the workings of their various organizations. I am already at work on this summer's plan and I am hoping to secure the president of our school board, the chairman of the public playgrounds, and a representative of the city tuberculosis crusade to address the meetings.

Eureka College

Monday evening, May 2, the chapel of Eureka College was re-opened after being closed for some two months. During this time an elegant hardwood floor and new chairs were put in. This work was done by the boosters of Eureka College and a committee from the Educational Association. The cost was $750 and the money was all provided for before the work commenced. A few years ago the walls of the chapel were frescoed, and with these new improvements the chapel is one of the most beautiful auditoriums in the state. At the re-opening the representative of the Men's Glee Club announced that the club had decided to put in new window shades. A movement is also on foot to get a new piano for the auditorium. These small improvements indicate a healthy growing sentiment for the college. The people who carried this work to a consummation are entitled to special credit.

Berkeley Bible Seminary
Berkeley, California

Berkeley Bible Seminary is making gigantic strides toward the realization of the dreams and visions of its founders and promoters and taking, worthily, a first place among the really forceful and resourceful institutions of the brotherhood. The year now closing is its greatest and best in every way. Its serious double handicap—lack of facilities and equipment to thoroughly furnish ministerial students with the highest technical and critical culture and most comprehensive Christian training and a question as to the fidelity and loyalty to the Bible and the plea of some of its teachers—has been lifted,

Dustless Housecleaning

Terrific Air Suction. Rushing, whirling, sucking air cleans, carpets, rugs, mattings on floor, without sweeping or dusting. No motors, no electricity. Constant suction. New Home Vacuum Cleaner. New principle. One person operates. Child or weak woman can handle easily. Weighs nine pounds. Simple—powerful—effective. It's the constant suction that does it—terrific, irresistible, sure. Sucking, drawing—gathering up into itself dirt—dust—grit—germs and grime from the very warp and fibre of carpets, rugs, mattings. Does same kind of work as high priced machines. Price so low all may enjoy its benefits. Unlike anything you've seen or heard of. Makes carpets look like new. Better than if taken up and beaten. Raises no dust, so no dusting required. Does what days of sweeping and pounding could never do. Mrs. Jane Shully, Neb., writes. "You don't claim half enough. I wouldn't part with my cleaner for any price, if I couldn't get another. My ten year old girl operates mine easily and enjoys it."

SAVES MONEY, STRENGTH, HEALTH and TIME. YOU NEED IT.

MAKES DUSTLESS HOMES

You Can Abandon Brooms, Brushes and Dust Cloths.

They don't clean your curtains and carpets. Brooms and dusters fill the air with clouds of unhealthy disease-laden dust and germs and remove only surface dirt. New Home Vacuum Cleaner sucks up not only surface dirt, but all dirt, dust, grit and germs from in and beneath. Disturbance and upheaval of housecleaning unnecessary. Stop short! Put drudgery behind you—pleasure and health before. In New Home Vacuum Cleaner lies your salvation from household slavery. Adopt the easy—modern—sanitary—scientific way of cleaning.

Price $8.50. Sent Anywhere.

Not Sold in Stores.

Think of it! Not $15, $50, nor even $25—only $8.50. Think! what a small price for such a wonderful invention. What's $8.50 compared to a neat, clean home; when you can banish forever the drudgery of sweeping—cleaning—dusting; when there will be no more carpets and rugs to take up and beat. We guarantee New Home Vacuum Cleaner to be just as represented or your money back. Comes set up ready for use. You will be delighted—enraptured with it. Mrs. Henry Deller, R. I. "I must thank you for telling me of your wonderful cleaner. What a God send it is to women. I have not felt so rested in years. Work now easy. Plenty of spare time. Don't see how you can sell it so cheap." Don't wait; don't hesitate. Order now. You risk nothing. To try a New Home Cleaner means to want it—then to keep it. ANNOUNCEMENT TO SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS

There is both pleasure and regret in our announcement that our orders for Bethany Graded Lesson Supplies for the Spring Quarter have so far exceeded our calculations that we are unable at the present moment to send out even a sample leaflet or manual. We have been compelled to decline a considerable number of new orders the last few days on account of the fact that our stock has been consumed to the last leaflet. We have the promise of the printing house that our greatly enlarged order of supplies for the Summer Quarter will be delivered soon, in plenty of time for those who wish RETURNABLE SAMPLES, to examine them, and have their order filled before the new quarter opens, July 1.

It will be well for those schools which have decided to begin the Bethany Supplies with July 1 to send their order as early as possible.

We hope to begin filling orders for RETURNABLE SAMPLES by the time this advertisement is being read.

NOTE THE FOLLOWING OFFER: The Publishers of the Bethany Graded Lessons will send out Returnable Samples of the complete line of Supplies—Beginners', Primary and Junior—(excepting the large Beginners' pictures). Accompanying the samples a bill will be sent for $1.09, the regular price of the set. The recipient may do one of three things: (1) He may return the samples uninjured after examination. (2) He may remit $1.09 and keep the samples. Or (3) he may return the bill with his Sunday School's order for Supplies and the publishers will mark it "paid." In writing for samples please say "RETURNABLE."

and it is now running its unimpeded course with the fullest confidence of the brotherhood.

A year ago its president, H. D. McAneney, with signal devotion to the ideal which has possessed him for years and a sacrifical passion which recks not personal cost to himself, evolved a comprehensive and benevolent plan and program for the larger life of the seminary, which enables it to offer the very highest and best training to be had anywhere in the West and perhaps unsurpassed anywhere in the United States among our people. Accordingly the seminary added to the strong and substantial work of Professors Stairs and Elsten, six new instructors representing as many new departments of service. The faculty was enlarged and the curriculum extended by the addition of:

Dean of the Seminary and Professor of Biblical Literature; also Instructor in the Japanese Missionary Department, Harvey H. Guy, B. D., Ph. D.

Instructor in the New Testament, H. J. Loken, A. B., B. D.

Instructor in the Chinese Missionary Department, W. P. Bentley, A. M.

Instructor in Pastoral Work and Methods, I. N. McCash, A. M., LL. D.

Instructor in Evangelistic Work and Methods, H. O. Breeden, A. M., LL. D.

Instructor in Sunday-school Work and Methods, E. W. Thornton.

The last three were engaged to teach for four weeks only during the spring term.

The acquisition of Dr. Guy as Dean of the Seminary was a wise and felicitous choice of the very best man in the brotherhood for that exalted position. If Garfield's definition of a University is correct, then a true definition of a Bible Seminary is: "Dr. H. H. Guy at one end of a log with a student at the other." A comprehensive acquaintance with the heads of all our Bible colleges enables me to speak with authority in the judgment that in all the qualifications and equipment of an ideal dean, Doctor Guy is not surpassed if he is equaled in the entire brotherhood. He possesses, in rare degree, capacity, culture, character, scholarship, personality and experience. And he is making good, immensely good in his new position. He is "to the manor born." As a model for our young ministers he is par excellence. Our cause would be immeasurably advanced if even one of our seminaries could turn out a score of ministers like Guy every year.

The other instructors are almost equally good and proficient in their respective fields. Each is an expert and brings to his task the ripe fruit of years of study, of observation and experience and a forceful personality.

Berkeley Bible Seminary is no longer a fragment, as in the past, but a whole seminary. It offers to young men preparing for the ministry the most thorough and comprehensive training and the most complete equipment for the highest of all professions, the most gracious of all callings. It has passed the experimental stage and is now established upon broad, solid and enduring foundations.

It points with satisfaction to the stalwart, scholarly, efficient young men of the West, its first fruits, but its greatest work is yet to come.

With its strategic, ideal climatic location, hard by one of the greatest universities of the land, and supported by the loyal disciples of the coast; with a curriculum of study measuring up to the highest standards, a faculty of pronounced individuality, approved scholarship, and rare consecration and directed and administered by a president of indefatigable energy, superior and resourceful executive abilities, who counts every personal sacrifice a joy,—with all this the seminary's brightest dawn is surely at the dawn.

You Can Have a Model Kitchen as cool and white as a dairy. No smell, no smoke, no heat, no dust. No old-fashioned contrivances. The

New Perfection
WICK BLUE FLAME

is the latest practical, scientific cook-stove. It will cook the most elaborate dinner without heating the kitchen.

Boils, bakes, or roasts better than any range. Ready in a second. Extinguished in a second. Fitted with Cabinet Top, with collapsible rests, towel rack, and every up-to-date feature imaginable. You want it, because it will cook any dinner and not heat the room. No heat, no smell, no smoke, no coal to bring in, no ashes to carry out. It does away with the drudgery of cooking, and makes it a pleasure. Women with the light touch for pastry especially appreciate it, because they can immediately have a quick fire, simply by turning a handle. No half-hour preparation. It not only is less trouble than coal, but it costs less. Absolutely no smell, no smoke; and it doesn't heat the kitchen.

Cautionary Note: Be sure you get this stove—see that the name-plate reads "New Perfection."

The nickel finish, with the turquoise blue of the enameled chimneys, makes the stove ornamental and attractive. Made with 1, 2 and 3 burners; the 2 and 3-burner stoves can be had with or without Cabinet.

The Land of Yesterday

Shall Disciples Surrender Their Plea?

The conditions prevailing in the Christian world change so rapidly from one decade to another that it is not easy to keep the right perspective regarding the opportunities and obligations of a people like the Disciples of Christ. Their position among the religious forces of America is unique. They have set themselves to a specific task, which, if accomplished, will be one of the most notable in the history of the church.

That task is the interpretation of the ideal of a united church, for which the Savior prayed and the apostles labored. This interpretation signifies two things: such emphasis upon the idea as shall bring it to the attention of all Christians of this generation, and such exemplification of that idea as shall make the message impressive.

The Disciples have never wholly failed to utter this message, though they have often spoken it in terms which could not be well understood or appreciated. Too frequently it has been rather a conventional formula or denominational shibboleth than an urgent and inspiring testimony. But on the whole, they have performed with fair consistency the work of laying stress upon the idea, and it seems not unreasonable to believe that when the church shall have realized something of the unity which has been our hope and aim, the Disciples of Christ may share in the honor of its realization.

In the illustration of this idea, however, the Disciples have shown their greatest weakness. This has been evident not only in the extreme individualism which has marked their relations one with another, but also in the failure to recognize the many problems that enter into the attainment of Christian unity. It has become the commonplace of our own history to say that we have shown as little tendency toward unity among ourselves as any religious communion in the history of the church. This does not mean that our pathway has been marked by radical divisions in our own ranks. Fortunately, for the most part we have been saved that disgrace. But it still remains true that our churches in their fear of centralization and authority have come dangerously near the verge of anarchy in their relations with each other. To correct this tendency, to unify our own scattered forces, and thus to give practical expression to our testimony regarding union is one of the duties of the hour.

But it is further evident that there are tendencies among us to abandon the road of steady progress toward the goal we seek, and to return to those conditions in which our fathers found themselves a century ago. It is difficult for some of our people to understand that the times have changed since the Campbells and their colleagues began their work. Then it was difficult to do much more than voice the New Testament ideal of unity, and to plead for its realization. Today the times have totally changed, and the strongest leaders in all the churches recognize and advocate, to a certain extent at least, a closer relationship among the churches.

In that day the man who advocated unity found himself face to face with a massive, intrenched and belligerent sectarianism. Today that sectarian spirit is increasingly discredited, even in the most conservative denominations. We need not be misled by any false show of interest in this theme. No doubt there are men who, in interdenominational gatherings, are willing and even eloquent advocates of unity, who, between times and in their own denominational circles, are just as zealous for the success of their own particular organization. This is natural on the part of all who have not faced the question of unity with the earnestness that has characterized the study of the theme by the Disciples. But we may well be thankful for every voice that is lifted in behalf of that purpose to which we are historically committed, and some of those voices have been very eloquent and convincing of late.

At this very point it is astonishing to mark those tendencies in our own ranks which would call us back to the land of yesterday, and would seem to presuppose conditions precisely like those in which the fathers found themselves implicit.

The first of these tendencies is discovered in the attitude of one and another of our brethren who, from time to time, insist that Christian unity is no serious part of our business, but that we are set to the defense of some other ideal. By such men we are told that our real task is the restoration of primitive Christianity, or the advocacy of the Lordship of Jesus, or the defense of the Scriptures, or some other of the great truths which are accepted as the commonplaces of the church. The motives for such defection from the great central purpose which has given us validity are various. Some of these brethren are simply weary and discouraged in their efforts to realize unity. They are ready to give up the task. They see little promise of amendment, and they do not care to pursue an illusive object.

For such men we have sincere sympathy. We know that in many places the conditions are exceedingly unpropitious, and the hope of Christian unity seems far off and unreal. But precisely similar have been all the great ideals which the church has successively realized. And certainly at the present moment there is no excuse for the man who becomes fainthearted in this quest.

Others, with no true appreciation of the greatness of our work, are insisting that we are not here to advocate the unity of the church, but some other purpose, such as the Lordship of Jesus, quite oblivious of the fact that there is not a religious communion in Christendom that would yield to us for a moment any right of priority or any stress of insistence upon that theme.

If we began the creation of a new body of believers in order to insist upon the pre-eminence of Jesus, we are an impertinence and an inexcusable intrusion into an already crowded arena of varying forces. For the whole Christian world holds a clear and insistent testimony upon this great theme.

There is a certain sad consistency in the claim some of our brethren make on this point, for the only object they have in view is to invoke the authority of Jesus on the subject of immersion. Take this one element out of the field, and for such men there would be no more point in the Lordship of the Master than in any other of the great verities of the faith. But we are persuaded that those of our brethren who are most sincere in their loyalty to Christ could never put their advocacy of that principle on so low a plane.

On the other hand, there are those of our brethren who seem to regard the mere establishment of churches of Disciples in the various communities of our land as the solution of the problem of Christian unity. No doubt if these churches are full of the spirit of fraternity and are giving expression by word and effort to the central theme which has given us life, they will be of great value in the furtherance of that ideal for whose coming we pray.

But if such churches are informed only by the selfish motives which too frequently prevail among local organizations, and to too large an extent even among our own churches, their formation will rather be a hindrance than a help in the attainment of the end we seek.

An interesting instance of this phase of the matter was presented in our columns recently. A brother who took exceptions to some of our comments on a certain type of intrusive evangelism which has been practiced among us, related something of his own work in entering a city where there were already several churches, holding a meeting, gathering as many members as he could from the neighboring churches, and then remaining to build up that church into strength and prominence. He raised the question whether this was not the very means by which the Disciples are to accomplish their purpose.

If the facts as stated in his letter and as recited above are at all a fair description of the spirit of the work, we should say that probably the cause of Christian union in that city has been definitely set back by the intrusion of such a church.

Our people have not yet learned to distinguish between the denominational spirit that invades already occupied fields and puts competing institutions by the side of those already existing, under the idea that such unbrotherly conduct in the name of Christian union is a furtherance of our historic plea, and that sentiment on the other hand, which recognizes that our business is the far greater one of interpreting wherever we are the principles and ideals of that fellowship for which the Master prayed and the best spirits in the church today are seeking.

The Disciples are strong enough today to give insistent utterance to the theme which they have professed to accept for a century. They can never successfully do this by the policy of intrusion and competition. Where there is opportunity for a new church and a real service to be rendered by the formation of a new organization, we have the same duty to that field which falls upon any other Christian body, but only in such cases.

And if any one of our brethren cherished the delusion that in other instances, where there are already sufficient organizations, the planting of one of our own churches in addition will promote Christian unity, he has only to study the facts in numerous places where this policy has been pursued. In nine cases out of ten it will be the testimony of those who know the facts that our entrance into such a place has been the cause of still further division and hostility, only less pardonable than in the case of any other religious body, because of the plea which we make.

In fact, has not the time come when the Disciples ought to plan a more definite and extensive program of union work by organizing some instrumentality by which our message may be taken to every community by means of preaching, lecturing, institute work and other public statements, without reference to the establishment of a church in such communities?

If one or more of our strong, open-minded and representative men were to go successively to cities and towns, gathering the churches together without thought of adding a new denominational factor to their local equipment, but with the same enthusiasm and persuasiveness which marks the institutes of Sunday--school associations, the lectureships of Bible study groups, and the conventions of the Men's Missionary Movement, there is no reason why any city might not be interested in a campaign for a united Christian work, that would be more effective in its impress, and more permanent in its results than the establishment of any number of competing churches, even of our own order, in the same communities.

Such a series of public discussions of the subject of unity, quite divorced from any denominational program, and placed at the service of the Christians who are now so frequently and inexcusably divided, might go far to bring the message with which we have been charged to this generation in which we live, and which our local churches in too many places are totally failing to either interpret or comprehend.

After Chicago, Edinburgh

After Chicago's National Missionary Congress comes Edinburgh's World Missionary Conference. The two gatherings differ in plan and purpose. The Chicago meeting was the culmination of a nation-wide campaign for the quickening and informing of the popular mind of the church concerning its duty. The Edinburgh meeting is to be a deliberative assembly, for the most part composed of missionary specialists, to consider the most effective and economical methods of missionary work. From all the world—Christian lands and mission fields—the twelve hundred delegates will come. All denominations will be represented. In the roster of delegates the Disciples are given twenty-three names: Miss Katharine Blackburn, Dr. George W. Brown, Rev. J. H. Garrison, Rev. and Mrs. O. J. Grainger, Prof. and Mrs. R. E. Hieronymus, Rev. Edgar D. Jones, Rev. W. S. Lockhart, Rev. and Mrs. J. H. McGavran, Miss Mary T. McGavran, Rev. A. McLean, Rev. C. C. Morrison, Rev. J. M. Philputt, Rev. A. W. Taylor, Mrs. E. M. Bowman, Miss Effie L. Cunningham, Mrs. Ida W. Harrison, Rev. S. G. Inman, Mrs. William Oeschger, Miss Mattie Pounds, Mrs. Frank E. Wells. The last seven names represent the C. W. B. M., the remainder represent the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. For two years eight Commissions have been at work studying various phases of the mission problem, such as The Church in the Mission Field, Education in Relation to the Christianization of National Life, The Missionary Message in Relation to Non-Christian Religions, The Preparation of Missionaries, Missions and Governments, Missions and the Promotion of Christian Unity, etc. The reports of these commissions, soon to be distributed among the delegates, will furnish the basis of the Conference's deliberations. These reports, we may say in passing, are to be printed in nine volumes of convenient size and will be sold for four dollars. This will be a publication without a parallel in the literature of missions.

Great popular meetings are being arranged for in two other auditoriums of Edinburgh, to be held simultaneously with the Conference sessions. These meetings will be addressed by leading delegates of the Conference. The ten days from June 14 to 24 will mark a Pentecost of Missions. All Christian people will watch for the reports of these days with eagerness. The Christian Century will print in five installments the editorial interpretation of the Conference by C. C. Morrison. After the Edinburgh meeting is ended, Mr. and Mrs. Morrison will travel through Scotland, England and Ireland, visiting the congregations of the Disciples as far as time permits.

New Sunday-school National Leader

It has become quite generally known that Marion Stevenson has resigned as National Sunday-school Superintendent of the Disciples of Christ. Mr. Stevenson was the first man in the office and has worked with strength of heart, and the ability gathered from years of experience. For some time the American Christian Missionary Society has been casting about for a successor to the work, and their choice has fallen upon the genial Robert M. Hopkins, state superintendent of Kentucky. The Christian Century takes great pleasure in this announcement, because it believes there is no man among us better prepared to do this important work. Mr. Hopkins has been eminently successful in his work in Kentucy, which has lasted through something like ten years. He has been the inspiration of the entire Sunday-school movement in the state. The work he has done has been of the best type. He has felt the need of building up new schools and of increasing the attendance of old ones; but he has by no means been unmindful of the development of the schools in the quality of their work. Mr. Hopkins has worked steadily and persistently for the best things in religious education, and we may expect that under his leadership the national work will be rapidly developed in those fundamental elements which hitherto have been sadly neglected. Such leadership is the need of the hour. Throughout the entire brotherhood there is great enthusiasm over the work of the Sunday-school; but that much of the teaching in the schools is lacking in proficiency is all too apparent. This great enthusiasm needs direction into channels of true educational purpose, before we can realize its highest values. We believe that Robert M. Hopkins is "the man of the hour," because we believe that he is prepared by temperament, experience and training to give the national work just this direction.

The Northern Baptist Convention has been in session in this city for the past ten days. The meetings were held in Bartlett Gymnasium of the University of Chicago. It was a stricly delegate gathering, representing all of the organizations of the northern Baptists. President Harry Pratt Judson of the University of Chicago was the presiding officer. The delegates numbered about 2,500, and at every one of the evening sessions the entire seating capacity of the immense building was taken. Many policies of great significance to the Baptist denomination were discussed and promoted. The unification of their missionary, educational, philanthropic and journalistic enterprises was definitely advanced. Many missionaries from home and foreign fields were heard, and a large company of volunteers about to leave for missionary work gave testimony during the various sessions. A series of devotional meetings preceding each of the sessions was perhaps the most marked feature of the convention. The local arrangements, intrusted to the committee of one hundred, of which Dean Shailer Mathews of the Divinity School was the chairman, were admirably managed. Several representative Baptists from beyond the sea were hear, among whom Rev. J. H. Shakespeare was perhaps the most notable.

The committee appointed by the American Christian Missionary Society to consider the question of unification among our missionary and philanthropic boards met for a two days' session at Chicago last week. Those present were A. B. Philputt, Mrs. A. R. Atwater, C. J. Tannar, W. J. Wright, J. H. Mohorter, W. F. Richardson and W. A. Baldwin. The report of this committee will be presented at the Topeka convention and cannot be anticipated by any statement from us. But it is betraying no confidence to say that a plan of unification has been arranged by which the competing organizations will be reduced in number and harmonized in methods of operation. Further, a plan for a representative and delegate convention has been formulated and will be submitted to the brotherhood for its acceptance.

These are both tokens of progress in greatly needed regards. Our work has been retarded by inadequate and often unrelated plans, which led to rivalry and loss of power. It is an encouraging omen that this period is passing. Even more significant is the proposal that our conventions be made representative delegate bodies. In this manner only can the Disciples satisfactorily utter themselves and plan their work in a businesslike manner.

The Advance (Congregationalist, Chicago), in reporting Bishop Anderson's address before the Laymen's Missionary Congress, observes that the part of the address most applauded by the great audience was the passage on church union, and adds, cynically, "It is usually so. If an orator wants to set all hands clapping at a big interdenominational gathering, let him talk church union; but if he wants trouble, let him work at it when he gets back home. As a sugary sentiment it beats bon bons; as a piece of every day business it sticks in the mud." There is just about as much truth as cynicism in this observation. The fact is that denominational pride is such an important factor in the founding of churches that any attempt at practicing Christian union meets with resentment, both inside the local church and from those who represent the denominational machinery. In one of the side conferences during the Chicago Congress a prominent mission secretary and denominational leader said that his church was not so strong in sectarian spirit as he wished it might be! It is easy to see how a general secretary, engaged in the immediate task of enlisting people in denominational enterprises, could feel that way. It is easy to see how an editor of a denominational paper might suffer a partial eclipse of his vision of the Kingdom of God when his paper's support is based upon denominational interest and loyalty. It is all the more praiseworthy that such a denominational leader as Robert E. Speer, frankly and bravely declares his pleasure in the fact that the names Presbyterian, Methodist and the rest cannot be translated into Chinese!

The death of Dr. Alexander Maclaren of Manchester, England, removes perhaps the greatest expository preacher of our generation. For more than half a century Dr. Maclaren was the minister of one church in that great manufacturing center of England. The volumes of Scripture exposition that have issued from his pulpit are almost a library in themselves. That type of preaching is not easily followed, for it requires constant work in the mine of Biblican treasure. But the results are immensely worth while. Dr. Maclaren was a Baptist, and more than once had occupied the highest position within the gift of his denomination. He was a venerable figure, not often seen in later years outside of his own church. But his messages were given in a score of publications week by week. His line has gone out into all the earth and his words to the end of the world. The church is distinctly richer for such a career as that of Alexander Maclaren.

The fifty-first psalm is the prayer of a sin-stricken conscience. It is a plea for the mercy of God. It comes from the heart of one who dares to see himself as he is and to aspire to be all that he ought to be. It is a shallow notion that confession of sin is self-depreciation. They think too meanly of themselves who never experience the sense of guilt. They are content with little. They have no vision. There is no gap betweent their aspirations and their achievements. He who confesses his sin is dissatisfied because he knows that he has not done his besst and his confesion is a pledge that he will measure up at last to the demands of his conscience. He expects great things of himself. The anguish of the psalmist comes from the conviction that he is out of harmony with the universal law of right. Of course he has injured a fellow creature; he is not ignorant of that fact: but in injuring a man he separated himself from God, the source of moral power. The separation from God reveals to him the depth of his degradation.

Representatives of twelve different nations among the students at the University of Chicago, under the auspices of the Cosmopolitan Club, have organized what for want of a better name is termed an "international chorus." The members of the chorus will be trained to sing the national hymns of all the countries represented by the members of the Cosmopolitan Club. A program of all the national hymns will be rendered by the chorus at the Peace Day Exercises to be held in Chicago on May 18, which will, it is thought, provide a unique and appropriate feature of the occasion.

The Ministry of Seemly Behavior

Seemly behavior is that which suits the person and the occasion. An act that is becoming to a child may be disgraceful for a man or a woman. Youth and age each have privileges which cannot be exchanged without damage to both. There is a privilege which belongs to the individual. We allowed Mark Twain and Sam Jones to speak to us in their own way and we liked them, but we ridicule any one who tries to imitate either of these entertainers or teachers. The mannerisms of strangers annoy us. When the stranger becomes the friend and we know him well, we would not have him change his mannerisms, for they seem to be a necessary part of the man we love.

There are, however, certain demands which must be made upon all who assume the name of Christ. The behavior of disciples of Jesus must be such as to show respect for the truth which Jesus taught us to receive. The disciple is called for freedom and his freedom is that which is found in living with and for others and in cultivating an appreciation of "eternal ideal values that make truth what it is, give unity and harmony to what we call the beautiful, and that render worthy the conduct we pronounce moral." God gives us the chance to be fools and knaves, but the behavior of fools and knaves is unseemly in a world that has knowledge of Jesus Christ.

The answer to the critics of Christianity is the conduct of Christians. Neither the plain man nor the philosopher can set aside the testimony of a good life. No forensic Hercules can win the case for Christianity where men say with their lips that they are Christians and with their lives that they do not believe a word Jesus spoke. The church is something more than a "preaching station." It changes the thoughts and sentiments and conduct of its community and it does this through the lives of its members. The mouths of the profane are stopped by the wisdom and grace displayed in the daily walk of believing men and women and the scoffer learns to reverence the name of Jesus.

Seemly behavior is guided by reason. It is orderly and symmetrical. Passions are not eradicated but controlled for individual and social health. The consistency sought is that of motive rather than that of means. A great man like Gladstone changes his party affiliations when he sees that loyalty to his convictions requires the change. A little man thinks that consistency is loyalty to forms. He clings to the name rather than to the principle. The consistency of the Christian appears in the broadening and deepening and purifying of his motives. He has accepted Christ as his Master and he follows wherever the Master leads.

The courtesy of the Christian is evident in his attitude toward civil authority. He shows a proper respect for the opinions of mankind, and as the laws of nations reflect common opinion they ought to be honored by obedience. The Christian does not ask that special favor be shown to him. He shares the common lot. What is good enough for the average man is good enough for him. When a mayor of New York, who had been elected on a platform of law enforcement, began to deal with prominent merchants who were using the streets unlawfully, there were loud protests from his supporters, for they had chosen him to enforce the law against disreputable criminals, not against respectable citizens of wealth who wanted to use the streets for their private purposes. But how is the ignorant and vicious man to learn respect for the law if he sees that there is one law for him and another for other men?

Seemly behavior is based on reverence for God. There may be a conflict between reverence for God and respect for things as they are. The early Christian found that they could not obey God and worship the emperor. The best of them obeyed God and accepted the consequence of disobedience to the law. They did not live below the law but above it. For purely selfish purposes men live on a plane below the demands of the law. The prophet often has to go higher than the law. It is he who brings in the better day. But changes in the structure of society come slowly and the prophet usually pays a heavy penalty for refusing to conform. He shows himself to be a true prophet by meeting his fate like a man. The sham prophet is willing to sacrifice other men; as for himself, he prefers to use the reputation his sermons have won for the purpose of gaining the means of comfort. He sells mining stock to confiding friends or lends his influence, for a consideration, to some other scheme that has for its object the getting of something for nothing. He has no reverence for God as a moral being. His God, if he has any, makes no ethical demands of his worshippers.

1828—The New York State Temperance Society is organized.

1833—The Congressional Temperance Society is organized at Washington, D. C. The Georgia Legislature gives the right of local option on the liquor question to the inferior courts of Liberty and Camden Counties. The first national temperance convention meets at Philadelphia.

1834—Congress enacts a law prohibiting the selling of liquor to Indians in Indian countries, under penalty of $500. The Presbyterian General Assembly meeting at Philadelphia declares against the traffic in ardent liquors.

1836—The second national temperance convention is held at Saratoga, New York.

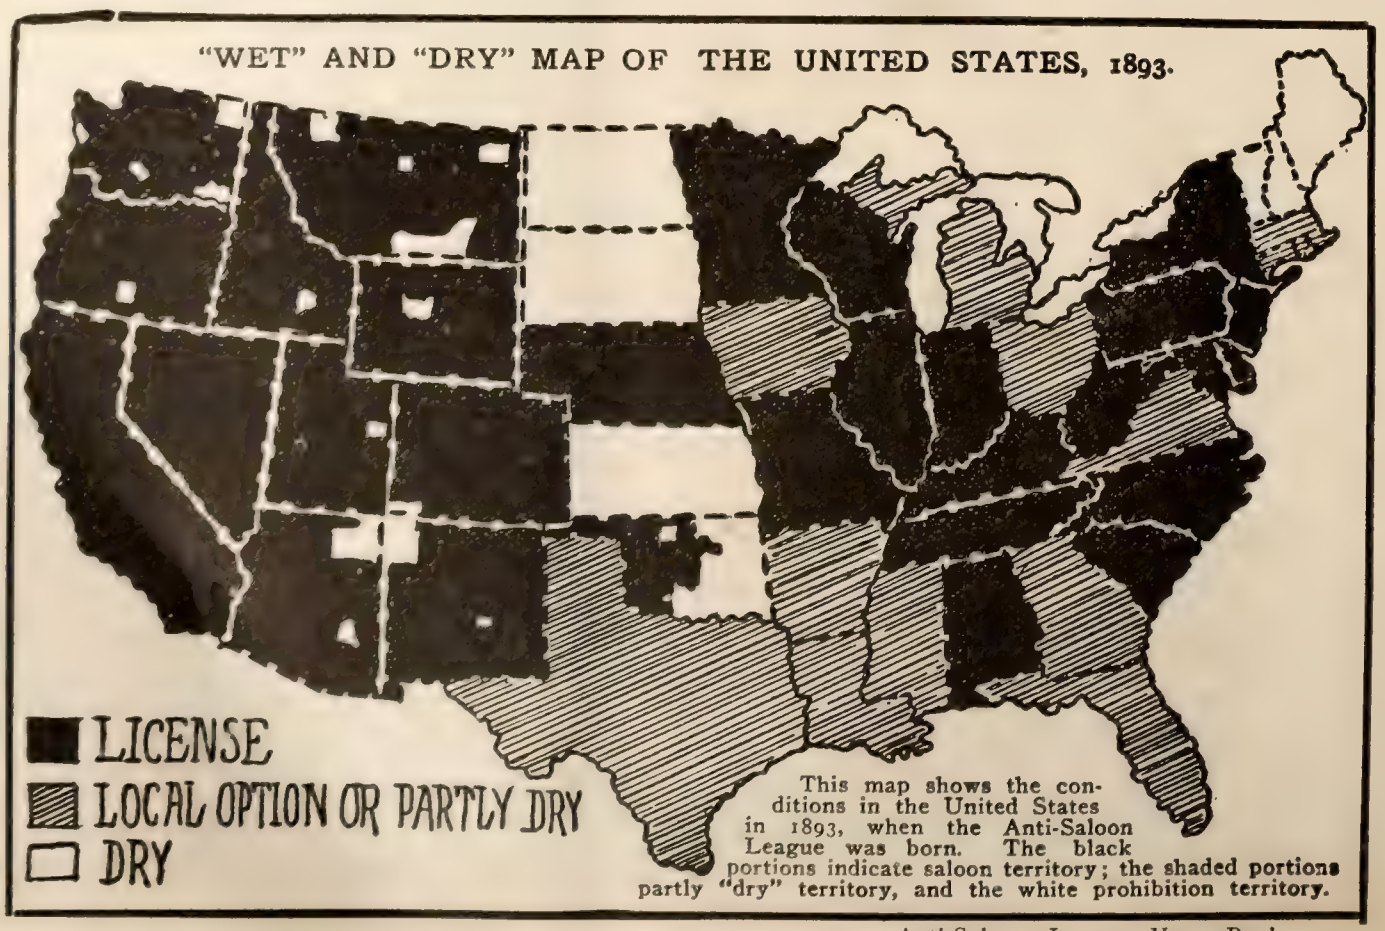
1840—The Washington Movement is inaugurated.

1841—The national temperance convention meets at Saratoga. John Hawkins, of the Washingtonian Society, reports 100,000 signers of the pledge.

1842—Abraham Lincoln addresses the Washingtonian Society at Springfield, urging a temperance revolution. The Sons of Temperance organize in New York. John B. Gough signs the pledge and reforms. The Congressional Temperance Society is reorganized on the basis of abstinence.

1843—A prohibitory law is passed for Oregon.

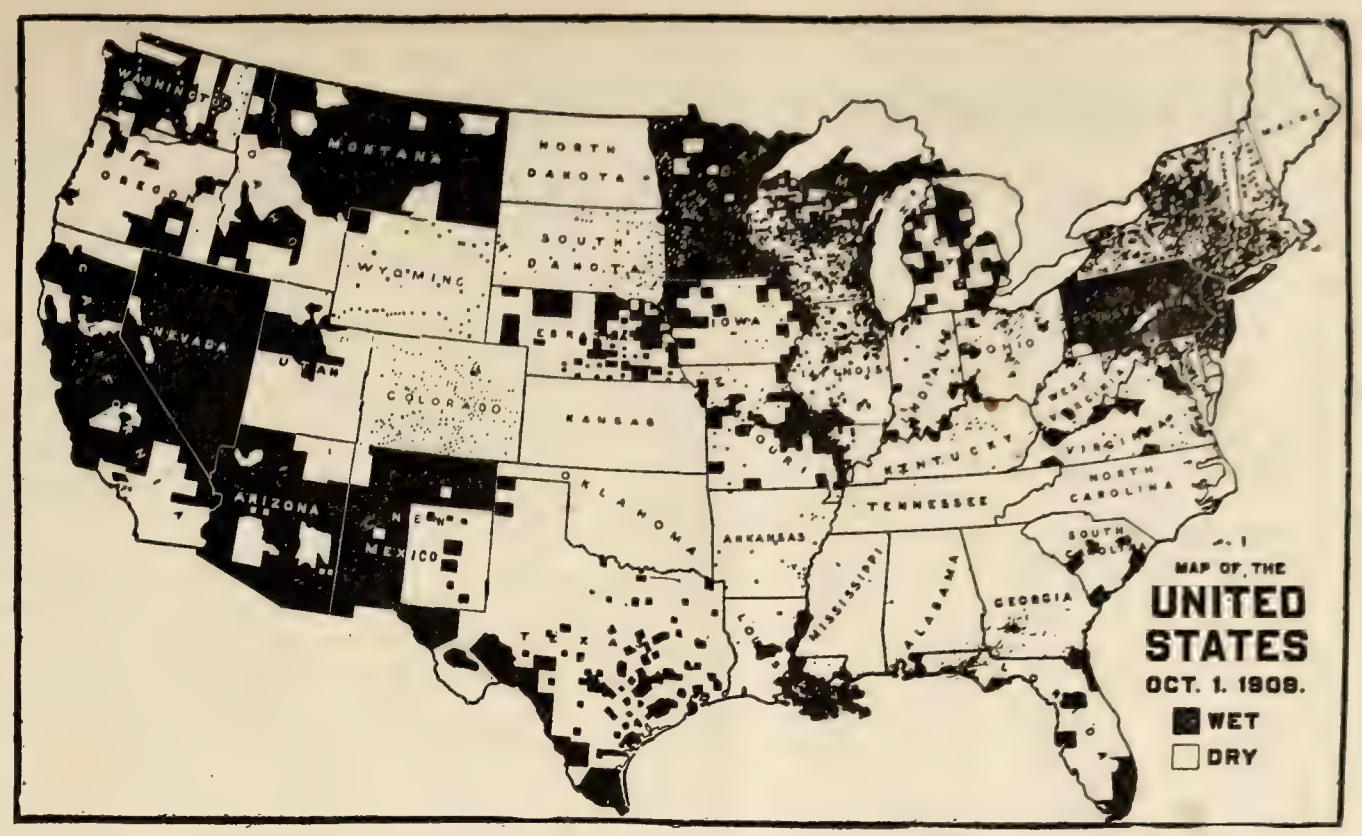
1846—The Democratic Legislature of Maine enacts a prohibitory law. The Order of Templars of Honor and Temperance is organized.



1848—The Methodist General Conference at Pittsburg, Pa., forbids members buying, selling or drinking intoxicating beverages. The prohibitory liquor law of Oregon is repealed.

1849—Father Matthew arrives from Ireland, and begins his pledge-signing crusade. President Tyler gives a banquet at the White House to Father Matthew and the Senate votes the extraordinary distinction of admitting him to the bar of the Senate.

1850—The people of Michigan adopt a constitutional amendment against license.



1851—The Dow bill introduced by Neal Dow in the Maine Legislature becomes a law. The law provides for confiscation of liquors stored for sale. The Independent Order of Good Templars is organized in central New York. The State of Ohio votes an additional section in the constitution forbidding the licensing of the liquor traffic. Abraham Lincoln joins the Sons of Temperance at Springfield, Ill. A prohibitory law is passed in Rhode Island by a Democratic Legislature. Horace Greeley declares for the destruction of the liquor traffic.

1852—The Massachusetts Legislature enacts the "Maine Law" in its most stringent form.

1852—The prohibitory law of Rhode Island is declared unconstitutional.

1854—Connecticut passes a prohibitory law with the provision for town agents to sell liquors for sacramental, chemical and medicinal uses. Myron H. Clark, a Whig, is elected governor of New York on a prohibition platform.

1855—The militia of Illinois is called out in the city of Chicago to suppress a riot occasioned by the agitation of the license question. The militia is called out in Maine to prevent a crowd from taking possession of certain liquors held by the officials. Pennsylvania prohibits the sale of liquors to be drunk on the premises. The prohibitory law of Maine is re-enacted by the Legislature and its penalties increased. Another prohibitory law is passed in Rhode Island.

1856—The prohibitory Maine law is repealed by the enactment of a license provision.

1858—The Maine prohibitory law again becomes operative.

1860—President-elect Abraham Lincoln, declines a request to furnish liquors to the national committee sent to inform him of his nomination to the presidency on June 19; he returns unopened the hampers of wines and liquors given to him.

1861—The New York Senate by a vote of 69 to 33 approves the joint resolution providing for a constitutional prohibitory amendment. President Lincoln signs an act of Congress forbidding the selling or giving of intoxicating drinks to soldiers. Generals Butler, McClellan and Banks issue orders expelling all liquors from their respective commands. A gill of whisky is allowed by Congress to each man in the navy in case of excessive fatigue and exposure.

1862—Congress passes a law declaring that the spirit ration in the navy shall cease forever.

1863—The prohibitory law of Rhode Island is repealed by a Republican Legislature.

1837—The Maine Temperance Union is organized on the basis of abstinence.

1865—The Presbyterian General Assembly declares that liquor makers and sellers shall be excluded from membership in the church.

1866—The Legislature of Maryland passes a bill to enforce strict observance of Sunday. Kansas passes a local option and prohibitory law.

1869—Massachusetts enacts a state prohibitory law. Vermont enacts a civil damage liquor act. The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church recommends total abstinence. The National Prohibition party is organized in Chicago.

1870—The Legislature of Maine passes a bill to increase the effectiveness of the prohibitory law. Ohio passes the Adair law, making the liquor seller and owners of premises, jointly responsible for injury caused by liquor.

1872—The prohibitory liquor law of Connecticut is repealed. Pennsylvania passes a local option law. The Legislature of Iowa restricts the sale of liquors and limits the number of licenses. The Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America is organized.

1873—The Woman's Temperance Crusade begins in Hillsboro, Ohio. Francis Murphy inaugurates the Blue Ribbon Temperance Movement.

1874—The Woman's Crusade against the saloons of southern Ohio continues with remarkable success. The Georgia Legislature prohibits the sale of liquors except on petition of two-thirds of the property owners. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union is organized November 19.

1875—The Massachusetts Legislature repeals the prohibitory liquor law. The whisky frauds in western states are exposed showing a loss to the government by corruption of $1,650,000.

1880—The demand for scientific temperance instruction in schools is created by the W. C. T. U. The Iowa Legislature adopts a prohibitory amendment. The people of Kansas adopt the prohibitory constitutional amendment by 8,000 votes.

1881—President Hayes issues an order prohibiting the sale of liquors at military posts and stations. The first high license law in the country is enacted by the Nebraska Legislature.

1882—The prohibitory amendment is adopted by the people of Iowa by a majority of nearly 30,000 votes.

1883—The Missouri Legislature enacts the Downing high license law. The Illinois Legislature passes the Harper high license law. The people of Ohio adopt a prohibitory constitutional amendment by a majority of 82,000; the proposition is defeated by technicalities. The Scott law taxing the liquor traffic is passed in Ohio.

1884—Congress prohibits the importation of intoxicating liquors into Alaska.

1885—The proposed constitution for South Dakota is framed bby a convention at Sioux Falls, with an article prohibiting the liquor traffic. The Georgia Legislature passes a joint local option law. A prohibitory liquor law is passed by the Democratic Legislature of Iowa.

1886—The Rhode Island Legislature votes to submit the prohibitory amendment to a popular vote. The prohibitory amendment to the constitution is approved by the people of Rhode Island by the required three-fifths and becomes operative on July 1. The Rev. George C. Haddock of Sioux City, Iowa, is murdered by a prominent friend of the brewers. Congress enacts that instruction concerning the effects of alcoholic liquors shall be given in the schools of the District of Columbia, in the Military and Naval academies, and in all other schools under government control. Congress passes a local option law for the District of Columbia. The Missouri Legislature passes a local option law.

To Help Farmers' Wives

The Georgia State Federation of Women's Clubs has undertaken a work that ought to commend itself to the attention of club women in other states. For some time it has had under consideration plans for improving the condition of rural homes. The life of the average farmer's wife is not very happy. Too often it is one unending round of drudgery. Yet the success of her husband and the welfare of the children depend largely on her housekeeping. Her responsibilities are heavy and her opportunities are poor. She usually suffers in silence. Too often she is worn out at middle-age, and looks on death as a not unwelcome visitor. The Georgia federation appeals to the state legislature to increase the appropriation to the state agricultural school so that special lecturers on subjects helpful to women may be employed. These new lecturers or teachers are to be experts in domestic science, and it would be their business to travel through the state and give free lectures in the towns and villages. The instruction would include practical demonstrations in preparing food; in modern methods of hygiene, in the care of children, in beautifying the home, in labor-saving appliances, and in the selection of books and periodicals. If we may be allowed a suggestion, a special course should be provided for the husbands, teaching them to give more thought to the welfare and happiness of their wives, and demonstrating that a child is almost or quite as valuable as a calf, and a comfortable and sanitary house fully as important as a big red barn. This course should be compulsory.

In those vernal seasons of the year, when the air is calm and pleasant, it were an injury and a sullenness against Nature not to go out and see her riches, and partake of her rejoicing with heaven and earth.—John Milton.

Missions and Christian Unity

Prophetic Address at the Chicago Laymen's Congress

By Mr. Robert E. Speer

I wish to speak of three points. First, the considerations which call us to Christian unity on the foreign field and which indicate its possibility; second, the kind and degree of unity to which these considerations call us; and, third, the measure in which this unity has been attained.

First, with reference to the considerations which indicate that Christian unity on the foreign mission field is both desirable and necessary, I would suggest five.

In the first place, the magnitude, the difficulties and the urgency of the work demand the most fruitful and effective use of all our resources for the missionary task. We have to evangelize a thousand millions of our fellow creatures, that is, to carry spiritual truth, the most difficult of all truth to carry, to two-thirds of the human race; and not only to persuade men to embrace this truth, but to place their characters under the transforming influence of the Lord of this truth. We have to do this not in any one land or in any uniform set of conditions or in any one language. It has to be done under very trying climatic conditions, conditions that break down the health of many strong men and women; it has to be done in many scores of languages, which have to be expanded in order to express this truth, and against difficulties beyond the reach of our imagination here. The task is too great and too difficult, as the late Bishop of London wrote to my friend, Mr. W. H. T. Gairdner, for any one Christian body to hope to accomplish. Even if that one Christian body might hope to accomplish it in many generations, we cannot wait for it, for these multitudes are passing away, and before they pass are entitled to know of the Lord who died for them, and no one denomination has a right to claim the whole world as its preserve, the generations to wait until it can compass them all in its own denominational name. The need is too urgent. There are, moreover, great forces astir throughout the world that will not wait for their permanent die and stamp. If we do not seize them in this generation and claim them for God, they will set and harden in permanently atheistic form. The magnitude of the missionary enterprise, the difficulties and the urgency of the task forbid all waste and inefficiency.

The World's Typical Evils.

In the second place, the elementary needs of the non-Christian peoples to whom we go call primarily for what is fundamental and essential in Christianity. The great evils of the world are impurity and inequality and hopelessness. The world does not know the character of God and therefore it is unclean: the world does not know the love of God and therefore men are not brothers: the world does not know of the life of God and therefore men despair alike of the present and of the future. And these three things, the character of God, and the love of God and the life of God, are not the things on which we disagree. They constitute the great fundamental and elementary things in Christianity, and it is for these and not for any of the points about which we are at variance that the world primarily calls.

In the third place, the simplicity of the missionary aim invites unity and shows to us how indispensable unity is. The great aim of the missionary enterprise is the naturalization of Christianity in the national life of the different non-Christian peoples. It is not the extension there of any particular view of Christian truth or any particular form of Christian organization. I belong to the Presbyterian church, but I have not the slightest zeal in seeking to have the Presbyterian church extended over the non-Christian world. I believe in one Church of Christ in each land. It is far more important that the Presbyterians of Japan should relate themselves to the Methodists of Japan than that either of those bodies should retain any connection whatever with any ecclesiastical organization in the United States. We may be very slow recognizing this here at home, we are so slow that many of us are prepared altogether to deny it, but the great body of our representatives who have gone out to the other side of the world recognize that it is so.

Christianity to be Nationalized.

It is sadly true that it is the money subsidies by which we maintain our separate organizations in Asia which are in some measure responsible for the perpetuation of those organizations, and when the day comes that we throw these great bodies of Christian believers independently on their own support, and pass over into their own hands, as we must whether we will or no, the control of their own ecclesiastical government, we may be slow to assent to their coalescing here, but, believe me, the moment that day dawns they will pour together in great nationalistic organizations in their own lands. I do not say they will not break apart again, but if they do the shame of their division will rest upon themselves and their denominations will spring out of reality and not out of alien and imported traditions. The simplicity of the missionary aim shows us not only how desirable and practical, but also how indispensable and necessary unity is.

In the fourth place, we are already agreed, all of us here in the evangelical churches of the West, on the intellectual basis that is necessary for such unity abroad. We believe in one God and Father of us all, and in one Lord Jesus Christ, and in one Holy Spirit, and in one Bible, and in one Faith, and in one Salvation. We have got already in these great common convictions an adequate basis of intellectual agreement for our enterprise there. We differ perhaps as to the symbols in which Christianity expresses itself and as to the institutional forms in which it is embodied, but we are all agreed as to the spiritual principles which are expressed in these symbols and embodied in these institutions, and I believe that agreement in these spiritual principles is the fundamental and essential thing, and that even in a great united Church when it comes there will be room made for some disagreement as to our symbols and our institutional forms. We are agreed enough, I say, in our common intellectual convictions, regarding the fundamental elements of our Christian faith to make union out in the non-Christian world an entirely practicable thing.

The one other suggestion that I have to make under this first head is that the Occidental character of our divisions makes it unnecessary that they should be imported into the non-Christian world. Our divisions here, we will grant, have their own historic value; they root back into great experiences of our fathers, and perhaps we do right in cherishing them and in letting them go with great slowness. But we will do better to let them go. And those great differences are not native to the lands to which we carry the gospel on the other side of the sea. Thank God, there are many of them that you cannot transport there. I remember reading a little while ago in a Methodist paper, published in the city of Shanghai, a lament of a certain Methodist missionary that there was not one volume of theology available for the Methodist churches in China that was not tinctured with Calvinism. I rejoiced as I read that complaint, and I hoped that it might also be true that there was not one volume of theology available for the Presbyterian churches there that was not tinctured with Arminianism, and, more than that, that did not have a very heavy saturation of it. You cannot transport to these other lands our divergent intellectual views on Christianity such as separate the Arminian and the Calvinistic parties in the West. The universal mind will not be responsible for the perpetuation of such divisions. The great things that keep us apart here do not root down to what is fundamental in Christianity or universal or really transportable; they root only into those things which are Occidental and superficial and that we could not transport and make genuinely native to these non-Christian lands if we would. The Occidental character of our differences invites us to union abroad.

The Degree and Kind of Unity.

Now, in the second place, to what degree and kind of unity do these considerations of which I have been speaking summon us? In the first place, they call us to a union manifestly that shall prevent all waste or friction; for all friction is disloyalty to Christ and all waste is disloyalty to the world. All friction is disloyalty to Christ because it argues another principle superior to His principle of brotherly love and unselfishness, and all waste is disloyalty to the world because it denies to great masses of our fellowmen a gospel that might be carried to them if there were no waste and duplication and overlapping. The considerations of which I have spoken demand of us a kind of union that will prevent all waste and friction on the foreign field.

But, more than that, they call not only for an avoidance of collision, they call for the presence of a coöperation that bids us to say to one another not "Hands off," but "Hands together." They command us not to divide that we may march separately, but to draw near that we may march together. The great things that are to be attained in the world's evangelization cannot be done by companies of Christian men who agree to differ; they can only be done by great companies of Christian men who relate themselves for common and united action. Not only do these considerations demand that we should avoid negatively the things that impair the efficiency of our efforts, but that we should provide positively the things that make our efforts more powerful and more effective.

In the third place, these considerations call not only for this external form of coöperation of which I have spoken. I am one of those who believe that they call for the most living and real and spiritual unity. And I believe this, first of all, because this was the kind of unity for which our Lord prayed. I hear men say now and then that what we need on the mission field—and that we need nothing more—is fraternal relations. Our Lord did not pray "that they all may be one as John and James are one, or as brothers are one," but, "that they all may be one as Thou and I are one." The kind of unity for which He prayed was not a unity of fraternity, not a unity of relationship of men externally bound to one another. The ideal that He held out was not the ideal of the unity of human brotherhood, but the ideal of the unity of the Godhead itself; and because I believe that was the kind of unity for which our Lord made His prayer, I believe that is the kind of unity that should be our ideal on the mission field.

Divisions Misrepresent the Gospel.

And I believe this not only because I believe that this was the kind of unity for which our Lord prayed, but also because any other kind of relationship among Christians misrepresents His Gospel. You cannot express one God in a split church. The Gospel is a message of a one God, of a one Saviour, of a one human family, and until we have got that embodied in a great human symbol that speaks of a unity as real and complete as that, we have not got a symbol that represents correctly the great Gospel of the Saviour of all the world. And I believe in this corporate oneness in the third place, because until we have that kind of unity our gospel can never put forth its full power. You must give Christ a body in which He can express Himself to the one humanity that He came to save. You must give the Holy Spirit a channel through which He can pour Himself out over the whole world that He came to keep in the salvation and the purity of the Saviour. And until we have a oneness like that our gospel will go lame and halt and never can have the fulness of that divine power for the world's conviction which our Lord Himself said it would have only when at last His people had arrived at a unity perfected into one as He and His Father were one.

Unity Coming on Mission Fields.

And now, last of all, to what extent has this degree and kind of unity been attained on the foreign field? In the first place, we have in no small measure desisted from importing into the various foreign fields our denominational titles and proprietary claims. Happily, there are some of them that cannot be translated. By God's great mercy, the Chinese language will not lend itself to the translation of many of these names. You cannot translate the word Presbyterian or the word Methodist or the words Protestant Episcopal into a great many of these heathen languages; the languages have no such terms. You can transliterate them and then teach the heathen what the names mean, but they have no words that correspond to those and can serve as translations for them. Happily, even in the lands where such terms exist, the missionaries have often been wise enough to sink them into the background. It was agreed at the outset in the Philippines, for example, that the evangelical churches should bear one common Christian name. If anybody wanted to throw in a little parenthesis at the end perpetuating the western denominational name they could do so, but the outstanding conspicuous name was one. The same agreement, I believe, has been reached in Korea, and in many other lands from the very beginning our western denominational titles were not known. And while here and there a particular missionary institution may bear some proprietary title, yet for the most part it is known as the mission hospital, or the mission school, or the mission press, and no particular name is tied to it to create distinctions in the minds of those who may know of it. First of all, then, we have made a long step in advance in leaving behind us the names. Abandon the names, and the ideas that the old names embodied will sooner or later fade away.

I can count twenty different institutions, three of them theological institutions, where different denominations have united themselves to support those institutions in common and to carry on together the work which those institutions represent. We have in China now all the medical missionaries gathered in one medical association, all the missionaries in educational work gathered in one education association. And this organic union extends not only to educational and medical institutions and publishing enterprises like our common Christian hymn book in Japan. It extends to churches. We hesitated this afternoon to assent to the proposition that the elimination of denominations abroad as far as possible was a desirable thing. Well, I do not see why we need to be so slow to ratify what has been done and what is going to be done in spite of us anyhow. I know of nine cases now where they have been already eliminated. There have been three great eliminations in Japan. The Episcopal Churches of Great Britain and America are now one in Japan. All Presbyterian and Reformed bodies have been one in Japan for twenty-five years. All the Methodist bodies were made organically one in Japan a year or two ago. There is scarcely a mission field where there have not been instances of this organic melting together of different denominations. In every country where the Northern and Southern Presbyterian churches of this land are working, outside of the United States, they are working as one organic church. In this Christian land we are two. In every heathen land we are one. Over in India, I think, it was mentioned in the report presented by the committee today, three or four years ago all the Presbyterian and Reformed churches and the Calvinistic Methodists came together in one great church of Christ for India, and only this last year the Southern section of that church separated from the rest with the goodwill and approval of the rest, in order to unite with the English and American Congregationalists of South India and make a larger union numerically, a larger union in the inclusion of different types of denominations, although for a little while it made a smaller union geographically. But it was done as a step to the larger union yet to be. And an even wider unity is proposed than the consolidation of cognate denominations. The conception of a visible corporate oneness of the whole Church is increasingly dominating the thought of great bodies of missionaries.

One Church of Christ.

And so they go on to provide for the day, which they hope to be near, when there shall be no Church of Christ Presbyterian in China, and no Church of Christ Methodist in China, and no Church of Christ Episcopal or Baptist in China, but one Church of Christ with no qualifying adjectives whatever.

It is no enmity to our past to believe that it did not exhaust God. I do not see any disloyalty to the past in believing that God means the future to be better than it. Unless the past has made ready for a better future, the past was a bad past. Only those things are good that make ready for better things to come after them, and those men are disloyal to the past, not who believe that it made preparation for greater things, but who believe that all the great things are in a golden age gone by. The worst disloyalty to the past is to mistake it for the future. Very great and glorious that past has been, but that past will have failed to teach its lesson to us, that past will have failed to fulfil its mission in the will of God if it binds men forever in the chains of its institutional forms, if it has not made them ready for larger and completer things, and led them on to such a unity as Christ Himself, we must believe, longed for while He was here and waits for now where He is gone.

The younger men—and I know their heart well—have their own day coming, and when their own day comes you may believe that that unity will be near. They do not believe that loyalty to their fathers who went before them means disloyalty to their sons who are to come after them. They believe in ringing out an old that has fulfilled its end, and ringing in the new and the larger things which are in God's will for His Church, if, like the path of the just, it is to shine brighter and brighter unto the fulness of the day.

Topics of the Time

Approximately six thousand trainmen and conductors employed on the lines of the New York Central Railroad east of Buffalo will receive substantial wage increases by a decision rendered by the arbitrators in the controversy between the railroad and its employes. The Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad and the Delaware and Hudson Railroad and their employes are likewise bound by the ruling. "We won hands down," said the president of the Order of Railway Conductors, commenting on the decision. The schedule fixed is retroactive, and the men will receive back pay from April 1. It is estimated that the increase will mean an additional expenditure by the Central of $2,000,000 a year.

By an order which he has signed Postmaster General Hitchcock has turned back to the general fund of the treasury $4,000,000 of the deficiency fund appropriated by Congress. This saving was made during the first six months of the present fiscal year ended Dec. 31. If the receipts of the department should be as heavy for this quarter as they are expected to be, Mr. Hitchcock probably will see his way clear to return to the treasury, after the close of the present fiscal year, another $6,000,000.

The Cuban army and rural guard are to be armed with the best rifle in the world, in the opinion of United States ordinance experts, namely, the latest model of the Springfield musket, which is now issued to the American army. Maj. Eduardo Lores, commander of the Cuban rural guard, has just completed the purchase of these muskets. Five thousand are intended for the rural guard, and as many for the Cuban army. The new muskets will cost the Cubans $15 each, making a total purchase of $150,000. The ammunition will have to be purchased in open market.

In less than fifteen minutes' time the Senate last week considered and passed the pension appropriation bill carrying about $155,000,000. Senator Scott, who was in charge of the bill, stated that henceforth there would be a rapid falling off in the amount required for the payment of pensions. He said that 31,000 pensioners had died last year.

President Taft's constant traveling about the country has increased the expenses of the secret-service division of the government for his protection to nearly double what it was last year, according to the testimony of Chief John Wilkie of the secret service, before the house committee on appropriations. Mr. Wilkie said it would cost $10,000 more this year to protect the president on account of his traveling, an amount equal to the total expense of that service for the entire fiscal year twelve months ago. Mr. Wilkie also reported an increase in counterfeiting in the Atlantic coast states and especially in New York and Boston.

The Gospel and Revivalism

A Discriminating Estimate

By Rev. Orvis F. Jordan

In considering the tendencies in modern religious thought, we cannot afford to neglect the revival. There is no hero so appealing to the popular imagination as the evangelist. We are still in an era when great ingatherings of people occur, though there is lacking that spontaneity which once characterized evangelism. The greatest foreign missionary pales into insignificance by the side of the successful revivalist, in the minds of a vast constituency. The home missionaries, the humanitarian workers in the great cities, the self-sacrificing servants of the King in every walk of life are held to be of secondary importance.

Revivalism in modern times first came into wide use through the Wesleyan movement. The church of that period was in spiritual deadness. A prominent man of that period describes his experience in going from church to church in London listening to the sermons. One would not know by the sermon whether one were in a church or a mosque, since these sermons were simply dissertations upon generalities that might be appropriate in either place. There was a low state of spiritual life in both the laity and the clergy. There was no interest as yet in saving souls beyond the sea and at this time no interest in reaching the irreligious in the homeland. The propagating spirit so characteristic of virile Christianity everywhere was dead.

Uplift of Wesleyan Revival.

It would be hard to over-estimate the importance of the Wesleyan movement to the Anglo-Saxon race. The spirit of religion overflowed the banks of conventionality everywhere. There was much lay preaching. There was an intense interest in the souls of men. For this generation, hell was very real, and salvation was from a peril too terrible to think about. But the interest of the time was also ethical. The Wesleys revived the old Puritan protest against worldliness in the church. At the end of the movement, non-conformity had come to great vigor in England and the state church had been profoundly influenced, as is evidenced by the Low Church movement.

In America, we had the Great Revival at the beginning of the past century. We had been in spiritual deadness here. Yale college under Christian auspices is reported as having only six Christian young men in the student body. Students delighted to call themselves by the names of Voltaire and Paine. The revival was marked by extreme emotion. The work of Barton W. Stone in Kentucky was characteristic of the movement. People fell into trances and showed all the other evidences of an abnormal physical state. These things were regarded as sure marks of the operation of the Holy Spirit. Under such influences as these great religious bodies like the Methodists and Baptists were built up.

Revivalistic Theology Not Characteristic.

In the beginning revivalism was not connected with any definite school of theology. Wesley was an Arminian and Whitefield was a Calvinist. Both had the same manifestations in their meetings. In our own day, however, we find revivalism formulating a more or less definite body of theology. Like the spirit of modern liberalism, it is interdenominational. It cuts across most sectarian lines. Like liberalism, it has never agreed on a credal statement of its position. It does have, however, a literature and theological schools where it is propagated with sufficient definiteness for us to talk of it. The Moody school in Chicago is an example.

Modern revivalism has lost something of the spontaneity of the old-time movement. Under the influence of modern studies in psychology, of which Davenport's Primitive Traits in Religious Revivals is typical, it has come to be impossible to make the public believe any more that the "mourners' bench" experience is an experience of the Holy Spirit. Great evangelists like "Billy" Sunday no longer make use of this device. In place of this has come a thoroughness of organization among a group of religious workers for "personal work" which now produces the results. We are still having great ingatherings, but with more serious losses afterward than used to characterize revivalism. Personal workers now so often present lower motives for going forward, that there is often no vital religious experience of any sort, but only a conformity to the prevailing religious style.

Appreciative Estimate.

Before, however, we present further criticism of the movement, we ought to appreciate some of the truly wonderful things which it has done for the Christian world. No great movement in the church is ever devoid of a reason for its existence.

Revivalism has ever insisted, even though unsuccessfully, upon personal piety. There is no other movement in the church comparable to it, unless it be the emphasis which the high-church movement is placing upon prayer and worship.

Revivalism has been the solitary force in the church which has kept to the fore the task of reaching the people outside the church. Foreign missions are the legitimate fruit of the revival spirit. Home missions came from the same source. Revivalism has ever insisted that the gospel is for every man. It has been ever the curse of ritualism, mysticism and liberalism that they have no great feeling for the task of extending the borders of the church.

Revivalism brought back the sense of an immanent God. The prayer was ever for the miracle of a conversion which was supposed to come from the direct interest of God in the sinner. Unfortunately this sense of the divine immanence is going out of the movement and now the whole process of salvation is looked upon as something in the hands of the repenting sinner.

Exaltation of Christ.

Revivalism exalted Christ and insisted upon his primacy in the church. It is interesting to note that the higher the Christology of a movement the greater its power and success. A movement with a low Christology like a number of the liberal movements have failed. The sense of personal leadership in the work of the church has been a religious idea of great power.

Revivalism has made the future life seem very real. No other movement in the church of today has made men feel like Paul, "In a straight betwixt two" whether to remain or to depart. A religion which has only vague hopes and uncertain promises will never replace a religion which meets perhaps the most important of our religious problems with assurance.

Revivalism, however, has many elements of weakness. Its most enthusiastic advocates today do not claim over twenty per cent of net gain to the churches from big evangelistic enterprises. Often less than this is actually realized. Whenever revivalism ceases to function at its original and most important task of winning unattached people to the church, it will be doomed.

Education Movement Counter to Revivalism.

The counter movement to revivalism, the conception of Christian Nurture advocated by Horace Bushnell and developed in a practical way by the pedagogical Bible school of today, is a movement which already promises to replace the older method. Revivalism has ever been weak on the teaching side. As we rapidly improve our Sunday-schools they will be made to function more and more as the evangelistic machinery of the church. It would be hard for revivalism to ever put enough of the teaching method into its propaganda to meet this competition.

The movement has ever been cursed with materialism. It is more fundamentally materialistic than the high-church movement. "The Blood" is preached in such a way as to leave one to infer that if Jesus had been strangled instead of crucified, there would be no efficacy in his death. All this is in spite of the fact that Jesus did not bleed to death, but undoubtedly died of nervous exhaustion on the cross. God is spoken of with the most grossly anthropomorphic terminology. Hell is preached as a physical reality so genuine that "Billy" Sunday has the grease trickling down his victim. It is in the presence of such religious concepts as these that Christian Science has its greatest opportunity in proving its superior "spirituality" as compared with orthodox religion.

It is easy to find agreements and discrepancies between revivalism and the gospel. Jesus in his passion for souls was a revivalist. He went everywhere preaching and sent out his disciples by two. He used the educational method, however, being known as Rabbi, and did not count his results in the number of "souls." The modern evangelist counting souls is too much like the Indian chief counting scalps.

Revivalism, Jesus and Paul.

Revivalism has ever preached faith and repentance. Jesus also preached these important principles as did the apostles. The emphasis which revivalism places upon a certain theory of the atonement was not the emphasis of Jesus and the apostles. Paul made the death of Christ the prerequisite of a more important truth to him, the resurrection. He did connect the death of Christ with salvation but never by any well-defined theory. Jesus also connected his death with the salvation of the world but did not construct a theory. We have had many theories of the atonement, and unfortunately revivalism has chosen one of the least desirable of them all and preached it as the very gospel.

We must ever be examining the foundations of our religion. In the conflicting currents of our modern life, there is continual danger that we shall be led to apostatise. We have improved nearly everything we possess until we have come to despise the old. We have produced no Edison in religion, however. In this field the great original thinker lies back nineteen hundred years in human history. We must hark back to the words and spirit of Jesus as our authority as Edison is now authority in electricity. Our improvement in religion will come in the more perfect appreciation of the life and spirit of the World's Redeemer.

Our Readers' Opinions

A Historic Case of the Practice of Union

Editors The Christian Century: The Christian Century says: "If any reader will point out how a Baptist church and a Congregational church, for example, in a local community can unite, without the sacrifice of conscience, upon the practice of any other form of initiation than immersion only, he will make a distinct contribution to the problem of Christian union."

Is it not a fact that the only union of churches which the Disciples have thus far accomplished, that of the Campbell and Stone factions, was upon a platform in which immersion was not compulsory? That while thereafter they were all to teach and practice immersion that the unimmersed already in the Stone churches were to be (and were) received into fellowship, and recognized as "in good standing" by the Campbell churches without being re-baptized by immersion? And was not this done under the personal supervision of Mr. Campbell? Why not advise the two churches referred to above to try this plan?

Again the Century says: "We do not believe that immersion is essential to salvation. Neither de we believe that it is an arbitrary test of faith. Nor do we believe that immersed Christians show signs of having been buried with Christ and rising with him to walk in newness of life, which sprinkled Christians do not show."

The last sentence in this quotation may fitly be termed a self-evident truth. The Christian Evangelist takes the same position as to the relation of immersion to salvation. Even that stalwart stand-patter, the Christian Standard, shies at the proposiion that all the unimmersed will inevitably be damned. But the Evangelist and the Standard (the writer is not sure about the Christian Century) insist that immersion is the only door to the church, that it is essential, absolutely so, to membership or fellowship therein.

But that more is required in order to admission into the Church of Christ on earth than is necessary to the remission of sins and to final salvation looks like an absurd and untenable proposition.

Surely the membership of even Disciple or Baptist churches is not a more select company than that of the redeemed in glory. If immersion is not essential in order to fellowship among the saints immortal, it should not be to that of the alleged saints who are yet mortal.

As to the divinity of Jesus the Century says: "Faith in the Christ, the Disciples have always taught, is not an intellectual classification of him, but a personal acceptance of him as divine Leader and Saviour." A sensible statement. Surely we are not called upon to rally round the flag of either Athanasius or Arius, or to make a shibboleth of the famous Greek diphthong about which the Christians of the fourth century so furiously raged together. F. M. WILEY.

[The classic precedent of the real practice of Christian Union in the coming together of the Stone followers and the Campbell followers is instructive. But instead of furnishing a contradiction to the editorial statement which Mr. Wiley quotes it is evident that it confirms it. The two movements came to gether on the basis of the practice of immersion as the only form of initiation into the church. If a Baptist and a Congregational church in a local community earnestly desire to be one this is the way by which their union may be consummated. The Disciples of Christ exist for the particular business of telling such Baptist and Congregational churches how thus they can answer their Lord's prayer for unity.—EDITORS.]

"An Incorrect Classification"

Editors Christian Century: May I point out that you misquote me in your reply to my letter last week—unintentionally, no doubt. I did not ask, "Why did you write that editorial?" as you make me say. I thought I knew why you wrote the editorial, and I sympathized with the motive. The incorrectness of the classification is undeniable, and should be pointed out. But my question was, "Why did you write that paragraph in the editorial?" And I am still at a loss to know why. It is no more true today than it was 200 years ago that the Baptists are "organized around" the immersion dogma. That is not history at all, either ancient or modern, but fiction. If the battle for spirituality and the freedom of the individual has been fought and won, so that "the doctrine of immersion is the one important surviving dogma distinguishing Baptists from the main body of evangelical Christians," as you say, in the same way, and to the same extent, the battle for Christian union has been fought—and won. To paraphrase your words, "Evangelical Christianity is today permeated with this principle which Disciple history has glorified." Witness a multitude of testimonies from diverse sources at the missionary convention now in session in your city, also the wonderfully significant movement in England just now for a "United Free Church of England," and many other similar movements at home and abroad. What then is there left for us to be "organized around" but the dogma of "baptism for the remission of sins," which a Baptist layman, sitting beside me yesterday at the Auditorium, averred to be our distinguishing doctrine! Of course I was emphatic in my denial, as doubtless some of your Baptist readers were when they read your statement of the Baptist position in the paragraph to which my letter called attention.

If it be claimed that the Disciples are still unique in their program of unity, which I grant, then you have baptism at the center with us, precisely in the same sense as it is at the center with the Baptists, for it is a part of our program of unity as it is a part of the Baptist program of spirituality and a regenerate church membership.

Now this would not call for another letter, but it seems to me worth while to call attention to a danger and an evil in our writing and preaching against it which it is necessary to guard. I refer to the questionable practice of defining our position by contrasting it with the positions of others, and the resultant evil, almost unavoidable, of misstating the facts in the interest of a clear-cut antithesis. Some one has said that an epigram is nearly always a lie. An antithetical statement is nearly always inaccurate. The Baptists are propagandists of the baptismal dogma in the same sense that the Disciples are, and in no other. If it is not at the center with us, neither is it with them. They and we are immersionists in loyalty to the doctrines of spirituality in religion and a regenerate church membership (for which, I submit there is still some fighting to be done), and we, in addition, in loyalty to our principle of Christian union, which principle also makes it impossible that we should be Baptists. E. M. TODD

Fort Wayne, Ind.

[If Mr. Todd will state what possible connection the doctrine of immersion can have with the principles of a regenerate church membership and spirituality in religion we will gladly let him have the last word in the discussion. As a matter of history not even Baptists deduced the practice of immersion only from their fundamental principles. Their practice of immersion only, rests, in its own right, upon their interpretation of Scripture without reference to their fundamental principles. We wish only to repeat that the Disciples, if they are true to their essential mission, have nothing whatever to do with the immersion dogma or any other dogma. —EDITORS.]

Deserves Attention

Professor James Denney, D. D., of the Free Church of Scotland, has brought us at length to see that we can allow the critics to sift the gospels as men sift wheat, and yet there is enough left to present and preserve the Christ risen, ascended and glorified, and not a laurel lost from his crown. His book, "Jesus and the Gospel," is a sober work, a much needed book about the inerrancy and infallibility of the gospels.

He shows that the attitude of the church is the same as the attitude of the apostles and in accord with Christ's own estimate of his mission and office. He says, "to be a Christian is to take Christ at his own estimate." That is good, and that "estimate" is beyond the reach of the critics to ever assail. As the naturalist can take a single bone of an extinct species and fit the whole frame to it and reproduce it why should we not be able to rehabilitate the true and real Christ out of the many facts which all the critics concede of Him?

This Prof. Denney proceeds to do, and here is our same risen Lord. Here he stands perpendicular in solitary grandeur, the Master himself. Prof. Denney asks: "Is it not conceivable that we may have to appeal to him even against the earliest forms which Christianity assumed?" Truly indeed. This sentence of Prof. Denney is the greatest bolt ever hurled against papal Rome. It revives original Protestantism. It is the beginning of the restoration of pure Christianity. Harnak and others have been trying to sift out pure Christianity, as Luther and the Campbells did in their days, but Prof. Denney has taken the last great step and appeals to Christ himself against all comers, against the pope and the academy and even the Protestants and shows that the real Christ can be seen behind all these shadows and mists.

Christianity, as every one knows, was first swallowed up in Grecian philosophy and has remained academic ever since. A religion constructed on infallible books is yet to burst its bounds and to come out in its oriental beauty and power. We have begun to reconstruct and my praise to Professor Denney is most hearty for his precious faith. It must be fought out anew, and the assurance is already in sight that nothing can in any way tarnish the exceeding "glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ."

Science and philosophy will open a new kingdom, and let us not fear, for righteousness will find its home there and the incomparable Christ will be found in the center full orbed as "The Star of the East." Prof. Denney shows that passing from the gospels we strike a new atmosphere in John's gospel and Hebrews. He says: "It is the New Testament itself we must purge if we would

CHAPTER TWO.
From the Depths.

Perhaps it was the sudden fire in Jeanie's eyes that made Donald shrink before her like a whipped cur. Or else it was the stirring of the pure soul within her which made him realize the enormity of his own guilt of thought as well as of deed. For, when he dared to reply, which was after the lapse of full half a minute, his words showed that he was conscious of his own degradation, and of the gulf which his crime and folly had opened between himself and her.

"I see, Jeanie, you despise me; aye, and you have a right to hate me too, for the shame I have brought on the hitherto honorable name of our house. I am as low in the depths as a man can well be, though I did not realize this till I saw it in your eyes a moment since. Yet, Jeanie, leaving me out of your thoughts (I have ceased to be worthy of any sacrifice from you or any one else), but how are father and mother to be saved from the knowledge of my sin and shame?" The ring of penitence in his voice, and the fact that he did not attempt to make any excuses for his folly, touched her with instant compassion and hope.

"Are you willing, Donald, to give up your evil companions and be guided back again to a simple, honest life?"

"Jeanie, I would give the whole world if I had it to be able to stand today before men with clean hands."

"Then let us go to father and mother and tell them all. You are their only son, Donald. They will forgive you; yes, if it were only out of consideration for my pleading." He flashed up in sudden anger at her words,

"I tell you, Jeanie, as I have told you before, I will not live and have my parents know this thing. I have trusted you. Even if you are not willing to suffer for me, or with me, surely you will not betray my confidence."

"Do not be unjust to me, Donald. You know as well as I that I am suffering with you at this moment, most intensely. You know also that if I were to yield to your suggestion of a moment ago it would only add sin and disgrace to the evil already done." The tender sympathy breathing in every tone of her voice made him hopeful and eager. He bent towards her and whispered hurriedly:

"Listen, Jeanie. In the first place, no one would ever blame you. As for me, we could easily arrange that I should be away somewhere when the thing was done. Then we could save, both of us, from our pocket money, and pay father back again by instalments. I could manage to have letters posted to him, just as we'd save up, you know. A friend of mine would get them posted for me from London. Think what this plan, successfully carried out would mean to us all." She did not interrupt him, nor yet look angry. She waited patiently till he had finished, and then she spoke slowly and with infinite sadness:

"A Graeme—a thief!"

"I tell you it would not be a theft. We'd pay it back," he said angrily.

"There is no use in being angry, Donald. Call things by their right names. To me there are three terms in this matter, which I consider synonymous: betting, gambling, thieving."

"I am not deep enough in the mire, sister, put me deeper," he said bitterly.

"You would put yourself deeper, Donald, if I were foolish enough to help you. Let us cease talking of an impossible thing, and let us try to find out something that we may do without making bad worse. Now, first of all, tell me who is the enemy who has led you into this folly?"

"It can do you no good to know."

"But it may do you good," she said with a faint attempt at a smile.

"On the contrary, it would do me great harm."

"How?"

"No matter how. I will not tell you."

"Listen, Donald, what has occurred to me as being the best thing we can do. If you tell me who the man is, I will go to him myself. I will put all the circumstances before him. I will tell him how it would kill father and mother to know of your disgrace. Then I would promise him that just as we could save the money, we would pay him all."

"You know little of the character of the man or you would not think of approaching him with such a request. If I had not been a fool I never would have been in his power as I am. Bad as I am, Jeanie, I would not have you seek an interview with that man, no, not though my disgrace should be blazoned on all the gates of Brigend."

"I would not fear him, and he could only refuse my offer."

"Which he would do with the most devilish delight. But even if I did hope that he might listen to you, I dare not divulge his name. I am under a most solemn promise not to do so."

"Oh Donald, Donald, I do not know how to help you," she wailed. They were both silent a few minutes. Donald threw himself into a chair and covered his face with his hands. Jeanie lifted her white face heavenwards. Her shining eyes seemed to see far away above the white ceiling of the room. Presently a new strength seemed given her. She laid one hand gently on her brother's bowed head and bending down, she whispered:

"Donald, be a man." He lifted a haggard, miserable face and replied bitterly,

"I wish I could be a man, Jeanie, for then I might end my misery with a pistol. But the hereafter makes a coward of me."

"Hush, Donald, hush! Your words are wicked. But there, poor laddie, I know your heart is breaking." She tenderly caressed his hot brow, till the great tears welled up in his eyes and fell on her trembling hands.

"I am a nice fellow," he said as he impatiently wiped his face with a soiled handkerchief, "crying like a weak girl." Jeanie laughed, a low, soft laugh, in spite of herself. She was nineteen and he was twenty-one. It seemed to her ridiculously absurd, under the circumstances, to hear him speak of a "weak girl." That little laugh, untimely as it may seem, did them both good.

"When did you say this money must be paid?" she inquired.

"Monday evening, at latest."

"This is Friday, and cousin Archie is with us and will be till Monday. It is very awkward for me, as I shall have very little time to myself till he leaves. Give me tonight, Donald, to think of some way out of the trouble. You know you can trust me."

"I know I can trust you. There, don't go away yet. I have just thought of a plan that might be feasible. Aunt Eleanor could lend you this sum without asking you just what it is for, she thinks so much of you."

"No use, Donald. Half an hour after I had applied to her for such a loan Archie would know it, and I should be in chains. No, no, that will never do. But cheer up, Donald, I shall think of some plan before tomorrow night." "And you won't tell my wretched secret to anyone, anyone? Promise me."

"I promise, Donald." He had barely time to look his heartfelt thanks, when Archie Monteith entered the room, noisily singing,

"I'll be your tootsey wootsey
In the guid auld simmer time."

Nothing could have been better suited to banish the air of embarrassment from the troubled faces of the brother and sister. Donald even plucked up enough of his old gay spirit to join in the chorus, while Jeanie attempted to laugh as if her heart were light as a feather.

"The minister's awa'; the minister's awa', hooh." shouted Archie, flinging up his cap like a school boy and imitating his uncle David's tone admirably.

"And what's the rejoicing about, Archie?" queried Jeanie, still laughing, hoping, no doubt, that her keen-eyed cousin might not notice her tear-stained face.

"The rejoicing is, my dear cousin, in plain English, that my heart leaped for joy when I saw the soft hat of your clerical friend disappearing a few minutes since round the corner of the house, nearest, I presume, to that modern paradise, known in these parts as the Manse of Brigend."

"Paradise is not the correct name, Archie, seeing there is no Eve in it." Poor Donald thought he was making a brave show to be merry.

"Why, Donald, I am afraid you have profited but poorly from the teachings of the reverend Dry-as-dust Sinclair. Learn from me, laddie, that Adam was in the Garden in loneliness and peace before he slept that sleep from which he was to awake and discover that he had lost a rib and found a wife."

"Curious," said Jeanie, "men nowadays say they lose a heart before a wife is found. But listen, Archie, and take my advice; never be heard in Brigend calling Mr. Sinclair Dry-as-dust again, if you value your precious life."

"And I never valued my life so much as I do at the present moment, fair cousin. So let us put Dry-as-dust out of our minds, and spare ribs as well. Behold the beauty and delights of a glorious summer evening being wasted indoors." He drew aside the ample folds of the elegant curtains shading the wide old-fashioned window, near which they stood. It was open, and the sudden movement of the curtains drew a sweet breath of mignonette into their faces from the garden beyond.

"You are quite right, Archie; it is simply a shame to waste the moments here. Come into the garden."

"You two may," said Donald gloomily. "I must go into the office. I am ever so much behind with my books."

"Not the garden, Jeanie. What an evening it is for the bike, and your roads are perfect. Do come, Jeanie," as she hesitated. Lanarskshire is heaven for the humble cyclist as well as for the grand motorist. She laughed and answered,

"Heaven is not so near us I am afraid—
Well, where would you like to go, Archie?"

"Wherever you wish, Jeanie."

"I know all the roads within ten miles. I have no choice, at least this evening. So choose whichever direction you like, only we cannot go very far as it is now after eight o'clock, you know."

"August and moonlight! Who talks of lateness? However it shall be as you wish. It is not too far to Bothwell? Is it?"

"Oh, no, only a few miles. We can do it easily."

"Ah," she said to herself, as she hurriedly donned a navy blue cycling costume, "I am glad he asked me to cycle. I shall not need to talk so much, and oh, I need time to think."

Besides Bothwell Bridge, even Archie Monteith fell into thoughtful silence. For a time Jeanie did not realize that it was the light in her own eyes that kept him still. She liked him better at that moment than she had ever done in her life before, though she had known him intimately for three years. The thought flashed through her busy brain, "He has some reverence in his nature, after all." Then she spoke in a low, hushed voice. "Is it not wonderful to think of it all, Archie? The gathering of the forces on both sides. The prayers, the trust, the deep devotion to the cause of truth on one side. The tyranny and blasphemy on the other. The horrors of the conflict on that now silent bridge. And then the rout and the overthrow of the Lord's people by their cruel enemies! And yet it was not overthow," she mused half to herself, "the blood shed that day at the Brig o'Bothwell has nourished the seeds of truth for all Scotland ever since."

"Why, Jeanie," he said lightly, "old Dry-as-dust could not speak more solemnly. Forgive me," he said quickly, as he noticed a surprised, pained, look flit across her sweet, refined face. I did not mean to make little of the mighty past. But I must confess that the past, no matter how great, is very little to me compared with the present. Do you know, Jeanie, one kind look from your bright eyes is more to me than aught else in the whole world, past or present?"

"This place is too sacred," she said coldly, "to talk nonsense in. Let us go home."

"Not yet Jeanie," he replied, and he moved into the pathway before her. "You must hear what I have to say, here and now."

She looked into his face, astonished at the firm tones of his voice.

"While you were a guest in my mother's house, I did not once speak of love to you, Jeanie. But I was biding my time. I felt in my heart long since that you were the only woman in all the world could make me happy. I scarcely knew how much you were to me till your education was finished, and you had returned home. Now I tell you, Jeanie, that life is nothing to me without you. Will you be my wife?" She was trembling and frightened by the intense earnestness of his voice and manner. With the greatest difficulty she replied slowly:

"Archie, I have never once thought of you except as a kind cousin."

"Your chief charm for me lies in the fact that you have never been, like some girls, anxious to catch a matrimonial prize, as too many consider every man who happens to have a good bank connection."

"I have no wish to leave my own home, Archie. Father and mother need me for a long time to come. Let us forget that you have said these things, Archie. It will be better for both of us."

"It will not be better for both of us," he said firmly. "I have taken you too much by surprise, and I will not accept your answer for a few days."

"I am needed at home now more than you can understand," she spoke sadly and was pale as white marble.

"Jeanie, my great love for you prompts me to plead with you to think better of me. Believe me, it is because I want to shield you from all sorrow, that I have spoken so soon." She gazed at him with parted lips and a rush of color to her face.
